"He's very ill. The doctor calls it an aguish chill and fever. But he's been asking for you," he said. "I was to show you up, Cousin Olive, as soon as you came; and you come, too, please—he may like to see a clergyman. He was wandering last night, and it was 'Olive! Olive!' every moment, thinking he was with his little sister in the fields."

Olive's eyes filled with tears of sympathy as she and Horace went upstairs.

The large, dull room into which Roger introduced them was far from being an ideal sick chamber. It faced the north; and the heavy, old-fashioned brown moreen hangings to bed and window made it additionally dismal and "stuffy."

Olive, who had had considerable experience in nursing, saw at a glance much that needed improvement; the medicine bottles on a table beside the bed, a great basin half-full of beef tea standing among them with its used spoon, the dusty fire, the tumbled sheet and clumsily-arranged pillows, and, most piteous of all, the worn, sharp features of the patient, with his rough hair and unkempt beard. Urged on by womanly tenderness, she went straight up to the poor old man, and bending over him, took him by the hand.

"Do you know me, uncle?" she asked.

And in a low, hoarse whisper came the answer—

"Yes, to be sure! You're my little Olive, come to take care of me again!"

(To be concluded.)

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

By SOPHIA F. A. CAULFEILD.

SCARCELY know whether the family of Campanulaceæ, or bell-flowers, may be fitly awarded a place amongst those styled "historical"; but the "blue-bells of Scotland" has become a household phrase. Another species, "Venus's looking-glass," has been the subject of classical fables, and the "Canterbury bells" (or nettle-leaved bell-flower) are associated with the pilgrims who flocked to the shrine of Thomas à Becket, for these pilgrims rang bells placed upon poles as they went, chiming (in harmony, it is to be hoped) with those on their horses' necks. These flowers used to grow in great abundance in the low woods around or near the ancient city, and there exists a tradition that they were likewise so called in memory of St. Augustine of Canterbury. The blue harebell may be included with its fellows of the family as being the emblem of St. George. The "azure harebell" is mentioned by Shakespeare, and old herbalists so called the Hyacinthus non scriptus; but the "nodding blue-bell" of the heathland, or Campanula rotundifolia, is the harebell of modern poets, and is said to have been originally termed "air-bell" on account of their waving under the slightest breeze, supported on such slender and delicate stems, called by the country-folk of some counties the "witches' thimbles."

Amongst the special favourites of the flower-loving world, the Chrysanthemum most certainly may be ranked, although it makes no appeal to our love of perfume. It was first introduced into this country by Miller (1764), who had received a specimen from Nimpu, a Kokfa or Chrysanthemum indicum, and he cultivated it in the Chelsea Botanical Gardens. But we have some indigenous species of our own; as, for example, the "corn-marigold," the "feverfew," and the "ox-eyed daisy." These all bloom in summer only, while the Chinese, Indian, and Japanese chrysanthemums blossom in the autumn and as late as November. As the special heraldic emblem of the Mikados of Japan, this flower deserves some notice, and because it is honoured with a special festival in that country, being one of the five annual flower fêtes, viz., those of the golden Kiku (or chrysanthemum), the cherry-tree, the iris, the Fudsi (or Wistaria sinensis), and the plum-tree. The Japanese florists build up their chrysanthemums into effigies of their deities and celebrated heroes, real or fabulous; so arranging the colours of the flowers as to array these personages in gorgeous fashion, the "Sun-goddess" being clothed in golden blossoms. What are called by English florists the "Pompon" varieties are produced from the Chusan daisy, brought to England in 1846 by Mr. Fortune. It is much used in Japanese art for house decoration; "sprinkled" in the irregular style which has appealed so strongly to English taste, and superseded the hitherto formal lines of our own designs.

Clover, known by its old English name of "Trefoil," is a plant likewise dignified by historic associations. The ancients symbolised Hope as a little child standing on tip-toe holding a clover blossom in his hand. I need not do more than notice the fact that St. Patrick is said to have represented it as an emblem of the Holy Trinity, having endeavoured to explain the mysterious nature of the holy "Three in One" to the ignorant heathen to whom he preached in Ireland.

The Shamrock, or common wood-sorrel (Oxalis acetosella), thenceforth became the badge or distinctive heraldic device of that country. By old herbalists it used to be called both "Alleluja" and "Cuckoo's Meat." Gerard says, in explanation of these names, that "when it springeth forth the cuckoo singeth most; at which time also 'alleluja' was wont to be sung in our churches." The finding of a four-leaved clover is variously regarded in different countries as very "lucky," or much the reverse. The Druids esteemed it greatly, and believed it to be a charm against evil spirits; and even now, in the North of England, it is placed in dairies and stables to ensure them against the spells of witches. We find the trefoil much employed in architectural decorations, the form being adopted in church windows, for the capitals of pillars, and as a finish to the four limbs of crosses. In the "language of flowers" it is used to symbolise "fertility," and it possesses the distinctive characteristic of being able to vegetate after having lain dormant for many years. The early Italian painters in their representations of the crucifixion introduce the wood-sorrel on account of its symbolic meaning.

The next flower to which a few words of notice may justly be given is very specially an English one; I refer to the Daisy (Bellis perennis). The Welsh call it Llygad y dydd, which translated into English means "Eye of the day," or "Day's-eye," the ancient English name of the flower, and so written by Ben Jonson, while Chaucer calls it the "ee of the daie." We read of it in the poems of Burns as the "wee, modest, crimson-tippit flower," and Shelley describes them as—

"... Those pearl'd Arcturi of the earth,
The constellated flower that never sets."

Certainly this simple wild flower has been more distinguished in the songs of the poets than the majority of its fellows, whether of the woods and hedgerows, the meadows, or even the luxuriously cultured denizens of garden parterres. Poets have immortalised it from the days of Chaucer in the land of its birth, and the great and the noble have exalted it to the honour of a distinguishing badge. Louis IV. associated it with the royal Fleur-de-lis, and wore a ring, which he caused to be made, round which was a wreath of daisies and Fleur-de-lis enamelled in relief, the two flowers being engraved on a sapphire, with this inscription: "Hors cest anel, point n'ay amour." This motto may be explained by the fact that he referred to his wife, Marguerite of Provence, and implied that his affections were centred in her and in his country.

Margaret of Anjou likewise selected it as her emblem, and the knights who entered the lists at the tournament at Nancy, held in honour of her marriage (at the tender age of fifteen), wore garlands of daisies, as did all our nobility, knights, and squires, in their bonnets and caps of estate, on her arrival in England. Moreover, King Henry caused her device to be enamelled and engraved on his plate, and the modest little flower, now so ruthlessly beheaded by the modern gardener's daisy-mowing machine, was cultivated in the greatest profusion in the gardens of the palace. The words of Drayton (attributed to the lovely queen on a different occasion) are now again applicable:

"My daisy flower, which erst perfumed the air,
Which for my favour princes deigned to wear,
Now in the dust lies trodden on the ground."

Queen Katherine Parr adopted a tuft of three daisies and two buds as her badge; a pretty design much employed in modern decorative embroidery. There are many ancient legends connected with this flower, and amongst them we find its origin traced to the race of nymphs called Dryads, through one of the Belides. She is said to have encouraged the suit of Ephigeus, the rural divinity, and while dancing with him on the green sward, attracted the admiration of the guardian deity of orchards—Vertumnus. To escape from his attentions she was changed into the daisy. There are other fables connected with it, which are scarcely worthy of relation. In an ancient floral vocabulary it is said to represent "candour and innocence."

In Teutonic and Scandinavian mythology, the special flower dedicated to the moon is the daisy; which seems a curious idea, since the "wee crimson-tippit flower" closes her "ee" to the light of her nocturnal patroness. There is another name by which it has been called—i.e., Herba Marguerita, after St. Margaret of Cortona. In French a Marguerite means a pearl; and in German, also, it is known as the "Meadow-pearl." The Greek for pearl, Margarites, became in Latin Margarita, as it remains in Italian; the same word in each language denoting both a pearl and a daisy. The mother of Henry VII.—the BLUE-BELL.

Lady Margaret—wore three white daisies; and so likewise did the charming sister of Francis I., so called by him his "Pearl of Pearls." But no loving appreciation of her merits, when, being threatened with defeat in this before-named battle with the Huns, he prayed to the God of his holy wife and recommended his army to Him, the tide of battle turned, resulting not only in a splendid victory, but in his obtaining baptism at the hands of St. Renie (early in the sixth century).

It will be observed by those who may see any pictures of St. Clotilda, that she is represented with an angel attendant, bearing a shield with the device of three Fleurs-de-Lys.

Many of the Carolingian monarchs wore this latter flower on their crowns, as did Frederogonda. Their sceptres bore the white lily. The banner presented to Charlemagne by Leo III., when he gave him the title of "Defender of the Church of St. Peter," was blue, Semée with Fleurs-de-Lys of gold. Prior to this, toads were the heraldic emblems emblazoned on the flag of France. See Givillim's "Display of Heraldrie," 1611. He states that the charges were "three toads, erect, saltant." Referring to this fact, Nostradamus, in the previous century, calls Frenchmen Crapauds, a nickname which has naturally stuck to them ever since, notwithstanding that Louis VII. dismissed them from their exalted position. The circumstance which induced him to exchange these reptiles for the elegant Fleur-de-Lys is said to have been a vision or dream on the occasion of the second Crusade, and they were then designated the Fleurs-de-Luce.

I said that the word Lys was a corruption of "Louis," but other derivations are assigned to it; amongst others, that it was from Löys, in which manner the first twelve monarchs of that name spelt it. It was also said that the flower was so called because it grew on the banks of the river Lis.

We find the lilies of France in combination with the lions of England, and for the first time, on the escutcheon of Edmund of Lancaster, second son of Henry III. This circumstance is explained by the fact that in 1075 he married Blanche of Artois. In the year 1340, when the crown of France was claimed by Edward III., the shield of that country was quartered with the lions of England. In the first year of the present century the lilies finally disappeared.

Before concluding my remarks in reference to this distinguished historical flower, I must observe that it was not alone the symbol of royalty. When residing at Rouen, many years ago, I often had occasion to pass through the square of La Pucelle, in the centre of which a statue of Jeanne d'Arc was erected. The Fleurs-de-Lys emblazoned on her banner, and borne by her as her insignia, by royal grant, were sculptured on her monument, together with an inscription, which, being translated from the Latin, ran as follows:—

"The maiden's sword protects the royal crown;
Beneath the maiden's sword, the lilies safely blow."

It may be observed that the Fleur-de-Lys was chosen by Flavio Gioja to surmount the northern radius of the compass; this was done in honour of Charles of Anjou, in whose reign, as King of Sicily and Naples, that great discovery was made. The Bourbons retained this flower in its conventional form as their emblem; but its assumption was not limited to royal personages and races; it was borne by the Medici, and Est, by our own Montgomeries, Earls of Eglintoun, inherited from their ancestor, John Mundegumri, on whose seal it is found (about the year 1175). The Chateaubriands also bore it, with the motto, Mon sang teint les Bannières de France, conferred by St. Louis; and several of the Spanish Orders of Knights assumed it likewise.

Returning to the question of its origin as the royal badge, I should not omit to name an idea promulgated by some—viz., that it was adopted in allusion to the "Salic law" or "code," denying the sovereignty of the kingdom to a woman, and with reference to the passage of Scripture which says of the "lilies of the field," that "they toil not, neither do they spin;" and here we find the origin of the proverb, Le Royaume de France ne tombe point en quenouille (freely translated, "the kingdom of France falls not under the distaff").

The initial letter of this section of the series on "Historical Flowers" gives a representation of the Forget-me-not (Mysotis palustris). Another plant, the identity of which has not been very decisively determined, was woven into collars, and was likewise so called in the days of chivalry, or designated in the language of the times, "Souveign vous de moy." At a famous joust between Edward IV.'s brother-in-law, Lord Scales (brother of Elizabeth Woodville), and a French knight, of Burgundy, such a collar formed the prize. But the flowers may have been the Veronica chamaedrys. Yet as far back as the year 1500 (and odd) German botanists gave the name Vergiss mich nicht to the Mysotis palustris, as we do ourselves. According to Miss Agnes Strickland (in her "Queens of England"), Henry of Lancaster (Henry IV.) "gave to the Mysotis its emblematical meaning, by writing it, at the period of his exile, on his collar of 'S.S.' with the initial letter of his Mot, or watchword, 'Souveign vous de moy.' It was with his hostess, wife of the Duke of Bretagne, that Henry exchanged this token of goodwill and remembrance."

But there is likewise a German legend, which disputes with Henry the origin of this poetical name as connected with these pretty blue clustering flowers. Two affianced lovers—a knight and his lady-love—observed a spray of them floating by on the waters of the Danube. The bride-elect expressed her regret at their fate, and the devoted lover whether mental, moral, or physical, appeared to affect her extreme humility. In writing to the Bishop of Meaux (Brignonnet) she calls herself "that imperfect, ill-shaped, and counterfeited pearl!" and her piety was of a public and an active, as well as passive and private character; distinguishing herself as she did, as the protector of Calvin, Clement, Beza, Marot and others, who took refuge at her Court at Nérac.

The Fleurs-de-Lys (or de Luce) are conventional representations of the Iris. The French name is a corruption of Fleur de Louis, originating in the fact that Louis VII. of France adopted it as his device, A.D. 1137. But it would seem that, as a symbol of that country, the Iris is traced back to the time of Hadrian, A.D. 100 (and odd), when, according to Nicholas Cousin, a lady holding one of these flowers (a lily or a gladiolus) was the emblem of Gaul. Tradition relates how, on the field of Tolbiac, Clovis, being converted to the true faith, was made victorious, and was presented with a lily, with which flowers the soldiers crowned themselves, finding them in the vicinity of the battlefield. These were probably blossoms of the Iris.

It would seem that the conversion of this warlike sovereign was due to the persevering prayers of his Christian wife, Clotilda, and plunged in to secure them. The flowers were grasped, but the current carried the knight away; and he flung them on the bank as he swept past, exclaiming, "Vergiss mich nicht!"

"History repeats itself;" and just such a fate might have overtaken the late Emperor, Louis Napoleon, when walking by the Rhine with his thoughtless cousin, the Princess Marie of Baden. It is related that she was inveighing against the degeneracy of modern gallants, as compared with the chivalrous knights of old. Just at the spot where the Neckar and Rhine unite, a flower was blown from the hair of the Princess into the rushing stream, eliciting from her unwary lips the exclamation, "There! that would have been an opportunity for a cavalier of the olden time to have shown his devotion!" "That is a challenge, cousin," returned the Prince, and without a moment's hesitation he sprang into the surging waters. The story goes that again and again he rose, to disappear beneath them, but in the end reached the bank with the so nearly fatal flower in his hand. "Take it, Marie," he gasped, as he shook the water from his clothing; "but never again speak to me about your 'cavalier of the olden time!'" The regretful Princess afterwards married the Duke of Hamilton, and died very recently.

PIANOFORTE DUETS AND PIANOFORTE DUET PLAYING.

FANTASIAS, VARIATIONS, AND ARRANGEMENTS—

COMPOSITIONS of considerable utility when used in the right way, which unfortunately is rarely the case. When there are two sisters or cousins in a family, or any two players in the habit of meeting frequently, the opportunity ought not to be lost of making the acquaintance of these works written in duet form. Of course I am addressing myself to those of my readers who play and practise the piano.

In my previous papers I have indicated (of course briefly) the composers of duets in the various classic forms, and though I have left till last the consideration of works coming under the above heads, it is not to be assumed that they are altogether to be treated with indifference and neglect.

The number of fantasias, etc., is very large. As soon as a new opera, symphony, etc., makes a success, the various airs are reproduced for all manner of instruments, singly and in combination. Some of these are merely pot-pourris, which I certainly opine should be left in oblivion; some are passable transcriptions; and some are fantasias which are worth performing.

In the present age the fashion is not for variations, but for transcriptions and illustrations, as they are called, written so as to present not a single difficulty to the merest tyro in music. Such should not be.

It is certainly right for beginners to have pieces written for their capacity, but the truth is that there is a disinclination on the part of students to take trouble over anything in which the honours are shared by a colleague, and for that reason the various mongrel productions called part songs, trios, duets, etc., that are written and published at the present time are so wanting in musical interest and device. "Too difficult," say the publishers. "Cannot sell anything that amateurs cannot read at sight." Of course there are brilliant exceptions to the rule, and I hope and trust that all my readers are brilliant exceptions. This, of course, applies equally well to all vocal concerted music. It is really painful to listen to the efforts, even of good players, to read the most simple duets at sight; and as for the vocalists, the less said the better.

Now if you want operatic airs for the piano, why not go to the best transcriber for the piano that ever existed—Czerny? whose name probably brings to the mind of my readers visions of exercises of all kinds, wearily performed under the direction of that hindrance and block to learning music—the nursery or other governess, whose knowledge of the piano consists generally of Czerny's 101 Exercises and a piece or two of that clever arrangement manufacturer—Sydney Smith.

Czerny's arrangements and variations can be got by hundreds at Messrs. Cocks. He possessed the art (of which the present arrangers are ignorant) of turning the various airs he worked on into melodies and passages adapted to the genius of the instrument. As a tribute to his genius in this branch of art, I may mention that I have long had a duet of Czerny's on airs from The Huguenots. I had lost the title-page, but on the blank page before the music there was written "Duet on the Huguenots." Czerny.

I was always under the impression that it was a genuine pianoforte duet; there was no internal evidence to show that it was anything different; but on taking it to Signor Li Calsi to play through, he at once recognised it as an arrangement of Thalberg and De Beriot's fantasia on Meyerbeer's great opera, but the violin passages and the melodies were so beautifully and ingeniously adapted to the piano, that it is impossible for anyone who did not know the violin and piano duet to recognise it as anything else than a pianoforte duet. Therefore I say, if you wish for transcriptions of operas, etc., go and get Czerny's. There are also a number of admirable transcriptions of Duarte dos Santos published at Messrs. Cocks. Beethoven has written two sets of duet variations, on various airs. Herz is another prolific writer in this respect. but I cannot call to mind a single living writer who has written duet fantasias or transcriptions worth playing by the intelligent player.

I notice in Messrs. Schott's catalogue a number of operatic fantasias by H. Bertini. I would recommend to advanced players one or two excerpts from Wagner (including a magnificent transcription of the march from Tannhäuser), arranged for piano duet by Von Bulow; and the arrangements of Burgmüller are also worth playing. Döhler's arrangements are also good.

I notice in the catalogue of Durand and Schœnewerk some fantasias or operas, by Edward Wolff, which are sure to be musicianly and worth playing.

I recommend very much the arrangements of the great symphonies published by Augeners (Peters' edition). When a new symphony or overture, etc., is to be performed, it is highly useful to play it though as a piano duet (not as a solo, where it is impossible to give all the counterpoint), thus acquiring a knowledge of the subjects and the construction of the movements, which helps you to realise the efforts on the orchestra far easier than if you heard the subjects for the first time. Do not practise them as pianoforte work, but have them to refresh your memory when you are going to an orchestral concert. I remember some three years ago or more I bought as a duet Moszkowski's "Joan of Arc" symphony. I knew it almost by heart when it was played by the Philharmonic orchestra, under the composer's direction; thus I was enabled to follow the orchestra effects without having to get the subjects in my head.

Believe me, fair readers, when I assure you that if you were to play any orchestral work on the piano before going to hear it, your enjoyment would increase fourfold; but do not (I must repeat) practise passages on the piano that were never intended to be played on and are not suited to the instrument.

Adieu; and if my observations have the effect of turning your attention to a beautiful form of art, I am more than rewarded for my trouble.

THE STORIES OF FAMOUS SONGS.

By ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

"THE WATCH ON THE RHINE,"
 "WHAT IS THE GERMAN'S
 FATHERLAND?" "THE SWORD SONG."

FOR months past we have heard so much of Germany, that we think it may be worth while to give a short account of three famous German songs. Their names, at least, are already familiar to most, and they have played no unimportant part among the influences under which was finally achieved that grand national unity of Fatherland which will remain the glory and the monument of the late Emperor William's reign.

The songs to which we allude are "The Watch on the Rhine," "What is the German's Fatherland?" and the famous "Song of the Sword."

We have no intention of rushing into the intricacies of German history or politics. We wish only to give a simple explanation of these to help our readers to an intelligent comprehension of the present position of affairs and the agencies by which it has been brought about.

From the earliest known periods Germany had been, not one country, but many, with different royal families and varying laws and customs. These separate countries had been often at war with one another. It is exceedingly difficult to follow the threads of their history, which, while so distinct, yet seem so hopelessly tangled. There were the great Powers of Austria and Prussia, and the smaller ones of Bavaria, Würtemberg, and Saxony. Then came Westphalia, Hesse-Darmstadt, Mecklenburg, and a host of still smaller principalities.

Such was the state of things when, after the great French Revolution, at the close of the last century, the armies of France overran Europe under the generalship of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Prussia and Austria he humbled to the dust. Some of the smaller German Powers, too weak to remain neutral, actually saw fit to ally themselves to the conqueror.

Finally the great Emperor's discomfiture in Russia, and the defeats his armies received in Spain at the hands of our English Duke of Wellington, turned the scale of events.

To Germany the French disasters brought hope of deliverance. Prussia was the first to seize the golden opportunity. Secret societies were formed, in which all classes of society eagerly joined, with the one object of driving the foreign usurper from the country. The army, which Napoleon had restricted in number, was kept always freshly recruited, so that as soon as one body of men were thoroughly drilled and disciplined, they were replaced by another, until almost the whole male population had received a military training.

In 1813 Frederick William III. of Prussia, father of the late Emperor William, made an appeal to the young men of Prussia to arm in defence of "Fatherland." The call was eagerly responded to.

Among the crowds who flocked to his standard was a youth of the name of Karl Theodor Körner. He was the son of a highly respectable family in Saxony. Born in 1791, he had, as a little lad, enjoyed the acquaintance of the great poet Schiller. In his earlier years he had been a delicate and precocious child, but as he grew towards manhood he became strong and agile, as renowned for his prowess as a gymnast and a dancer as for his personal beauty and mental qualities. His father would have liked him to be a lawyer, but his own tastes leaned towards natural science and engineering. He studied at the universities of Leipsic, Berlin, and Vienna, and first came before the public as a poet when he was about twenty years of age. He produced a tragedy, which, contrary to the experience of most young authors, proved an immense success. But this work struck the right key, for its subject was a patriot hero. Still fortunate in his surroundings, the young man, whose childhood had been honoured by the smiles of Goethe and Schiller, now became the friend of Humboldt and Schegel. About this time, too, he fell in love with a sweet girl, and their betrothal gave unmingled satisfaction to two families.

But when Prussia's call to arms resounded through Germany, Körner forgot everything but patriotism. His was no courage of despair, but that high courage which can turn aside from the sweetest joys of life, saying:

"I could not love thee, dear, so much Loved I not honour more."

He wrote to his father thus:

"Now that I know what happiness may be realised in this life, and when all the stars of my destiny look down on me with such genial rays, now does a righteous inspiration tell me that no sacrifice can be too great for that highest of all human blessings, the vindication of a nation's freedom."

He enlisted in a corps of volunteers called "The Black Huntsmen," joining with them in their solemn dedication service, which concluded with the singing of "Luther's Hymn,"

"A safe stronghold our God is still,
 A trusty shield and weapon."

His powers of endurance and aptitude for every kind of military duty soon raised him to the rank of lieutenant, and he was the idol of his comrades. Beside the bivouac fires he composed the noble lyrics which have immortalised his name, such as "The Summons to Arms," the "War Song," and the solemn "Prayer during the Battle."

It was during the August of 1813 that the "Black Huntsmen," deceived by the rumour of an armistice, found themselves surrounded by their foes and reduced to lie in ambush for several days, and it was when thus hidden with his comrades in a thicket that Körner composed his most famous lyric, the "Sword Song," a dialogue in which the warrior speaks as a bridegroom, to his sword as a bride, eager for the consummation of their bliss. This fancy may strike us as partaking of the nature of a mere "conceit," and it is weird and gruesome into the bargain. But its passionate fervour shines even through the disguise of a translation.

"O sword beside me hanging,
 Why dost thou on me smile?
 There's something in thy aspect
 That does my heart beguile."

"O brave is he who bears me,
 So radiant is my gleam!
 To be a free man's comrade—
 What more can weapon dream?"

"Ah! cherished sword, free am I
 With you, my love and pride,
 As you were to me wedded,
 My own beloved bride!"

"So to thy hand I render
 The wielding of my life;
 O would we were but wedded!
 When will you claim your wife?"

"Unto our bridal evening
 The festive trumpets call;
 And 'mid the cannon's booming
 We'll find our nuptial hall!"

"O blessed, bridal moment,
 For it I yearn, I pine!
 O clasp me to thee closer,
 For thee my wreath I twine!"

"Why clangs't thou in thy scabbard,
 As if thy blade was mad
 With joy at coming battle?"

My sword, why art thou glad?"

"Well may I clang in scabbard!
 I yearn with ardent zest
 For battle's strife and struggle;
 How, rider, can I rest?"

"Stay yet in thy still chamber,
 My darling must not stir,
 But keep her quiet shelter
 Until I come to her!"

"O keep me not long waiting Outside Love's fair domain,
 Where blood-red are the roses,
 And fresh bloom death and pain!"

"Then leap thee from thy scabbard,
 Light of the rider's eyes!
 Come out, my sword, and show thee Beneath the Father's skies."

"Out in the open meadows
 Our wedding dance we'll tread,
 While the sweet sunbeams glisten
 Upon thy shining head."

"Come on, ye valiant warrior,
 Ye rider, ride apace,
 For sure thy heart is throbbing,
 Its darling to embrace!"

"Once, coyly as a maiden,
 Now in God's sight, she blushes
 In thy right hand, thy bride!"

His lips pressed to her brightness,
 Their nuptial vow they take,
 And he must be a craven
 Who would his bride forsake!

"Now let her sing her anthem,
 And sparkle at my side;
 The wedding morn is springing,
 Hurrah! my gleaming bride!"

Two hours after Körner had thus written the French soldiery surrounded the patriots, and the poet fell, mortally wounded. The "Sword Song" was found in his pocket-book. He was buried beside an oak on the roadside, and his grave has since been surrounded by a wall and graced by a monument. And English Mrs. Hemans sang over his tragic end—

"A song for the deathday of the brave,
 A song of pride!
 For him that went to a hero's grave,
 With the sword his bride."

The war ended with every advantage to the German side, and two years later "Waterloo" completed the ruin of Napoleon.

Ernest Moritz Arndt was another who at this epoch gave his pen to the service of his country. He, too, belonged to the cultured and privileged classes. He was a professor in sundry German universities. He attacked Napoleon "like a bulldog," and during the short period of French ascendancy was forced to take refuge in Sweden, where he plotted unceasingly for the benefit of his country.

But when favouring fortune permitted his return, he did not meet with much gratitude. His sentiments were of too liberal a nature to be pleasing to an exclusive dynasty. His wonderful lyric, "What is the German Fatherland?" was perhaps the first voice of the national craving for unity. It runs—

"What is the German Fatherland?
Is't Prussia's realm or Suabian land?
Is't where the Rhenish grapes hang red,
Or Baltic sea-mews scream o'erhead?
O nay, nay, nay, so cramped a strand
Is not the German Fatherland!"

And so on, through a poetic enumeration of the many provinces, until the question is answered—

"Where'er men speak in German tongue,
Where German songs to God are sung,
That only be thy boundary line—
That, valiant German, call thou thine!
The whole of Germany shall it be!
O God of Heaven, look down and see;
And German courage to us send,
To love and guard it to the end.
Thus shall it be, thus shall it be!
The whole of Germany shall it be!"

Arndt was born in 1769, in the Isle of Rügen. He died in extreme old age in 1860. Could he have been spared for ten years, he would, "in the flesh," have beheld the fulfilment of the youthful "desire of his heart."

But, alas! for years after the downfall of Napoleon, the history of Germany was little but a record of petty squabbles between its several states and of high-handed repression of popular rights in all of them.

When Frederick William IV. (brother of the late Emperor William) ascended the throne of Prussia in 1840, the popular party founded great hopes on the moderation and tolerancy of his earlier measures. These hopes proved ill-founded; for from that date until 1848 all Europe was filled with "risings" of "the peoples," and with clamours for popular representation. To this period we owe the world-famous song of the whose author, Max Schneckenburger, like the writers of so many other national lyrics, was a quiet, obscure person, who does not seem to have burst into song on any other impulse. The song, which attracted very little attention at the time, was written on the occasion of France insolently asking for the Rhine frontier as her natural boundary; it runs—

A cry goes up like thunder's crash,
Like clash of swords and roaring sea.
At the Rhine, the Rhine, the German Rhine.
Who will the river's guardian be?
Dear Fatherland, let peace be thine.
Firm and true stand the watch,
The watch on the Rhine.

"Through countless thousands flies the word,
A million eyes with lightnings shine,
And each sound German heart is stirred
To keep the sacred boundary line.
Dear Fatherland, etc.

"To heaven's plains he lifts his eyes,
Where hero-fathers have their rest,
And swears, while patriot passions rise,
Thou, Rhine, art German as my breast.
Dear Fatherland, etc.

"For while one drop of blood still glows,
One sword remains in German hand,
While one the rifle's magic knows,
No foe shall trample on thy strand.
Dear Fatherland, etc.

"The oath resounds, the waters shine,
The standards flutter in the air,
By Rhine, by Rhine, the German Rhine,
All German hearts are guardians there.
Dear Fatherland, etc."

The perpetual bickerings between the German states culminated in the Franco-Austrian war, at the close of which Frederick William of Prussia died, and was succeeded by his brother William. He began to reign as King of Prussia in 1860. His chief minister was the famous Bismarck, the "Iron Chancellor," whose one idea was, sooner or later, to place Prussia at the head of a "united Germany." His first move towards this end was the annexation by Germany of the provinces of Schleswig-Holstein; Austria to hold Holstein, and Prussia Schleswig. Next a quarrel was picked with Austria, which drove her out of Holstein, and reduced her to a secondary position. But the climax was the great war with France in 1870, when France once more hoped to extend her frontier to the Rhine, and to carry her triumph into Berlin itself. The whole German nation rose up in solemn self-defence, in the resolute spirit of another popular song—

"It never shall be France's,
The free, the German Rhine,
Until its broad expanse is Its last defender's shrine."

It was at this time that "The Watch on the Rhine," the song of the obscure Suabian merchant, Schneckenburger, sprung into universal favour.

The King of Prussia, already an aged man, rode out of his capital with tears in his eyes, accompanied by his son and surrounded by royal kinsmen, and followed by his troops. On the other hand, the French Emperor's first despatches were filled with self-glorification and boastful sentimentality.

There was soon a most dramatic reversal of the picture. France was defeated at every turn. Instead of the French marching in triumph to Berlin, the Prussians marched to Paris. Instead of extending France to the Rhine, the French had to give up Alsace and Lorraine, including the fortified towns of Strasburg and Metz. In September, 1870, the Emperor of the French placed his sword at the feet of King William of Prussia, and was carried a prisoner to Germany, being only released to die an exile's death in England. It was actually in the heart of France, in the "Hall of Mirrors" of the Palace of Versailles, that William I., King of Prussia, was proclaimed "Emperor of Germany." This happened on the 18th January, 1871. Thus was fulfilled the dream of poets and patriots, and wherever the conquering army passed the stirring notes of our three "famous songs" accompanied them.

Let us hope and fervently pray that this great empire, whose foundations have been laid by such strong hands, and cemented by the blood and tears of myriads of her own children, will now be ruled by heads and hearts wise to know that there is "a time to kill and a time to heal, a time to break down and a time to build up, a time of war and a time of peace."

NOTICES OF NEW MUSIC.

NOVELLO AND CO.

FROM this eminent firm we have received several new works of interest, amongst them being Weber's hymn, "In constant order works the Lord." This is, of course, another number of the celebrated octavo editions. To the octavo choruses have been added many numbers, ancient and modern. We have before us a chorus (753) from Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," and a Hallelujah Chorus (755) from Handel's "Triumph of Time and Truth." Their tonic sol-fa series of anthems and part-music comprises over 600 numbers. Amongst the most recent of these appear madrigals by Pearsall, part-songs by Sullivan, Barnett, and Pinsuti, and anthems by Dr. Mann and Berthold Tours.

The volume of Seven Pianoforte Pieces, by Henselt, edited and fingered by De Pachmann, would make a beautiful New Year's gift to a really capable pianist.

Then, for violinists, we have an Album (No. 11), containing six sonatas by Corelli, full of beauty; and another (No. 13), made up of eight British melodies arranged by Siegfried Jacoby.

ENOCH AND SONS.

Drawing-room Songs, with banjo accompaniment, arranged by Edmund Forman.—This album includes "Three Old Maids of Lee," "Some Day," and other ballads which, doubtless, will suffer but little from being associated with the banjo.

A Child's Garden of Verses.—Twelve songs for children, with delicious quaint words by Robert Louis Stevenson, which alone should create quite a rush for copies, and, added to this, charming music by Miss Carmichael, forming a most auspicious commencement to Messrs. Enoch's Kindergarten series.

Madrigal is the name of a graceful French song by C. Chaminade. Both French and English words are appended.

The Angel Came. A song by Frederic H. Cowen.—This ballad is published in keys to suit all voices. It is scarcely up to the high standard which we assume by some of his songs that Mr. Cowen has set up for himself.

The Salute is a capital quick march, and has all the dash and spirit necessary to military music.

ROBERT COCKS AND CO.

King Weathercock, words by Chrissie Denning and music by Joseph L. Roedel, is a humorous song, which, well sung and well told, would be sure to give amusement.

None Know How I Love Thee. Words by W. Toynbee and music by Tito Mattei.—A fine song, but almost overbalanced by a rather meaningless and very vague modulation.

Burlington Music Books (No. 1).—This part offers six songs by Gounod, Sterndale-Bennett, Blumenthal, Cowen, and others, at a shilling, sheet-music size.

Six Recreations for the violin, with piano accompaniment, by Carlo Ducci, jun.—No. 4, a song without words, which we have before us, is very well suited to the instrument, and has a most melodious subject.

STANLEY LUCAS AND CO.

Six Easy Pieces for Violin. By Otto Peiniger.—Let us again recommend these excellent and interesting pieces. They are so very suitable for young beginners.

PHILLIPS AND PAGE.

Little Sweethearts. Song, by Edward German.—Quaint and pretty, the compass in the G minor key being from D to E natural. The story is funnily pathetic. It will amuse old and young alike.

FORSYTH BROTHERS.

If at your window, Love. Song, by Ethel Harraden.—Published in three keys. A clever and graceful song by a G.O.P. Prize-winner. It is fully expected that this song will become very popular.

A ROUNDEL OF "OUR" GARDEN.

By GLEESON WHITE.

("A dance, where Time plays the fiddle."—Austin Dobson.)

A GARDEN of girls, who read this their own paper,
 Only think of their number! One's intellect whirls,
 At the tall and the short, the robust and the taper—
 A garden of girls!

Some staid and demure, some with sunniest curls,
 Some whose love is for wisdom, and some—for the draper;
 Some, maybe, rough diamonds, some costliest pearls.

Time! you fiddle and yawn, you insatiate old gaper!
 Just ponder awhile, as your giddy tune twirls;
 Can't you stay? and thus keep them (you out-of-tune scraper)
 A garden of girls.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

"WHY, Mrs. Oldman, I didn't expect to find you here. I came to see them off, but, like you, I was too late. Don't cry so. Come and have some dinner with me, and I'll row you back to the ark."

"I daren't—I daren't, Adam. For pity's sake, don't ask me to go there! I daren't face Noah for the life of me. Don't ask me why, but I can't. I am a wicked woman, Adam Day, and I don't deserve to have a child at all, and I have not got one now, and it serves me right, too; and I shan't have a husband either much longer, and——"

But here her voice was choked with sobs, and her words were indistinguishable.

"Mrs. Oldman, there is no doubt you did a very wrong thing when you changed those babies. You see I know all about it," began Adam, gently.

"Dear me, Adam! How did you learn that?" interrupted Mrs. Oldman, surprise giving her voice.

"I guessed it. But if I know Father Noah, he won't have an angry word for you when you tell him the truth, if you have not already done so."

"I told him? Indeed, I have not. He knows it all, though, from Mr. Leicester; and I am afraid to go home, so I came here, to ask Eve to take me with her as her maid or nurse; but she was gone when I arrived, and now I don't know what to do."

"Fortunately, I do. Come and have some dinner, and then I'll hire a trap and drive you home as quickly as possible, for Noah will be frightened. It will never do for him to lose both wife and daughter in one day."

"He'll never forgive me, never," sobbed Mrs. Oldman, as she suffered Adam to lead her into the next room to get some dinner.

"And now tell me how they went off, for I did not wait till the end of the service," said Adam, to divert his companion's thoughts from her trouble.

"There was a deal of bother about signing the certificates or the register, because they had to get Eve to sign her real name, and they managed it somehow, without her suspecting anything. It was Mr. Leicester's lawyer who did that; he was telegraphed for yesterday, you know."

"How did he manage it, I wonder?"

"I don't know exactly, but I heard him say to her, 'Now write your Christian name, only, here,' which Eve did; and then, after Mr. Clifford had signed, he said to Eve, 'Now, Mrs. Clifford, I want you again, please,' and when Eve came up, he said, 'We must have the name of the officiating minister; so write Leicester just here,' he said this almost in a whisper, and he pointed to a place where he had pencilled the word; all the rest was covered up with blotting paper, and Eve was so happy and excited at the time that she paid very little attention to what she was doing."

"And did they go straight off from the church?"

"Yes, they drove here in a carriage and four horses, with postilions. But if Noah had been looking after Eve's hearse instead of after her wedding coach, he could not have looked sadder than he did; and yet, if I know Eve, she'll always love him, no matter how grand a lady she may be; and he has been a rare good father to her. Ah! Adam, my sin has found me out many and many a time, for, fond as I am of Eve, I never loved her as I do Miss Grace. Time after time, when she has been to see me, I have longed to tell her the truth—longed as only a mother could. But she must never know it, as Mr. Leicester said it would almost kill her, for she never was strong like Eve—none of my children ever were—and I sometimes think she don't care about life much. She seems to have some trouble. I fancy it is she wants a mother's love. Fathers are all very well, but they aren't like mothers, after all said and done. But I don't know, I may be wrong."

Adam privately thought she was, but he could hardly tell Mrs. Oldman that he hoped his was the love Grace needed to make her care to live; so he dropped the subject, and suggested they should go back to Windham, lest Noah should be alarmed at his wife's absence.

But it afterwards turned out that Noah had taken Mrs. Oldman's absence very coolly at first. Not finding her at home when he returned to the ark after the wedding, he concluded she had gone up to the Rectory; so he cooked and ate his own dinner, for which he had very little appetite; then smoked a pipe, and then fell asleep. When he awoke it was getting on for tea-time, and as Mrs. Oldman had not returned, he went up to the Rectory to fetch her, thinking she might feel shy about meeting him; but to his surprise and alarm he found she had not been there at all, nor had anyone seen her since the service. Neither Grace nor Mr. Leicester were at home, and Noah left the Rectory to go in search of her, reproaching himself bitterly for having taken her absence so coolly.

"I should have sought her out and forgiven her, not waited for her to come to me," he said to himself as he went to the school-house to tell Adam of his trouble. But here he heard that Adam had just driven past with Mrs. Oldman, and on hastening back to the ark he found Adam in the act of driving away, having left his charge safe in her own home.

"Mrs. Oldman is all right; I found her at Bridgham. She is indoors, looking out anxiously for you. I am coming back in an hour or so to see you on important business," said Adam from the dog-cart; and before Noah had time to answer he drove off, wisely thinking he would not be wanted for the present.

Noah went into the ark, but, like Adam, we will not follow him, for he shut the door behind him, so that not even an inquisitive fowl witnessed the scene which took place.

Only when Adam knocked an hour later he found he was in plenty of time for tea, since they had been too much occupied to think about it, though Mrs. Oldman complained of a splitting headache.

"Well, Adam, you were right. I have told Noah all about it now, and he has not given me so much as one hard word, though if he had laid them there pike-liggers about me, it would not have been more than I deserved," said Mrs. Oldman, pointing to the pike-liggers which hung on the wall.

"But what does Adam know about it?" asked Noah, in amazement.

"I know all I care to know, Father Noah. I know Grace is your daughter, and that I am the happiest and luckiest man on earth!" replied Adam.

It was Mrs. Oldman's turn to be surprised now, but she said nothing, as she looked from Noah to Adam in silent expectation.

"Why so, Adam? It makes no difference to her. She is still to be called Miss Leicester, and is never to know the Rector is not her father," said Noah.

"What! never to know she is the daughter of the noblest and saintliest man in England? Never to know that now even I, unworthy as I am, may venture to ask her to be my wife, since no barrier of birth any longer separates us? Never to know that she need no longer crush out the love I humbly hope she feels for me from her heart out of filial duty? Why is she never to know what I cannot help thinking will be the best news she ever heard?" said Adam, rising and pacing the little kitchen, his fine eyes flashing as he spoke.

"Because the Rector thinks it would kill her. She is not strong, and could never stand the rough life we lead after her delicate bringing up," said Noah.

"That may be true, but if she is my wife she need never lead it, and I don't see why she should leave the Rectory until she marries, if Mr. Leicester is willing for her to remain."

"He is most willing. I am bound to say that he has considered Grace far more than Eve in the matter."

"Then let me go to him now, Father Noah, and tell him I love her, and have reason to think my love is returned. I know you will not refuse to receive me as a son-in-law, and I can hardly think Mr. Leicester will, if he finds Grace desires it."

Noah was silent for some minutes, and neither his wife nor Adam interrupted his silence, for they knew he was speaking to his Master.

At length he spoke.

"Go, my lad; tell Mr. Leicester all you have told me, and place yourself in his hands. Grace is more his child than mine, though I am her father. I have no right to interfere in the matter."

Later that same evening Adam Day was closeted with Mr. Leicester in the latter's study till the bell rang for evening prayers, when he returned to the ark to say that Grace was to decide his fate, for Mr. Leicester seemed unable to conceive it possible that she cared for him. If she accepted him they were to wait until he was in a position to marry, and till then she was to remain at the Rectory; and the only condition the Rector would impose on Adam was that he did not tell Grace of her parentage until she was his wife, when of course he would be free to use his own discretion. But whether Adam obtained the open scholarship or not, he was to go to college, since Mr. Leicester insisted on lending him the necessary money.

The next morning Mr. Leicester sent for Grace to his study soon after breakfast, a proceeding which in itself prepared her for something unusual, for the only other occasion she could remember since she had grown up, when he had done so, was a year ago, to tell her of a proposal of marriage he had received on her behalf.

"I hope no one else has been so silly," thought Grace to herself as she crossed the hall, never dreaming that someone else had been equally silly, though when she knew who that someone was she would be the last person in the world to condemn his conduct.

"Grace, my child, I had Adam Day here last night, and he told me something which surprised me very much. Can you guess what it was?" began Mr. Leicester, drawing Grace to him.

One glance at her crimson cheeks, which she hastened to hide on Mr. Leicester's shoulder, answered the question more eloquently than words.

"I see you know what he wanted; tell me, my darling, is there any hope for him?"

"No, father," whispered Grace, after a little pause.

"I thought not. I told him I thought it was impossible; I felt sure he was mistaken," exclaimed the Rector triumphantly, for he had yet hardly realised the fact that Grace was no Leicester after all.

"But, father, I don't mean—I think you have misunderstood—I mean—I—I don't know—I can't," stammered Grace, sinking into the chair Mr. Leicester had risen from in his excitement, and hiding her blushing face in her hands.

"You don't mean what? How have I misunderstood you?" said Mr. Leicester, rather sternly, for Grace's confusion irritated him.

But to these questions Grace's answer was to burst into a flood of tears, which brought back all the Rector's tenderness; and inwardly blaming himself for his want of tact in dealing with this, to all intents and purposes, motherless girl, he lifted her up, and drawing her to him put his arm round her waist and stroked her golden hair.

"Tell me all about it, Grace, dear; what is it? Must I tell Adam he is mistaken, and that you don't care for him?"

"No; tell him only it is no use," sobbed Grace.

"But I am afraid that answer won't satisfy Adam; he feels so sure his love is returned. Mayn't I tell him he is wrong?"

"No," whispered Grace.

"Why not?"

"Because it is not true. Oh, father, father, I am so miserable! I shall never love anyone else; don't be angry with me, I could not help it. But of course it can never be. I would never grieve you by marrying beneath me; though it seems to me he is so good and clever, he is fit for a princess. I wish he had not told you; I didn't want you to know."

"Has he ever spoken to you on the subject?"

"No, never; but I have known it for years."

"And how long have you cared for him?"

"A long time; I don't know when it began."

"And you mean to refuse him because you will not marry beneath you?"

"No, father, not quite that; because I could not bear to grieve you for the sake of my own selfish happiness."

"But supposing I were to say it would not grieve me, that I should not think it such an unequal marriage after all, that I have as you know the highest opinion of Adam, of his abilities as well as of his character, that I feel sure in a few years he will be in the position of a gentleman, and able to maintain a wife, even a dainty little wife, like my Grace—what then? Would you be very much surprised?"

"I should indeed, more surprised than I was the day before yesterday, when you told me you had given your consent to Arthur's marriage. Do you really mean it, father?"

"I do; you would have made a very great sacrifice for me, Grace—it is only fair I should make a very slight one for you; all I stipulate is that you are content to stay with me till Adam has taken his degree, and I should prefer that your engagement was not publicly announced till then. And now Adam will be here for his answer this morning. I shall send him to you when he comes, that he may learn how happy he is from you."

And so when Adam arrived, all that Mr. Leicester told him was that Grace knew nothing about her parentage, and was not to be told. But from Grace he learnt that Noah had spoken the truth when he said, "All things were possible with God," for certainly what had seemed to both these lovers as quite impossible, had come to pass, as Grace firmly believed, by a miracle of prayer.

(To be concluded.)

THE SERVICE OF BEAUTY:

PERSONAL BEAUTY.

TS cultivation in personal appearance is another application of beauty to a particular case which is essentially the affair of women, and may not rightly be disregarded. Perhaps my young readers may be inclined to wonder at such a phrase as "the cultivation of personal beauty." They may have been used to suppose that one is born beautiful or the reverse, and that in either case Nature is entirely responsible, and that there is nothing more to be done. I think this view is as limited as though we should hold that babies are born ignorant, and therefore there is nothing more to be done. I hope to show that good looks depend not only on grace of nature, but largely on art also.

Though doubted and denied theoretically, we usually act as though we believed in the desirability of personal beauty. "Beauty is deceitful," is skin-deep, is a snare, we hear from the preachers and moralists; but what beautiful woman does not, openly or secretly, value her beauty as her great, if not her greatest advantage and means of happiness? There is a grain of truth in the satire of the Japanese heroine, exclaiming in her self-admiration, "Nature rejoices in her loveliness. I am a child of Nature, and I take after my mother!" Which of us, not so gifted, would refuse to accept the boon because of its temptations? And we should be perfectly right in accepting the boon and the risk with it. "A woman's glory lies in her attractiveness, as a man's lies in his strength." Far be it from me to undervalue the high qualities of mind and heart, yet I hold that her beauty is by no means the least part of a woman's attractiveness. It blesses where it goes; it is open and patent to all; it needs no interpreter of word and deed; it has a universal magic; not only the lower natures are under its sway, but the good and gifted also; it has appealed more strongly than any form of beauty to the imagination; from time immemorial it has been held worth living and fighting and dying for.

The Greek mother used to pray to Zeus that before all things her child might be beautiful. The Greek believed that physical beauty was a special sign of divine favour. In the age of asceticism, the soul was exalted at the expense of the body; all physical charm and pleasure were counted sinful. The Renaissance brought about a more healthy view; and now it almost seems as though another reaction had set in, and we were in danger of cultivating the mind to the exclusion of the body. Women, especially, in love with their new privileges of education and chances of intellectual expansion, need to be reminded of their ancient privileges, of the grace which cheers and comforts, and their chances of expansion through sweetness into a double life, nobler than the individual.

All honour to the fine intellect and pure soul! but, truly, these are never honoured by the neglect and degradation of physical charm, and its refining, subtle, elevating influence. We all feel this influence; an unerring instinct pays homage to its power. It remains for us not to ignore or deny it, but to measure it, to say how far it shall extend, to turn it to the best use.

It is said that among all nations Englishwomen are the most beautiful. Yet how often do we find them holding this precious gift as though it were to be treated with suspicion as dangerous, or lightly disregarding it as of no solid value! Here we trace a remnant of our old asceticism—another phase of the attempt to crush out the evil in our physical nature by destroying all healthy and wholesome pleasure of the senses, an attempt which inevitably results in a last state worse than the first. How can it be otherwise? God made us as we are—a compound of body, mind, and spirit—and so fitted us for a life, bodily, mental and spiritual. Yet we dare attempt to crush out one part of this complex life.

If we value a simple flower for its beauty as the reflection of its Maker's love, how much more must we value the beauty of the human face and form, the highest type of visible beauty? "To Eve," say the Mahomedans, "God gave two-thirds of all beauty."

Love, here as everywhere, is the law of life. We go wrong in this matter, as in all, through selfishness. We must not value our gift for the pleasure, the happiness, the opportunities which it brings to ourselves alone. We must rejoice in the pleasure it sheds around, with an honest joy free from the uneasiness of personal vanity; we must consecrate it, use it humbly, and remember always that it is one talent more to account for.

There is a sad instance of the selfish, the degraded use to which beauty may be put, and her blessing turned into a curse. It is utterly foreign to the nature of Englishwomen, but it flourishes like a noxious weed in modern society. In the career of the "Professional Beauty," the very name is a reproach to English womanhood—we see how this good and sacred gift may be soiled and perverted to base purposes, used as a key to open forbidden doors, turned into a power for evil to its possessor and all within her reach. This reflection simply strengthens our view of the intrinsic worth of personal beauty: the higher a thing is, the more terrible its abuse.

Now let us see how far we can cultivate physical charm. Very few are strictly beautiful, very few strictly ugly; all the debatable ground that lies between these extremes can be claimed and held by judicious effort. I wish all women would look at such effort in the light of a simple and imperative duty.

Anyone who has not studied the question will be amazed to find what an immense difference, sometimes all the difference between plainness and good looks, results in attention to health, manner, and dress. After all, beauty is never a "fixed quantity." It depends so much on the variable spirit within, on expression, on setting, on an infinite amount of things that change it as we look.

The body is the garment of the soul, a garment that is worn at one time with such dexterous grace and fitness, and again with such awkward uneasiness and ill-adjustment, that we hardly recognise it as the same.

On the point of health I need not dwell, for it is daily coming more to the front, and is advocated by better powers than mine, on graver grounds than that of physical beauty.

Dress occupies much of our time and care, and rightly so; it is only a pity that so much of them is wasted, judging by results. Dress is important, when we recollect how it has become a kind of second self, a kind of outer body which expresses while it conceals the form within. It has to represent or to substitute the invisible beauty of the body; it has to heighten and set off that which is visible.

The failure of Englishwomen to dress well is due either to conventional prejudice, to indifference, or to lack of artistic feeling. Those who really care, labour in vain to look their best, under the notion that every woman must dress alike, contradicted all the time by Nature, who has made no two women alike. Women are so terribly afraid of being "peculiar." Yet it has been affirmed that "the secret of ugliness consists not in irregularity, but in being uninteresting. Let each girl and woman study her own style and complexion, her own good points, and boldly originate the dress which accentuates the best and renders less visible the worst in her physique. Following blindly after fashion leaves us at the mercy of her oracles, the dressmakers, whom we obey, instead of directing, with the worst results to our purses as well as our appearance!"

Some girls, who are not vain, think that the less time and thought they spend on this matter the better. They wear anything that comes in their way, provided it be useful and respectable, and are entirely indifferent to their appearance from the æsthetic point of view. I believe it is no merit, but a fault, to be so careless about the impression we leave on the eye.

But these, after all, are the exceptions. Most women do care how they look; it is more often ignorance than indifference which produces such painful results as we see every day. The instinctive feeling for the right garment, the right colour, the right shape, is not so common with Englishwomen as it is with women of some other races; but what I would insist on is, that this feeling which we characterise as good taste, when not instinctive, can be acquired. We can learn from Nature and the artists, and from those whose dress is always pleasant and harmonious, the how and why of certain combinations and effects. The reform has begun; it is not nearly so difficult now as it was some years ago to wear a dress appropriate and beautiful, without being unpleasantly conspicuous. But much remains to be done. Englishwomen must largely cultivate artistic perception, emancipate themselves from their dressmakers, and respect what God has granted them in good looks enough to care wisely for it, if they would succeed further. And then, when our object is attained, we can fix its limits by remembering that "after a world of pains has been taken with the costume, the least mistake in sentiment may take all the beauty out of your clothes!"

Two golden rules hold good in the matter of dress as in the arrangement of our houses. Here also art is in servitude to utility. No dress can be good which is not thoroughly appropriate to its wearer and to its purpose. Its beauty and grace must grow naturally out of its fitness. Imitation and meaningless ornament must be avoided, and material and workmanship be as good as possible.

Manner is another element of physical beauty too much overlooked. In this I include the management of the body, the art of wearing that garment of the soul to the best advantage. It is no mere dancing mistress's deportment I would recommend, but a grace, instinctive or acquired, of behaviour, an avoidance of everything ungainly, harsh or repellant, a high culture of those subtle perceptions which, being pained by any discord in the impression others make, know how to refrain from creating such discord, whether by appearance, by gesture, or by voice. A large element of the pleasurable impression we make is the effect of true courtesy. The old-fashioned definition of politeness—

"To be polite is to do and say

The kindest thing in the kindest way"—brings this quality very near to the finest graces of the Christian character, and as such it is beneath the notice of no true woman.

"I have seen manners which make a similar impression with personal beauty; that give the like exhilaration, and refresh us like that; and in memorable experiences, they are suddenly better than beauty, and make that superfluous and ugly. But they must be marked by fine perception, by acquaintance with real beauty. They must always show self-control Then they must be inspired by the good heart. There is no beautifier of complexion, of form, or of behaviour, like the wish to scatter joy and not pain around us."

An old man of great culture and experience once said to a younger friend—

"When you come into the room, I think I will study how to make humanity beautiful to you." Surely, this is a fair and noble aim, but there are no golden rules by which it may be attained. Each must study it for himself or herself. "Who dare assume to guide a youth, a maid to perfect manners?" The golden mean is so delicate, so difficult, say frankly unattainable. What finest hands would not be clumsy to sketch the genial precepts of the young girl's demeanour? The chances seem infinite against success; and yet success is continually attained. But Nature lifts her easily over these impossibilities, and we are continually surprised with graces and felicities not only unteachable, but indescribable."

VARIETIES.

ONE ADVANTAGE OF TRAVELLING.—To have travelled has many advantages, and one is, that annoyances and dangers, in recollection, become sources of pleasure; add to which, in the language of scripture, "the affliction is but for a moment," while the recollection endures for years. I advise those who are beginning their travels to bear this in mind.—Walker.

WHAT IS A MILLION YEARS.

The following is one way of conveying to the mind some idea of what a million years really is. Take a narrow slip of paper, an inch broad or more, and eighty-three feet four inches in length, and stretch it along the wall of a large hall, or around the walls of an apartment somewhat over twenty feet square. Recall as many years as you can remember, and then multiply them in imagination by any necessary number so as to get something like an adequate conception of what a period of a hundred years is. Then mark off from one of the ends of the strip one-tenth of an inch.

The one-tenth of the inch will then represent one hundred years, and the entire length of the strip a million of years. It is well worth making this experiment just in order to feel the striking impression that it produces on the mind.

A COURAGEOUS YOUNG WOMAN.

A young woman had laid a wager she would descend into a vault in the middle of the night, and bring from thence a skull. The person who took the wager had previously hid himself in the vault, and as the girl seized a skull, he cried in a hollow voice:—

"Leave me my head!"

"There it is," said the girl, throwing it down and catching up another.

"Leave me my head!" said the same voice.

"No, no," said the heroic lass, "you cannot have had two heads."

And so she brought away the skull and won the wager.

KEEPING A JOURNAL.

This diary is only ruled out for January," said a gentleman in a stationer's shop.

"Yes," replied the stationer, "our experience in the business has taught us that no one ever gets beyond the first month."

ONLY ONE HEAD.

Henry VIII. after the death of Jane Seymour had some difficulty in getting another wife. His first offer was to the Duchess Dowager of Milan, but her answer is said to have been:—

"I have only one head; if I had two, one should certainly be at his service."

HOW TO ESTIMATE HAPPINESS.—To form an estimate of the proportion which one girl's happiness bears to that of another, we must consider the mind that is allotted her with as much attention as the circumstances.

TEN YARDS OF EEL.

A young housekeeper was discussing with her cook the menu for a supper-party. "I think," she said, "we will have some eel for the second course."

"How much will you want, ma'am?" asked the cook.

"I fancy," said her mistress, "ten yards will be sufficient."

WOMAN.

'Tis woman alone, with a purer heart,
Can see all the idols of life depart,
And love the more, and smile and bless Man in his uttermost wretchedness.

THE BUSINESS OF THE POST.—A curious, elaborate, and comprehensive table has recently been compiled by the superintendent of the Foreign Mail Division of the American Post Office. It shows that the total number of letters transported last year in all quarters of the globe was 5,849,000,000, to which may be added about 1,077,000,000 postcards, 4,610,000,000 articles of printed matter, and about 104,000,000 samples, making in all 11,640,000,000 pieces of mail matter handled by the 489,000 officers and employes in the 154,000 post-offices of the world. To every human being there are thus on an average about five letters and postcards yearly.

A MAN'S LIFE SAVED BY CATS.

In the year 1783 two cats belonging to a merchant in Sicily, announced to him the approach of an earthquake. Before the first shock was felt the two animals seemed anxious to work their way through the floor of the room in which they were. Their master, observing their fruitless efforts, opened the door for them. At a second and third door, which they likewise found shut, they repeated their efforts, and on being set completely at liberty, they ran straight through the street and out of the gate of the town.

The merchant, whose curiosity was excited by this strange conduct, followed them into the fields, where he again saw the cats scratching and burrowing in the earth. Soon after there was a violent shock of an earthquake, and many of the houses in the city fell down, of which the merchant's house was one, so that he was indebted for his life to the singular forebodings of his cats.

A DEFINITION.—"What you please," means, in many cases, "I expect much more than I can in reason ask for."

A VALUABLE WATCH.—There is a girl who boasts of having a watch that keeps correct time. She was heard to remark not long ago as she pulled it out, "If the sun isn't over the hill in a minute and a half he will be late."

THE MILLER'S SERVANT AND THE MAD DOG.

A miller's dog having broken his chain, the miller ordered his servant to tie him up again. She was attacked and bitten by the dog. On hearing her cries, the miller and his people ran to her assistance.

"Keep off," said she, shutting the door. "The dog is mad; I am already bitten, and must chain him up alone."

Notwithstanding his biting, she did not let him go, but chained him up, and then retired to her room, and with the noblest resignation prepared herself to die. Symptoms of hydrophobia soon broke out, and she died in a few days.

GOOD CHARACTER.—What we call the sterner virtues alone cannot make a good character. The woman of integrity who is cold, or hard, or unamiable is as far from moral goodness as she is from moral beauty. She who prides herself on being righteous and forgets to be kind is not truly righteous.

AN ODD MARRIAGE.

Many years ago, a gentleman whose first wife was dead rose one morning with the whimsical resolution of marrying any one of his maidservants who should first appear on his ringing the bell. He rang, and the chambermaid came up, to whom he abruptly said—

"Get yourself ready, and go with me to be married."

The girl, treating the affair as a joke, refused, and withdrew.

He rang the bell a second time, when the cook appeared, to whom he said—

"Well, my girl, I intend this day to make you my wife; go and dress yourself in the best you have, and order the coach to be got ready immediately."

She took him at his word, dressed herself, and on coming downstairs was met by the chambermaid, who asked her—

"Where are you going?"

"Abroad," she said; "I have my master's leave."

She had scarce uttered the words when her master came down, and took her by the hand to the carriage, which drove to St. Benet's Church, in London, where they were married. The union, it is said, was singularly happy.

THE MYSTERY OF LIFE.

Spreads life's true mystery round us evermore;
Seen by no eye, it lies all eyes before.

THE CAMPO SANTO AT PISA.

THE "Campo Santo," or the "Holy Field," once a cemetery, though no longer used as such, is an open space of about four hundred feet in length and one hundred and eighteen feet in breadth, enclosed with high walls, and an arcade, something like the cloisters of a monastery or cathedral, running all round it.

On the east side is a large chapel, and on the north two smaller chapels, where prayers and masses are celebrated for the "repose of the dead."

The open space was filled with earth brought from the Holy Land in the time of the Crusades. The Archbishop Ubaldo, on his retreat from Palestine in 1190, returned with his fifty-three vessels laden with earth from Calvary, whence this spot where the earth was deposited was named the Campo Santo, the "Holy Field."

The space once sown with graves is now covered with green turf. At the four corners are four tall cypress trees, their dark, monumental, spiral forms contrasting with a little lowly cross in the centre, round which ivy or some other creeping plant has wound a luxuriant bower.

The beautiful Gothic arcade was designed and built about 1283 by Giovanni Pisano, son of the great Nicola Pisano.

This arcade, on the side next the burial-ground, is pierced by sixty-two windows of elegant tracery, divided from each other by slender pilasters. Upwards of six hundred sepulchral monuments of the nobles and citizens of Pisa are ranged along the marble pavements, and mingled with them are some antique remains of great beauty brought from Greece.

Here also is seen the famous sarcophagus (of Greek workmanship) which first inspired the genius of Nicola Pisano, and in which had been deposited the body of Beatrice, mother of the famous Countess Matilda.

The walls opposite to the windows were painted in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries with scriptural subjects. Most of these are half ruined by time, neglect, and damp; the best preserved are faded, discoloured, ghastly in appearance, and solemn in subject.

The whole aspect of this singular place, particularly to those who wander through its long arcades at the close of day, when the figures on the pictured walls look dim and spectral through the gloom, and the cypresses assume a blacker hue, and all the associations connected with its sacred purpose and its history rise upon the fancy, has, in its silence and solitude and religious destination, something inexpressibly strange, dreamy, solemn, almost awful. Seen in the broad glare of noonday, the place and the pictures lose something of their power over the fancy, and that which last night haunted us as a vision, by day we examine, study, criticise.

The building of the Campo Santo was scarcely finished when the best painters of the time were summoned to paint the walls all round the interior with appropriate subjects. This was a work of many years—it was, indeed, continued at intervals through two centuries—and thus we have a series of illustrations of the progress of art during its first development of the religious influences of the age, and even of the habits and manners of the people, which are faithfully exhibited in some of these most extraordinary compositions.

The earliest of these is a series of subjects from the Book of Job, painted in the time of Giotto (circa 1300), and popularly ascribed to that great reformer of painting. Next in date follow subjects of extraordinary power and originality, long ascribed to Andrea Orcagna. These were to represent what the Italians call "I quattro novissimi" (the last or latest things)—Death, Judgment, Hell or Purgatory, and Paradise. Three only were completed. These subjects harmonised peculiarly with the sacred precincts for which they were designed.

We are bound to add that these powerful works, which have always hitherto been associated with the name of Andrea Orcagna, are now supposed by Mr. Poynter, R.A., to have been painted by two artists of Sienna, the brothers Ambrogio and Pietro Lorenzetti; while the same learned authority disputes Giotto's hand in the "Sufferings of Job," and ascribes this latter work to Francesca da Volterra, a contemporary painter.

Other subjects by other artists follow, until we arrive at twenty-one magnificent frescoes from the Old Testament history by Benozzo Gozzoli, of Florence. These were painted between 1469 and 1476. The good people of Pisa showed their appreciation of these beautiful works by the present of a tomb in the sacred ground to the painter.

Among the tombs and sarcophagi which line the lower part of the walls and cover the floor, inscribed to nobles and merchant princes of Pisa, we may still find the one with its old Latin inscription: "Hic tumulus est Benotti Florentini qui proximè has pinxit historias. Hunc sibi Pisanorum donavit humanitas. MCCCCLXXVIII." ("This is the tomb of Benozzo of Florence, who painted these nearest histories. The gratitude of the Pisans gave it to him in 1478.")

If it strikes us as a somewhat odd present to give a tomb to one who was still living, we must reflect that, according to the popular superstition of the day, burial in that sacred earth afforded a sure passport to Heaven. It were then a priceless gift, indeed!—(Account of the Campo Santo of Pisa, taken partly from "Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters," by Mrs. Jameson.)

PISAN LEGEND.

Pico della Mirandola, a scholar and philosopher of the fifteenth century, tells us that "when the shipload of sacred earth was mingled with the common clay in the Campo Santo of Pisa, a new flower grew up from it, unlike any flower men had seen before—the anémone, with its concentric rings of strangely-blended colour, still to be found by those who search long enough for it in the long grass of the Maremma."

Since the days of the above-named learned writer, the pretty flower he names has become one of the commonest of the wild flowers, not of the "Holy Field" of Pisa alone, but over all Italy. It now requires but little searching to find handfuls of its pale purple flowers in the Italian fields from north to south. On the ruins on the Palatine Hill in Rome, the little wild flower that came in the sacred earth from Palestine in the eleventh century survives the grandeur of the Cæsars, and flourishes amid the ruins of temples and imperial palaces. Nice and Cannes cultivate rare varieties of this pretty flower, which they send in quantities in the spring to the London market; while in England we know and treasure among our wild flowers a pale and small variety, which in country places we call by its literal Greek name, the wind flower (anémone), little thinking from whence this travelled stranger had originally sprung.

THE CAMPO SANTO, PISA.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"FAREWELL, NIGHT!"

HE journey seemed endless to Bessie, but she restrained her painful restlessness for Tom's sake. Tom was very kind after his own fashion; he got her some tea at Paddington, and was very attentive to her comfort, and every now and then he gave utterance to a few remarks, bidding her keep up her heart like a brave little woman. "While there is life there is hope," you know, Bessie," he said. "I think my father takes too dark a view of the case; but then, you see, Hatty is his own child. I don't believe she is as bad as all that; depend upon it, she will take a good turn yet."

"Don't let us talk about it, Tom," pleaded Bessie, with a sick, wretched feeling that Tom's boyish testimony was not very reliable. How she wished he would be silent; but in a few minutes he was back again on the same subject, with another homely axiom for Bessie's comfort. But the longest day must have an end, and at last they reached Cliffe. No one met them at the station, but Tom assured her that he never expected to be met; he put Bessie into a fly, and again there was need for patience as the horse toiled slowly up the steep road. It was long past nine when they reached the house, and by that time Bessie's overwrought feelings bordered on nervous irritability. The door opened as the fly stopped, and by the hall lamp she saw her mother's face, looking paler and sadder, but her voice was as quiet and gentle as ever.

"Is that you, Bessie? My dear child, how tired you must be!"

"Oh, mother, mother!" and now Bessie literally fell on her mother's neck and wept. Mrs. Lambert seemed to understand all about it; she made her sit down on the couch, and took off her hat, and smoothed her hair with caressing fingers.

"You have had a long day, and have been keeping up as well as you could; don't be afraid of giving way a little, now you are with your own mother," she said, tenderly.

"Oh, mother, you are such a comfort! but I must not trouble you like this, and I am keeping you from Hatty."

"Hatty is asleep," replied her mother, quietly. "Christine is with her; you must come into the dining-room with me, and have something to eat and drink before you go upstairs;" but Bessie detained her.

"Wait a moment, mother darling; Tom is there, and I want to speak to you alone. What does father really think of Hatty?"

"He thinks her very ill," was the sorrowful answer; "it seems a sudden failure; she was much as usual until the warm weather came, and then one evening she complained of palpitation and faintness, and the next day she seemed very weak, and so it has gone on. Your father says he was always afraid there was latent mischief, but I think he hardly expected it would be like this. There was a consultation this morning, but they say there is no rallying power, and another attack may carry her off."

"Oh, mother, if I had only stayed at home!"

"Don't say that, Bessie; you must not even think it; no care on your part could have prevented this. Hatty seemed as well as usual for a week or two after you left, and none of us suspected anything. You are very good not to reproach us for not sending for you before, but Hatty prevented us; she would not have your pleasure spoiled, and it was only last night that your father looked so grave, and said Tom had better fetch you."

"But is there no hope—no hope at all, mother?"

"I dare not ask the question," and here Mrs. Lambert's eyes filled with tears. "Your father looks so harassed. Dr. Morton said she might go on like this for a long time, getting weaker and weaker, or it might be sudden. Dear little Hatty is so good and patient, and gives us no trouble. Now you must not talk any more, and you must be a good child and take your supper; we all need to keep up our strength. I will leave Tom to take care of you, while I go up to Hatty."

Bessie did as she was told, and Ella and Katie waited on her, and then she went up to her own room, and stayed there until Christine came to fetch her.

"Hatty is awake now, Bessie, and she is asking for you, and mother has gone downstairs to speak to father."

"Thank you, Chrissy dear, I will go to her at once," and Bessie went hurriedly across the passage. Hatty lay on her little bed with her eyes closed. As she opened them a sudden sweet smile came over her face, and she held out her arms to Bessie.

"My own Betty, is it really you?"

"Yes, it is really I," returned Bessie, trying to speak brightly; but how her heart sank as she looked at her sister! There was no need to tell her Hatty was very ill; the life was flickering in the feeble body, the mysterious wasting disease had made rapid strides, even in these few days. "Oh, Hatty, darling, to find you like this! Why—why did you not let them send for me? You wanted me, I am sure you wanted me."

"Why of course I wanted you," returned Hatty, in a weak, happy voice, "and that is just why I would not let them send. You know how unhappy I have always been because of my horrid selfishness, and I did want to be good for once, and I said to myself when Mrs. Sefton's letter came, 'Bessie shall not know how poorly I feel, nor what strange suffocating feelings I have sometimes. I won't try to get my own way this time, she shall be happy a little longer.'"

"Oh, Hatty! as though I cared for any happiness without you!"

"You must not say that, Bessie dear," replied Hatty, stroking her sister's hand; "and yet it seems nice to hear you say so. Do you recollect what I used to say—that it would take very little to kill me, because I was so weak? Well, I think it is coming true."

"Don't talk so, Hatty; I can't bear it. I feel as if I want to lie down there in your stead."

But Hatty shook her head.

"No, darling, no; that would not do at all. You are so strong and full of life, and people could not spare you. It does not matter for a weakly little creature like myself. I have never been strong enough to enjoy anything. I have just been little 'Miss Much Afraid,' full of troublesome fears and fancies; but they seem gone somehow."

"I am so glad, my Hatty; but ought you to talk?"

"Yes, when I feel like this. Oh, I am so comfortable, and it is so nice to have you with me again. What talks we will have! Yes, I don't feel like dying yet. Oh, there's mother, and she is going to send you away."

"Yes, for to-night, love. Bessie is tired, and it is not good for you to talk so much. Bessie shall be head nurse to-morrow, if she likes, but father says she is to go to bed now."

"Very well, mother," replied Hatty, meekly. "Bid me good-night, Bessie. I don't mean to be selfish ever again." And as Bessie kissed her without speaking and moved away, she said to herself, "It was Bessie that always helped me to be good; but by-and-by it will be the blessed angels. Oh, how nice that will be!"

Bessie's life was changed indeed from this day. No more thoughtless, merry hours, no more rides and drives, and pleasant musical evenings. Her days were passed in a sick room, and from hour to hour she seemed only to live on Hatty's looks and words. Bessie had for many years been her mother's right hand, and now she shared her watch beside the sick bed. Her bright, healthy colour began to fade from fatigue and anxiety, and it needed her father's stringent orders to induce her to take needful rest and exercise. For the first time in her life Bessie found it difficult to submit, and she had to fight more than one battle with herself before she yielded. More than once her mother remonstrated with her, tenderly but firmly.

"Bessie, dear," she said once; "this may be a long illness, and it is your duty to husband your strength most carefully. You are looking pale from confinement to the house and want of exercise. You know your father insists that Christine should relieve you for two hours in the afternoon."

"Yes, mother; and of course father is thinking of me; but what does it matter if I look a little pale. I cannot bear to lose an hour of Hatty's company when—when—" but Bessie could not finish her sentence.

"My dear, the feeling is natural; but don't you think Chrissy likes to have her to herself sometimes? We all love Hatty; you must remember that."

"Oh, mother, how selfish I am after all! I see what you mean. I want to monopolise Hatty, and I grudge her to everyone else—even to you and Chrissy. I never knew I could be so horrid; but I see even trouble has its temptations."

"Indeed it has, Bessie; but I will not have you say such hard things about yourself. You are our dear child, and our greatest comfort, and I do not know what your father and I would do without you. Don't fret any more, darling; go out with Katie, and get a little turn in the woods, and come back fresh for the evening work."

Mrs. Lambert's words were not thrown away. Bessie's sweet, reasonable nature was easily guided; her passionate love for Hatty had blinded her to her own selfishness, but now her eyes were open. The mother's heart was often touched by the cheerful alacrity with which Bessie would yield her place to Christine. Even Hatty's plaintive, "Oh, must you go, Bessie?" seemed to make no impression; but how long those two hours seemed!

Bessie did not forget her friends in her trouble; she sent frequent notes to Edna, and heard often from her in return. Now and then a kind message came from Richard, and every week a hamper filled with farm produce and fruit and flowers was sent from the Grange. Hatty used to revel in those flowers; she liked to arrange them herself, and would sit pilloved up on her bed or couch, and fill the vases with slow, tremulous fingers.

"Doesn't the room look lovely?" she would say, in a tone of intense satisfaction. When her weakness permitted she loved to talk to Bessie about her friends at the Grange, and was never weary of listening to Bessie's descriptions.

"What a nice man Mr. Richard must be, Betty!" she would say. "I should like to see him." And she often harped on this theme, and questioned Bessie closely on this subject; but often their talk went deeper than this.

One evening, about five weeks after Bessie's return, she was alone with Hatty; she had been reading to her, and now Hatty asked her to put down the book.

"Yes, it is very nice, but I feel inclined to talk. Come and lie on the bed, Bessie, and let us have one of our old cosy talks. Put your head down on the pillow beside me. Yes, that is how I mean; isn't that comfortable! I always did like you to put your arm round me. How strong and firm your hand feels! Look at the difference." And Hatty laid her wasted transparent fingers on Bessie's pink palm.

"Poor little Hatty!"

"No, I am not poor a bit now; you must not call me that; I don't think I have ever been so happy in my life. Everyone is so kind to me—even Tom—he never finds fault with me now."

"We are all so sorry for you."

"Yes; but you must not be too sorry. Somehow I am glad of this illness, because it makes you all think better of me. You will not remember how how cross and jealous and selfish I used to be. You will only say, 'Poor little thing, she always wanted to be good, even when she was most naughty and troublesome.'"

"Don't, Hatty; I can't bear to hear you."

"Yes, let me say it, please; it seems to do me good. How often you have helped me over my difficulties. 'If I could only tell Bessie,' that was what I used to say. I am glad you went away and gave me something to bear. I used to be glad every night when I said my prayers; it was something to do for you, and something to bear for His sake." And Hatty dropped her voice reverently, for she was speaking of the Lord Jesus.

"Yes, darling, I see what you mean."

"I am glad that it has not been too easy, and that I have really tried for once not to be selfish. I don't want to get well, Bessie. I should have all the old, miserable feelings over again. I have been little 'Miss Much Afraid' all my life, and the fears have been a part of me. Do you recollect what Bunyan said about Much Afraid? 'She went through the river singing'; that was because she had left all her fears and troubles on the bank."

"And you are not afraid to die, Hatty?"

"No, not really afraid. Sometimes in the night, when I lie awake with that strange oppression, I think how strange it will be without you all, and to have only the angels to talk to me. But I suppose I shall get used to it. I always say that psalm over to myself, and then the queer feeling leaves me. Don't you know? 'He shall give His angels charge over thee, and they shall bear thee upon their arms.' That verse gives one such a restful feeling; just as though one were a little child again."

"Dear Hatty, it does me good to hear you; but you must not talk any more, your voice is so weak. Let me repeat one of your favourite hymns, and then perhaps you will get drowsy." And then Hatty consented to be silent.

After all the end came very suddenly, just when it was least expected. Hatty had seemed better that day; there was a strange flicker of life and energy; she had talked much to her mother and Bessie, and had sent a loving, playful message to Tom, who was away from home. It had been her father's custom to take the early part of the night watch, and then to summon one of the others to relieve him. He had persisted in this, in spite of long, laborious days. Hatty was very dear to her father's heart, and he loved those quiet hours beside her.

Bessie had retired to bed early, as it was her turn to be roused, but long before the usual hour her mother was beside her.

"Come, my child, come; do not wait to dress, Hatty is going home fast."

One startled, non-comprehending look, and then the truth rushed on Bessie, and she threw on her dressing-gown and hurried to the sick room.

"Going home fast!" nay, she had gone; the last sigh was breathed as Bessie crossed the threshold. "Thank God, she has not suffered," murmured her father. Bessie heard him as she flung herself down beside Hatty. There had been no pain, no struggle; a sudden change, a few short sighs, and Hatty had crossed the river. How peaceful and happy she looked in her last sleep—the sweet, deep sleep that knows no awaking! An innocent smile seemed to linger on her face. Never more would Hatty mourn over her faults and shortcomings; never more would morbid fears torment and harass her weary mind; never more would she plead for forgiveness, nor falter underneath her life's burthen, for, as Maguire says, "To those doubting ones earth was a night season of gloom and darkness, and in the borderland they saw the dawn of day; and when the summons comes, they are glad to bid farewell to the night that is past, and to welcome with joy and singing the eternal day, whose rising shall know no sunset."

Many and many a time during that mourning week did Bessie, spent and weary with weeping, recall those words that her darling had uttered, "I don't want to get well, Bessie; I should have all the old miserable feelings over again." And even in her desolation Bessie would not have called her back.

"My Hatty has gone," she wrote to Edna, in those first days of her loss. "I shall never see her sweet face again, until we meet in Paradise. I shall never hear her loving voice; but for her own sake I cannot wish her back. Her life was not a happy one; no one could make it happy, it was shadowed by physical depression. She had much to bear, and it was not always easy to understand her; it was difficult for her to give expression to the nameless fears, and the strange, morbid feelings that made life so difficult. She loved us all so much, but even her love made her wretched, for a careless word or a thoughtless speech rankled in her mind for days, and it was not easy to extract the sting; she was too sensitive, too highly organised for daily life; she made herself miserable about trifles. I know she could not help it, poor darling, and father says so too. Oh, how I miss her! but God only knows that, and I daresay He will comfort me in His own good time. Mother is ill; she is never strong, and the nursing and grief have broken her down, so we must all think of her. Pray for us all, dear Edna, for these are sorrowful days. I do not forget you, but I seem to look at you through the mist of years; still, I am always your loving friend,

WORK.

REDUCED.—We give each month all the information we can afford space for on dress-making and millinery. You can gather anything else from seeing the bonnets people wear, or looking into the shop windows, if you have any taste for millinery. But taste is very needful indeed. 2. Black straw can be renovated by using any of the "glosses" that are sold for shoes, or else with a wash of thin gum-arabic.

X. Y. Z.—We see no reason why a jersey should not be worn as a bodice to your wedding dress. There are so many styles now, and some very pretty ones.

ELLEN, BIRDIE, and ANNIE must write to Mr. Tarn, Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row, E.C., and say what numbers they require of the book, enclosing stamps for payment.

MAY.—Take one gallon of tepid water and add half a gill of gall to it. Apply to the carpet with a clean brush, and wash the lather off with clean water and a clean cloth, rubbing with a dry one. Do a small portion of the carpet at a time, and do not make it too wet. The gall may be obtained from any butcher, but you are usually required to give notice a few days before, and to take a bottle with you in which to put it.

COOKERY.

A CORRESPONDENT sends the following recipe for making marmalade, of which she says, "You will never make it another way if you try it." Take of Seville oranges, nine; of sweet ones, three; of lemons, three (or half quantities). Cut the Seville oranges, after peeling them, into thin slices cutting them across, not lengthwise with the stem, and cut the peel into narrow strips. Peel the sweet ones, throwing away the peel, and cut them up; peel the lemons, having previously taken out the seeds. Weigh all, and add three pints of water for each pound of the fruit; let it stand for twenty-four hours; boil till tender, which will take two hours. Third day weigh the pulp, and add either a quarter or half pound of sugar to each of pulp—according to taste—and boil until the chips be transparent, say about an hour, and the marmalade will be made.

FLORA K. W.—We are very glad that our article, "Sixty Pounds per Annum," and our dress articles have been so helpful to you and yours. We gladly give your recipe for dressing haricot beans. Soak the beans (during a whole night), boil without salt till soft, add salt, and boil for a few minutes; drain off, and keep the water. Fry a sliced onion in one ounce of butter; when quite brown stir in half a tablespoonful of flour. Let that brown also; add half a pint of the bean water, stirring all the time.

Let it boil, add pepper and chopped parsley and sweet herbs; pour all over the beans, or serve separately, as brown gravy. The bean water may be made into white sauce with butter, flour and milk, and is very nutritious. We think that the addition of the onion would render the beans unattractive to many.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ROBIN.—Victor Marie Hugo, the French poet, dramatist, and novelist, was born February 26th, 1802, and was raised to be a Peer, with the title of Vicomte, by Louis Philippe, April, 1845. He was a very eccentric character, as his house in Guernsey demonstrated. He not only decorated the walls with china plates, but covered some of the ceilings with whole dinner services; and all the balusters of the staircase, as well as the walls, were covered with rugs and carpets. In his own private study at the top of the house there were only two pictures—one was his own likeness and the other a man hanging on a gibbet!

ROSE.—Domestic service is open to young women well trained in any of its branches; but they are not at all likely to find situations as governesses, either in the Dominion of Canada or in the United States of America.

EVA HOPE.—The signification of the two Hebrew words applying to the sacred breastplate worn by the Jewish High Priest, i.e., Urim and Thummim, mean respectively "light" and "perfection." There is great mystery attached to this medium of Divine communication between God and His consecrated servant the High Priest. On his breast the twelve tribes of Israel were represented, borne as it were on his heart, when he approached his Divine Master in prayer, and when he "inquired of the Lord" concerning them on difficult occasions. But this was only when supreme wisdom was needed in their behalf for the guidance of the king, the president of the Sanhedrim, or general commanding their army. 2. To be sure of getting rid of vermin in vegetables you should not only wash them in salt and water, but a piece of soda should be put into a teacupful of water, of about the size of a walnut, and after soaking them a short time in this bath every grub will come out.

E. Z.—We should think that such a home might be found in the country by advertisement, as there are many people who would like to add to their income in that way.

NEW SUBSCRIBER, DUBLIN MAIDEN.—Apply at the Rotunda for all such information. You should learn to spell and write grammatically. You mix up the present and past tenses of your verbs.

SCAMP.—Apply to the secretary of the Royal Academy of Music, John Gill, Esq. (fee £1 1s. per subject), 4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, W. There is an entrance fee of £5 ss. Fees per term £11 11s. There are three terms in the year.

NELLIE (Jamaica).—We had nothing to pay, we believe, for the parcel. You have our affectionate sympathy in your recent great trial, but we are thankful you see God's hand in it all, and to know that "He doeth all things well."

A LEARNER.—The best way to make a paper pillow is to cut the paper in long, very narrow strips, and curl them with a penknife. Only notepaper should be used.

ZITTIE.—The word "crystal" is from the Latin crystallum, from a Greek word meaning ice, cold, frost, crystal. The dictionary gives four meanings, but if you wish to study the scientific one, you had better get some standard treatise on mineralogy, as the subject is very interesting from a geometrical point of view, and crystals are arranged in classes or systems. The glass of a watch is called "a crystal," also a species of glass more perfect in its composition than ordinary glass. The word "crystal" is also applied as a descriptive term to anything clear which resembles it, such as water. Dryden speaks of "the crystal streams that murmur through the meads." Crystal given as a woman's name means clear, lucid, transparent, crystalline.

BLANCHETTE and PENELOPE.—The peeling of the lower lip in large flakes has, we believe, something to do with the digestion. You had better consult a doctor. A good lip-salve might help you, bought of a chemist who makes it himself.

MRS. A. WATSON.—Your work is a truly good one, and we are glad to read in your printed account of it that there are now upwards of thirty "Snowdrop Bands," and that the members include all classes. For the promotion of the work amongst "Our Girls," we give the inscription which each member writes on a book presented to her: "We, the members of the 'Snowdrop Band,' sign our names to show that we have agreed that, wherever we are, and in whatever company, we will with God's help earnestly try, both by our example and influence, to discourage all wrong conversation, light and unmodest conduct, and the reading of foolish and bad books."

MISS POLHILL-TURNER.—Your missionary society, called the Willing Hands Society (specially for the benefit of Chinese missions), deserves to be noticed in this magazine. Each member must contribute four articles yearly, painting, work, etc., and a (minimum) subscription of 1s. per annum, paid in advance to the treasurer, Miss Bancroft, 7, Rothesay Gardens, Bedford. The proceeds of the annual sale of articles sent in by members are equally divided between the Church Missionary Society and China Inland Mission, to be used for evangelistic work in China only.

IDA VILLIERS.—It is not often that we are asked to help thin people to get fat; it is generally the other way. First, we should advise you to sit down and be quite tranquil for at least half an hour after your meals, and to cherish a thankful, unrepining, loving spirit; and get all the sleep possible. Eat butter, fat meats; take cream, milk, cocoa, chocolate, bread, potatoes, peas, parsnips, carrots, beetroots, and all farinaceous foods; pastry, custards, and sugar. Avoid acids, and do not tire yourself with exercise. You must remember, however, that the very slightest thinnest people often become the stoutest in middle life.

R. C. R. kindly writes to say that when sponges have become slimy in the winter season, they may be cured by putting them outside a window in a hard frost till they are frozen to the centre. When thawed they will be found quite right again.

TOO UTTERLY TOO-TOO does not mention the colour of her hat. If black, perhaps a little gum arabic would restore it.

NOAH'S ARK.

By DARLEY
DALE.

CHAPTER XX. CONCLUSION.

THE autumn passed away without anything else happening to disturb the monotony of the broads; the usual floods, with an occasional salt tide, very destructive to the fish, grand sunsets, gales in which now and then some poplars were felled, were the chief incidents. Noah shot teal and snipe, worked his decoy very successfully, and cut reeds when he was not occupied in fishing; Adam was at college; Arthur and Eve abroad, exceedingly happy; Grace brighter and happier and better in health than she had ever been, and very much amused at the correspondence which went on between her father and Eve, for Arthur deputed his wife to do all his letter-writing. Mrs. Oldman alone was not well; she seemed quite unable to regain her strength after all she had gone through while nursing Eve, and the subsequent excitement seemed to have told upon her, the least thing exhausted her, and Noah found he was obliged to do all the hard work of the house for her or pay a woman to do it; she never complained, but it was evident to everyone she was far from well. The villagers said she missed her granddaughter, and if Eve had not married a gentleman, but had been contented with a broadman for her husband, her mother would not ail anything, and to outsiders it did seem that Mrs. Oldman felt Eve's absence more than Noah.

But the fact was that Noah had long learnt the truth of those words of Dante, "In la sua volentade e nostra pace," though he knew them only in the English version:

"In His will is our peace."

He knew them also by experience, and though he missed Eve terribly, the joy he felt in accepting God's will was greater even than the joy of her presence, and the tears that sometimes ran down his cheeks as he sat in the silence of the night-watches, listening for wherries, were happy tears.

The same could not be said for the tears Mrs. Oldman shed by day and by night; but it was Grace and not Eve that her soul yearned after. She felt that her sin against Eve had been expiated since she had married a gentleman; but she had deprived her own flesh and blood of a mother's love and care, and for this she could never atone; for not all the advantages of position and education which Grace enjoyed could make up for this. And now in the evening of her life she hungered for a daughter's love. Eve, had she been still at home, could not have satisfied this craving, only Grace could do that; and between her and Grace what a sea of separation lay! Not even the supposed fact that she was her own child's foster-mother bridged it over; though it was a thing Grace never forgot, and never omitted to pay at least one visit a week to the ark. Indeed, since Eve's marriage she had been more frequently, and a sense of duty forced Mr. Leicester to encourage these visits.

It was an early winter that year, and before Christmas the broads were a sheet of ice, and the skating was first-rate, for it was possible to go for miles on the frozen waters. Filton Broad, however, was the favourite place for the gentlefolk of the neighbourhood to meet and form quadrilles on the ice. A few days before Christmas Mrs. Oldman, knowing Adam Day was at the Rectory, thought she would go and look at the skaters, knowing that both Grace and Adam would be there. Accordingly she wrapped herself up, and set off to walk across the fields to the head of Muck Fleet, where, as she knew, she could get a good view of them. There, as she expected, she saw Grace, handsomely dressed in a long sealskin jacket, with hat and muff to match, the prettiest and the best-dressed girl on the ice, skating gracefully about with a gentleman whom Mrs. Oldman recognised as Lord Norwich, who was reported to admire her exceedingly. Mrs. Oldman stood and watched the scene for some time, but she had no eyes for anyone but that fair, gentle girl who seemed to be the centre of attraction on the ice, and never before had she realised how great was the gulf between her and her child.

It was very cold, but she seemed unable to tear herself away, though it was torture to her to remain. Once Grace and her companion skated past her near enough for her to hear Lord Norwich remark—

"Look at that poor old woman watching us; how cold she looks!" but they were out of earshot before Grace, who had not noticed her, answered.

It was a relief to the poor breaking heart when Adam Day took Lord Norwich's place; he seemed a link between her and her child, though well as she knew him, she would have cut off her right hand sooner than claim acquaintance with him when he was among gentlefolks.

But the short December day began to wane, and, chilled to the very marrow, she turned from the broad and set her steps towards the ark. She was numb and faint with cold when she reached it, and too much exhausted to make up the fire, which was getting low, or to get herself some hot tea. Luckily Noah came in soon after, and finding how ill she seemed, gave her a dose of hot cordial and water, but the remedy was too late. She had taken a severe chill, and was so ill the next day that Noah sent for the doctor. At first he was not alarmed, though he insisted on her spending Christmas Day in bed; but the day after Christmas Day he shook his head, and told Noah there was very little hope, the end was very near; she had been failing for months, and in her weak state this chill would prove fatal.

Noah sent at once to the Rectory to tell Mr. Leicester of his new trouble, and he came almost immediately, bringing Grace with him. At the sight of her, Mrs. Oldman, who had been lying apparently unconscious for some hours, roused herself to say, with a smile, "Kiss me, my child, before I die."

Grace bent over her and kissed her tenderly, and then some impulse moved her to say—

"Mother, I will stay with you to-night if you like;" and the look of unutterable joy which lightened the features of the dying woman more than repaid her.

Grace often called Noah Father Noah, but her foster-mother had always been Mrs. Oldman to her; and now she could not have told what sudden inspiration moved her to use the one word those ears so soon to close on all earthly sounds were aching to hear; she felt in some vague way that she must try and take Eve's place since she was away, and perhaps it was this thought which prompted her; and then she sat on one side of the bed, and Noah on the other, each holding one of the dying woman's hands until the end came. Her watch did not last very long; before midnight Noah was a widower, and Adam, who was sitting up in the kitchen in case anything was needed, took her home.

* * * * *

It is three years now since Eve was married; it is summer again, and again almost the same figures are grouped round the little altar for another wedding. Mr. Leicester, as before, is the officiating minister; Noah, still in his broadman's dress, but with a band of crape round one of his blue jersey sleeves, which he will always wear, gives away the bride, as he did on the former occasion; but the position of the two girls is reversed to-day. Grace, robed in a costly white dress with a long lace veil and wreath of orange blossom, is the bride, and behind her stands Eve, in a still more costly dress of pearl-grey silk, relieved with ruby velvet, looking prettier than ever. The bridegroom is, of course, Adam Day, and by his side is Arthur Clifford, as handsome as ever. There are no other guests, though the church is crowded with spectators, foremost among whom is a lovely boy of two years old, whose nurse only restrains him by main force from rushing into his supposed grandfather Noah's arms, where he is accustomed to spend the greater part of his day while visiting in Windham. For Eve is not one whit spoiled by her marriage, but runs in and out of the ark as if it were still her home, and kisses Noah, and tells her boy if he does not think his grandfather the best man in the world he is no son of hers.

But the secret of Eve's parentage is to be concealed no longer. When the service is over Mr. Leicester and Noah have agreed to yield to Adam's wishes, and let the truth be known before the register is signed. So when the vestry door is closed, and Grace is ready, pen in hand, to sign her name, Mr. Leicester put his arm round her, to the detriment of her lace, and said—

"Wait one moment, my darling; you do not know how to sign it. Arthur, Eve, and Grace, I have some news to tell you, which intimately concerns you all three, and which perhaps will explain the apparent inconsistency of my conduct, when three years ago I so suddenly gave my consent to Arthur's marriage with Eve."

"And also your consent to my marriage with Grace," interrupted Adam.

"I am not so sure of that, Adam; I think under any circumstances I should have consented to that, had I been consulted. The fact is, my children—for you are all my children—Arthur I have always looked upon as a son, Grace as a most dutiful daughter, while after all Eve has the best right to call me father, for Eve is my real daughter, changed by poor Mrs. Oldman when a baby with Grace, who was her own child. It is true, incredible as it must seem to you all; Mrs. Oldman confessed the truth in order to induce Noah and me to consent to Eve's marriage, and Adam guessed it as he watched her wedding, and it is by his wish that I now reveal the secret to you."

While Mr. Leicester was speaking he kept his arm round Grace, as though declaring his intention of not letting her slip from him, though no daughter of his; and Eve quietly moved to Noah's side, and slipping her little hand through his arm, laid her soft cheek against the rough crape band which bound it, and whispered—

"I don't believe a word of it, father,"

"It is true, my little one," said Noah aloud, sadly.

"True or not, you are my own dear father, and nobody shall take you away from me," said Eve aloud, with a jealous look at Grace, who would fain have clung to Mr. Leicester; but Adam drew her arm through his, and leading her to Noah said—

"Give us your blessing, Father Noah; your heart's desire has been granted you, for I am really your son now." And Noah drew the arm Eve held gently away, that he might lay his hands on the heads of Adam and Grace while he blessed them solemnly, and then he stooped and kissed Grace's forehead; meanwhile

Mr. Leicester crossed the little vestry to Eve, and, taking her hands in his, embraced her, saying—

"I think I must ask for a corner in my own daughter's heart, after all."

"Yes," said Eve, simply, "I am very fond of you; you have always been very good to me, but I shall always love my old father the best," and with this she slipped back to Noah's side, and pillowed her soft cheek against his coarse jersey; and putting up her little white hand, with its jewelled fingers, she pulled his grand face down to hers, and whispered pettishly, "You are always to love me best, do you hear? I shall be dreadfully jealous if you like Grace too much."

"My little one, I fear I always shall love you best," said Noah in the same tone; and Eve was satisfied.

But for the first time in his life Adam awoke to the conviction that Noah had a fault—he loved Eve better than Grace, and it was a fault that time could not cure, for Eve always felt at home in the ark, and sorry to leave it; while Grace, though she visited her father as often as Eve, always felt out of her place there, and breathed freer outside. As years went on, and children were born to Adam and Grace, as well as to Eve and Arthur, the ark became their favourite playground, and Father Noah was the centre of attraction to a group of girls and boys, who sat on his knees and played with his beard, and spoilt his pike-liggers and entangled his fishing-tackle, and listened to his stories and his songs, and loved him almost as dearly as he deserved. And so the evening of his life was calm and beautiful, though the storm which fell on his middle age was violent and sudden, like the storms which rise so suddenly on his native broads, all trace of which is over before the sun sets in a glow of golden glory at eventide.

THE ROMANCE OF NATURE;

OR,

THE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS, PLANTS, EARTH, AIR, SEA, AND SKY.

BY JAMES MASON.

III.—THE FOLKLORE OF PLANTS.

IN speaking of the folklore of plants we shall begin with our national emblems, the rose, thistle, shamrock, and leek.

Of these the rose is, from our present point of view, the most worth speaking about. This is as it should be; the emblem of England is the queen of flowers, and a queen may naturally be expected to have the best of everything.

At what time the rose came to be bound up with the fortunes of England is doubtful. The first English monarch, according to Mr. Lower in his "Curiosities of Heraldry," who assumed the rose was Edward I. From this, in some way or other, not yet well explained, probably originated the white and red roses of his descendants, the rival houses of York and Lancaster, who for many a long day wearied the country with their wars.

In the early days of the world there were not, it seems, red and white roses as now; there were only white ones. How the others came into being has been told by Herrick.

"Tis said, as Cupid danced among the gods.

He down the nectar flung,
Which on the white rose being shed,
Made it for ever after red."

Love divination by means of rose-leaves is practised in Thuringia. If a maiden has several lovers she takes a corresponding number of rose-leaves and names one after each suitor. She then scatters them on the surface of a basin of water, and the leaf that goes last to the bottom is that either of her truest lover or of her predestined husband.

From the earliest times the rose has been a symbol of silence. This has given rise to the common phrase sub rosa, under the rose. "This vulgar saying," says Brand, "is stated to have taken its rise from convivial entertainments, where it was an ancient custom to wear chaplets of roses about the head, on which occasions, when persons desired to confine their words to the company present, that they 'might go no farther,' they commonly said they were spoken under the rose."

A curious superstition connects roses with human blood. In France, Germany, and Italy it used to be held that if anyone wished to have ruddy cheeks she had but to bury a drop of her blood under a rosebush. A belief existed in some quarters that the crown of thorns worn by our Saviour was made from rose-briar, and that the drops of blood which started from beneath it fell to the ground and sprang up as roses.

The rose, according to a Roumanian notion, is an enchanted princess. The legend is thus told by Mr. E. C. G. Murray in his "Doine."

"It is early morning, and a young princess comes down into her garden to bathe in the silver waves of the sea. The transparent whiteness of her complexion is seen through the slight veil which covers it, and shines through the blue waves like the morning star in an azure sky.

"She springs into the sea and mingles with the silvery rays of the sun, which sparkle on the dimples of the laughing waves.

"The sun stands still to gaze upon her; he covers her with kisses and forgets his duty. Once, twice, thrice, has the night advanced to take her sceptre and reign over the world—thrice has she found the sun upon her way.

"Since that day the lord of the universe has changed the princess into a rose, and this is why the rose always hangs her head and blushes when the sun gazes on her."

A beautiful Eastern fable represents the bulbul—as the Armenians call the nightingale—falling in love with the rose, and only beginning to sing when inspired by the tender passion. This fable has been thus rendered in English verse by Thackeray:—

"Under the boughs I sat and listened still,
I could not have my fill.

'How comes,' I said, 'such music to his bill?

Tell me for whom he sings so beautiful a trill?'"

"Once I was dumb," then did the bird disclose,
 'But looked upon the rose;
 And in the garden where the loved one grows
 I straightway did begin sweet music to compose."

The way in which the thistle became the insignia of Scotland is said by tradition to be this. When the Danes invaded Scotland it was deemed disreputable to attack an enemy in the darkness of night instead of encountering him in a fair stand-up fight in broad day, but on one occasion the invaders resolved very shabbily to avail themselves of stratagem. They advanced in the dark, and to prevent their tramp from being heard marched barefooted. They had neared the Scottish forces unobserved, when a Dane stepped on a superbly prickled thistle, which made him give a howl of pain. This discovered the assailants to the Scots, who ran to their arms, and defeated the foe with great slaughter. The thistle, out of gratitude, was immediately after that adopted as the national emblem of Scotland.

It was a plant sacred of old to Thor. Its colour, it was said, came from the lightning, against which it was a certain safeguard.

What sort of thistle is really the thistle of Scotland has been hotly discussed. Botanists generally agree that the cotton thistle is the one that has most claim to the honour. Another debatable question is, What is the true Irish shamrock? Is it the leaf of the wood-sorrel, or that of one of the trefoils? The weight of authority is certainly in favour of the latter, Dutch clover being pretty generally regarded by the Irish themselves as the genuine article.

The popular tradition is that when St. Patrick was preaching the doctrine of the Trinity to the pagan Irish he made use of this plant, bearing three leaves on one stem, as an illustration of the great mystery, and it thus came to be adopted as the emblem of the land of which St. Patrick is the patron saint. It may be, however, that the shamrock had mystical virtues ascribed to it in Ireland before the landing of the saint. Clover, certainly, has a number of superstitions connected with it at the present day. The accidental finding of four-leaved clover is a sure sign of luck. Whoever discovers it, especially on Christmas Eve, has the power of seeing faeries and other supernatural beings.

In Hunt's "Popular Romances of the West of England" a curious story is told of a milkmaid who, having finished her work, picked up a handful of grass and clover to put in the crown of her hat, that she might carry the bucket the steadier. "She had no sooner placed the hat on her head than she saw hundreds and thousands of the small people swarming in all directions about the cow, and dipping their hands in the milk, and taking it out on the clover blossoms." When she got home she looked over by candlelight what was in her hat, and found a bunch of three-leaved clover and one stem with four leaves.

In Germany four-leaved clover used to be used as a protection against being drafted for military service. In Bohemia, when a young man sets out on a journey his lass contrives to place four-leaved clover in his shoes, and believes that by that means she has effectually secured his return. In the Tyrol a lover puts four-leaved clover under his pillow in order to dream of his sweetheart.

The leek is the emblem of Wales, and for its being so various reasons are assigned. Some say it is in memory of a great victory obtained over the Saxons. During the conflict the Welsh, by order of St. David, put leeks in their hats to distinguish themselves from their enemies. Shakespeare makes the wearing of the leek to have originated at the battle of Cressy. Dr. Robert Chambers, however, takes quite a prosaic view of its adoption as the emblem of Wales, and of its being worn on the day of St. David, the patron saint of the Principality. "Perhaps the English," he says, "if not the Welsh reader, will pardon us for expressing our inclination to believe that the custom had no romantic origin whatever, but merely sprung up in allusion to the prominence of the leek in the cuisine of the Welsh people."

The daisy—the "golden tuft within a silver crown"—is popularly looked upon as the emblem of modesty. It used to be the badge of Maid Margaret, that was so meek and mild, a highly popular saint in days of yore.

When chivalry reigned in Europe the daisy played an interesting part in many a love affair. When a knight was an accepted lover his lady allowed him to engrave a daisy on his arms; when he proposed and she would neither say yea nor nay, she wore on her head a coronet of wild daisies, which meant "I'll think about it."

In France they make use of the daisy as a sort of thermometer for ascertaining the warmth of other people's affections. Lovers take a daisy and pluck its leaflets off one by one, saying, "Does he (or she) love me?—a little—much—passionately—not at all." Whatever phrase falls to the last leaflet tells how the matter really stands. In this country the marigold, and in Germany the star flower or aster, is applied to for the same kind of information. Readers of "Faust" will remember how Margaret, as she walked in the garden, picked off the leaves of an aster one after another, saying, half aloud, "He loves me—loves me not—he loves me—not—he loves me—not—he loves me!"

In many parts of England the country people judge of the advance of the year by the number of daisies to be seen. "Spring has not come," they say, "till you can set your foot on twelve daisies at once."

The dandelion has a place in folklore both as a clock and as a lover's oracle. When the seeds are ripe the flower stalk is carefully plucked, and then the seeds are blown away with the breath till they are all gone. The number of puffs necessary to accomplish this is held by some to indicate the hour of the day; others more romantic interpret it as the number of years that must elapse before they are to be married.

The "sweet forget-me-nots that grow for happy lovers" have a story attached to them to explain how they came by their name. "Two lovers were loitering on the margin of a lake on a fine summer's evening, when the maiden espied some of the flowers of the myosotis growing on the water close to the bank of an island, at some distance from the shore. She expressed a desire to possess them, when her knight, in the true spirit of chivalry, plunged into the water, and swimming to the spot, cropped the wished-for plant, but his strength was unable to fulfil the object of his achievement, and feeling that he could not regain the shore, although very near it, he threw the flowers upon the bank, and, casting a last affectionate look upon his lady-love, he cried, 'Forget me not,' and was buried in the waters."

A beautiful Persian legend about the forget-me-not is given by the poet Shiraz. "It was," he says, "in the golden morning of the early world, when an angel sat weeping outside the closed gates of Eden. He had fallen from his high estate through loving a daughter of earth, nor was he permitted to enter it again till she whom he loved had planted the flowers of the forget-me-not in every corner of the world. He returned to earth and assisted her, and they went hand in hand over the world planting the forget-me-not. When their task was ended they entered Paradise together—for the fair woman, without tasting the bitterness of death, became immortal, like the angel whose love her beauty had won when she sat by the river twining the forget-me-not in her hair."

The lily is rival to the rose for the queenship of the garden, and by virtue of its position has many interesting pieces of folklore connected with it. It used to be held that a subtle relationship existed between it and human life. According to a Northern superstition, if anyone is unjustly executed white lilies will spring from his grave in token of innocence. In many of the ballads of Sweden, lilies as well as roses grow out of graves. From the grave of a maiden three lilies spring, which can be gathered by no one but her lover.

There are quaint old stories of people being changed by death into lilies. We may repeat one of these, which is given in Thorpe's "Northern Mythology." "There was in days of yore a conjurer who cut people's heads off and set them on again. One day, when he was practising his art, a travelling journeyman entered the room as a spectator. On the table before the conjurer there stood a large glass filled with distilled water, out of which grew a white lily every time the conjurer cut a head off, which he called the 'Lily of Life.' When the conjurer had cut a head off, the traveller quickly stepped up to the table and with a sharp knife severed the stalk of the lily without being observed by anyone; so that when the conjurer would replace the head the operation failed, whereupon he was seized and burned for a murderer."

As a charm against witchcraft the water-lily is gathered in Germany. It is also held to have a magical power in Holland. "I remember when a boy," says Dr. Halbertsma, "that we were extremely careful in plucking and handling it, for if anyone fell with such a flower in his possession he became immediately subject to fits!"

The lily of the valley has long been a popular symbol of purity and holiness. In some parts of St. Leonard's Forest, in Sussex, it grows freely, and a legendary tale is there told of it. It is said to have sprung from the blood of St. Leonard, who once met a mighty worm, or "fire-drake," in the forest, and did battle with it for three whole days. The saint came off victorious, but in the struggle he was severely wounded, and wherever drops of his blood fell on the ground lilies sprang up in profusion.

In the olden time no plants ranked higher as antidotes to all witcheries and wizardries than the well-known St. John's worts; and they were not only "powerful for the expulsion of witches," but for "the prognostication of the fates of young men and maidens."

The reason for their being held in such esteem is thus given by Mr. James Napier in his "Folklore in the West of Scotland":—"In heathen mythology," he says, "the summer solstice was a day dedicated to the sun, and was believed to be a day on which witches held their festivities. St. John's wort (then known as Baldur's blood) was their symbolical plant, and people were wont to judge from it whether their future would be lucky or unlucky; as it grew they read in its progressive character their future lot. The Christians dedicated this festive period to St. John the Baptist, and the sacred plant was named St. John's wort or root, and became a talisman against evil. When hung up on St. John's day, together with a cross, over the doors of houses, "it kept out the devil and other evil spirits. To gather the root on St. John's Day morning at sunrise and retain it in the house gave luck to the family in their undertakings, especially in those begun on that day."

Stowe, in his "Survey of London," mentions that it was the custom on St. John's Eve to hang up St. John's wort over the doors along with green birch, fennel, orpine, white lilies, and other plants. Pennant, who wrote at a later date, speaks of St. John's wort as hung over the doors in Wales on Midsummer Eve. In Sweden and Norway, a bunch of St. John's wort, gathered on St. John's Eve, is hung up to warn off the witches. Wreaths of it are placed on the roofs of houses on the Lower Rhine as a protection against evil.

"It used," we are told, "to be a popular belief in the Isle of Wight, before crowds of visitors drove the fairies out, that if you trod on the St. John's wort after sunset a fairy horse would rise from the earth and bear you about all night, leaving you in the morning wherever you might chance to be at sunrise."

Amongst girls in Denmark it is the custom on St. John's Day to gather St. John's wort and place it between the beams under the roof in order to learn what their future is to be. The usual plan is for a girl to place one plant for herself and another for her sweetheart; if they grow together it foretells a wedding. In Lower Saxony sprigs of the St. John's wort are gathered by girls and fastened to the walls of their chambers. If on the following morning the plant is still fresh there is a lover in the wind; but if it be drooping and withered, the maiden is destined to come to an early grave.

There is a common saying in the Tyrol that if a traveller have a piece of St. John's wort in his shoes he will never be weary. In the Netherlands it is believed that, if it be gathered before sunrise, it will protect a house against being struck by lightning.

We shall speak next of rosemary. This herb was long ago supposed to be a wonderful improver of the memory. "It overtoppeth all the flowers in the garden boasting man's rule," says an old herbalist. "It helpeth the brain, strengtheneth the memorie, and is very medicinable for the head." This belief made it the symbol of remembrance amongst lovers and friends. A poet of the sixteenth century writes:—

"Rosemary is for remembrance
Between us day and night,
Wishing that I might always have You present in my sight."

In Hamlet, Ophelia in her madness gives rosemary to her brother, saying, "There's rosemary; that's for remembrance; pray, love, remember."

The superstitious believed that rosemary kept off thieves, and some held that it could work even a greater wonder, and make old folks young again. There is a story told in an old English poem on the virtues of rosemary about an aged woman bent with age and crippled with rheumatism, who looked back to her dancing days with not unnatural regret. So—and then mixed it with water, in which she bathed three times a day. The result was very satisfactory; she became so youthful-looking that she began to look out for a husband.

"Of rosemarie she took six pound And ground it well in a stownde,"

Rosemary was commonly used in bygone times at funerals, along with sprigs of ivy, laurel, and other evergreens as an emblem of the soul's immortality. Gay in his "Pastorals" tells how—

"To show their love, the neighbours far and near,
Followed with wistful looks the damsel's bier;
Sprigged rosemary the lads and lasses bore,
While dismally the parson walked before."

In Lancashire, not so long ago, the "bidders" of guests to a funeral went to the various houses of the persons to be invited, and presented to each a sprig of rosemary, which the guest wore or carried in the hand at the funeral.

A cheerful use was its employment in foretelling the end of love affairs. On St. Agnes's Day a sprig of rosemary and a sprig of thyme were taken and sprinkled thrice with water. The girl in the evening put the rosemary in one shoe and the thyme in the other, set the shoes on either side of her bed, and on going to rest repeated—

"St. Agnes, that's to lovers kind, Come ease the troubles of my mind!"

The future husband was then sure to appear.

Rosemary was often worn at weddings. In Thuringia it is twined with bridal wreaths. After marriage, if it flourished in the garden, it used to be said in some parts of this country that "the lady ruled the roast." A correspondent of Notes and Queries mentions his being in a garden in Hertfordshire, where the worthy cottager pointed to a specimen of the plant, and said—

"That be rosemary, sir, and they do say that it only grows where the missus is master, and it do grow here like wildfire!"

In Spain rosemary is connected with love affairs. A Spanish saying, of which we give a free translation, informs us that—

"Who passeth by the rosemarie,
And careth not to take a spray,
For woman's love no care has he,
Nor shall he, though he live for aye."

The plantain is one of the familiar plants of the wayside, and it is an odd fact that it always follows the migrations of the human race. Through its haunting the track of man with such constancy, a superstition has arisen in Germany that it was once a maiden who watched by the roadside for her lover. Whilst she was on the look-out she was changed by magic spells into a flower, and ever since in the form of the plantain she has been found in beaten paths. Only once in seven years she changes into a bird, either the cuckoo or the "cuckoo's servant," which is said to follow its master everywhere.

The ribwort plantain is employed in Berwickshire for purposes of love-divination. "The lads and lasses who would peer into the future take two 'kemps'—i.e., spikes—of this plant, which must be in full bloom, strip them of the flowers, wrap them in a dock leaf, and lay them beneath a stone. One represents the lad, the other the lass. If next morning the spikes appear in blossom, then there will be 'aye love between them twa!'"

We spoke about St. John's wort having a reputation abroad for preventing weariness in walking. As an aid to pedestrianism in this country mugwort is most praised by the superstitious. An old writer says: "If a footman take mugwort and put it in his shoes in the morning, he may go forty miles before noon and not be weary."

But mugwort is sought after for another reason. A rare coal possessed of wonderful virtues is found under it. This coal, which also exists, it is said, under the plantain, can be discovered only at one hour of the day and on one day of the year. "Divers authors," says Thomas Hill, in his "Natural and Artificial Conclusions," "affirm concerning the verity and virtue of this cole, viz., that it is only to be found on Midsummer eve, just at noon, under every root of plantain and mugwort; the effects whereof are wonderful; for whosoever weareth or beareth the same about with them shall be freed from the plague, fevers, ague, and sundry other diseases. And one author especially writeth and constantly averreth that he never knew any that used to carry of this marvellous cole about them who ever were, to his knowledge, sick of the plague, or indeed complained of any other maladic."

Flax has several interesting items of folklore connected with it. In Thuringia, when a young woman gets married she puts flax in her shoes, under the belief that through doing so she will never come to poverty. In Bohemia there is a belief that seven-year-old children, by dancing in a field of flax, will become beautiful. There is a saying in the Netherlands that the flax is sure to prosper if the sun shines on Candlemas Day, the 2nd of February. A popular belief in Westphalia is that if the sun makes its appearance on the first day of the year the flax will be straight.

To these superstitions we may add the following North German legend of flax-spinning, told by Mr. Thorpe. It is an instructive example of what may be the end of woman's curiosity. "A dwarf came one day to a girl, and gave her a distaff full of flax, on which there was enough for her whole life, provided she never spun it quite off. She spun from one year to another, and yet the distaff was always full, and she got so much yarn that she was constantly adding one piece of fine linen to another. At last she thought she might as well know what was beneath the flax, and why she might not spin it all off. So she spun quicker and quicker, and had at length the end of it between her fingers. But under the flax there was nothing on the distaff, and the everlasting supply was irrecoverably gone."

Hemp is of service in love-divination, the seed being sown on a particular night of the year, with a view to seeing a girl's future husband. In Gay's "Pastorals" we have a girl thus describing how on St. John's Eve she performed the rite:—

"At eve, last Midsummer, no sleep I sought,
But to the field a bag of hemp-seed brought;
I scattered round the seed on every side,
And three times in a trembling accent cried,
'This hemp-seed with my virgin hand I sow,
Who shall my true-love be the crop shall mow.'
I straight looked back, and if my eyes speak truth,
With his keen scythe, behind me came the youth.
With my sharp heel I three times mark the ground,
And turn me thrice around, around, around."

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

"I MUST NOT THINK OF MYSELF."

BESSIE'S words to Edna had been strangely prophetic—"Trouble may come to me one day;" it had come already, in its most crushing form. The bond of sisterhood is very strong; it has peculiar and precious privileges, apart from other relationships; a sort of twinship of sympathy unites many sisters who have grown up together. Their thoughts and interests are seldom apart. All their little pleasures, their minor griefs, youthful hopes, disappointments, are shared with each other. They move together through the opening years of their life. Sometimes old age finds them still together, tottering hand-in-hand to the grave. Of all her sisters, Bessie could least spare Hatty, and her death left a void in the girl's life that was very difficult to fill. From the first, Bessie had accepted the responsibility of Hatty. Hatty's peculiar temperament, her bad health and unequal spirits, had set her apart from the other members of the family, who were all strong and cheerful and full of life. Bessie had realised this, and had made Hatty her special charge and duty; but now there was a gap in her daily life, a sense of emptiness and desolation. There was no need now to hurry through her morning's task that she might sit with Hatty. When she went out, there was no Hatty to watch for her return and listen to all her descriptions of what she had seen. At night, when Bessie went upstairs, she would creep softly into a certain empty room, which was dearer to her than any other room. Hatty's little gowns, her few girlish possessions, were all locked away in the wardrobe; but her Bible and prayer-book, and her shabby little writing-case, lay on the table. Bessie would pull up the blind, and kneel down by the low bed; she liked to say her prayers in that room. Sometimes as she prayed, the sense of her sister's presence would come over her strongly; she could almost feel the touch of the thin little hands that had so often toiled in her service. Hatty's large, wistful eyes seemed to look lovingly out of the darkness. "Oh! my Hatty, are you near me?" she would sob, but there was no answer out of the silence.

Who has not tasted the bitterness of these moments, when the craving for the loved presence seems insupportable, hardly to be borne? How our poor human hearts rebel against the unnatural separation, until the thrilling words make themselves heard—"He is not the God of the dead, but of the living." Oh, yes, of the living! Cease, then, to mourn, poor soul, as one without hope. Somewhere, not here, but in the larger room of a purified existence, your beloved one lives, breathes, nay, thinks of thee. Be comforted; one day we shall meet them, and the friendship of time will become the love of eternity.

Bessie strove hard not to be selfish in her grief. Her mother's strength, never very great, had broken down utterly for a time. Bessie knew that this failure of power added to her father's anxiety, and in the most touching manner she tried to console them both. When she looked back at these sad days, Bessie owned that she had been marvellously helped and supported. With the day's burden had come daily strength to bear it. "I must not think of myself, I must think of father and mother," she would say, as she awoke in the morning with that blank sense of loss. "There is nothing to do for Hatty now, but there are others who need me." And this thought helped her through the day. In that busy household there was no time to sit alone and brood. A quiet walk now and then, and that half-hour in Hatty's room, was all Bessie could conscientiously spare. If she stayed away for an hour, Christine complained of dullness, and her mother looked sadder on her return. Ella and Katie, too, made constant demands on her time and patience. Christine was very unlike Bessie in temperament. She was a pretty, bright girl, warm-hearted and high-spirited, but she did not possess Bessie's contented nature. Christine often found her quiet life irksome. She was inquisitive, restless, eager to see the world. She had insatiable curiosity; a love of change, her small girlish ambitions. She wanted to plume her wings a little—to try them in flights hither and thither. The gay world seemed to her ignorance a land flowing with milk and honey. She had yet to spell the meaning of the words illusion and vanity. Bessie was very fond of Christine. She loved all her sisters dearly, but there was less sympathy between them than there had been between herself and Hatty.

Hatty, in spite of her morbid humours and difficult tendencies, had a refined and cultured mind; her chief source of fretfulness was that she loved the best and failed to reach it. The very loftiness of her standard produced despondency akin to despair.

Hatty's faith was pure but feeble. She hated everything false and mean. She despised the conventionalities of life, while Bessie laughed at them. She and Bessie had their ideals, their simple secrets, their crude girlish notions, that were nevertheless very true and sweet.

Bessie could make allowances for Hatty's sharp speeches, as she watched her daily struggles with her faulty temper. She could rejoice in Hatty's victories all the more that she had borne so patiently with her failures, and there was no abiding sting in her grief now, no remorseful feelings for duties undone and opportunities wasted; but with Christine things were different.

One Sunday afternoon, when Bessie was stealing away for a quiet half-hour in Hatty's room, she was surprised to find Christine following her.

"May I come in too, Bessie?" she said, very humbly, and her eyes were full of tears; "I do so want a little comfort, and I can't talk to mother. I am making myself so miserable about Hatty."

"About our dear Hatty! Oh, Chrissy, what can you mean?" asked Bessie, reproachfully. "We can talk here, and perhaps our poor darling may be listening to us. I do love this room; it seems to breathe of Hatty somehow. There, I will open the window. How sweet the air is! and look, how red the leaves are, though it is only the end of September!" And then she added, softly, "Hatty has been six weeks in her new home."

"Oh, how I envy you, Bessie!" sighed Christine; "you can talk and think happily about dear little Hatty, but with me it is all so different. If I had only been good to her, if she had not made me so impatient! But I cannot help remembering how horrid I used to be." And here one tear after another rolled down Christine's pretty, troubled face.

Bessie's soft heart grew very pitiful. "Dear Chrissy," she said, gently, "there is no need to fret over that now. Hatty was always fond of you, and you of her; she told me that night, when I came home, how kind you had been to her; there was no one but you to do things, and you were such a comfort to her."

"How could I help being kind to her, when she was so ill, and there was the fear of losing her? Somehow, I never thought there was much amiss with Hatty. I could not get it out of my mind that she always made the most of every little ailment, and that it was wrong of you and mother to give in to her. I never thought it would come to this." And Christine sobbed afresh.

"Yes, I know what you mean; but, indeed, Chrissy, dear, you need not distress yourself so. Hatty has forgiven everything long ago; she was never one to bear malice—no, her nature was too sweet for that."

"But I might have made her happier," persisted Christine. "I need not have minded her worrying so over every little trifle, but I was always losing patience, and getting vexed with her. I used to wonder at your bearing with her as you did, and I thought it a mistake to give way to all her humours. I never imagined that she was cross because she was so suffering, but father says all her gloomy fancies and tiresome little ways came from her low health."

"I might have made her happier!" That speech went to Bessie's heart. "Listen to me, darling," she said, eagerly; "I do not want to make you more miserable, but what you have just said reminds me so of a passage I copied only the other day out of one of Tom's books; it was written by a man who had failed in his own life, but was very gentle and very tolerant of other people. 'Oh, let us not wait,' he says, 'to be just, or pitiful, or demonstrative towards those we love, until they or we are struck down by illness, or threatened with death! Life is short, and we have never too much time for gladdening the hearts of those who are travelling the dark journey with us. Oh, be swift to love, make haste to be kind.' And then in another place he says, and that is so true, too, 'Never to tire, never to grow cold; to be patient, sympathetic, tender; to look for the budding flower and the opening heart, to hope always like God; to love always—this is duty.'"

Christine made a despairing gesture. "It is a duty in which I have utterly failed," she said, bitterly.

"You think you might have been kinder to Hatty; that is just what Tom said of himself the other day. I am afraid many people have these sort of reproachful thoughts when they lose one they love. Everything seems different," she continued, in a musing tone; "we see with other eyes. Death seems to throw such a strange searching light over one's life; big things are dwarfed, and little things come into pre-eminence; our looks, and words, and actions pass in review before us—we see where we have failed, and our successes do not comfort us."

"But you, at least, are free from these thoughts, Bessie?"

"Not entirely. There were times when I found Hatty trying, when she depressed me, and made me impatient. Indeed, Chrissy, dear, we must remember that we are human and not angels. None of us are free from blame; we have all failed in our turn. You have never been morbid before; try to forget the little every-day frictions, for which Hatty was to blame as well as you, and only remember how good you were to her in her illness—what a comfort to me as well as to her. 'Chrissy has been such a darling,' Hatty said to me one day."

After all, Christine was quite willing to be comforted, and presently she dried her eyes.

"You must let me talk to you sometimes, Bessie," she said; "it will do me good, because you have such a nice clear way of putting things, and you never mind trouble. I know I can't take Hatty's place, but if you will let me do things for you sometimes, and feel that I am a help, for we are sisters as much as you and Hatty were, and I want to get nearer to you somehow."

"And so you shall, dear," replied Bessie, touched by this humility. "You must not think that I do not love you because Hatty was so much to me. There is nothing I would not do for you, Chrissy—oh, you may be sure of that," and Bessie kissed her affectionately. This conversation made Christine happier, for she was a good-hearted girl, and her repentance was very real, and it strengthened Bessie in her resolve to do her best for them all. Sorrow is a great test of character; it makes the selfish more selfish, and hardens the proud, but Bessie grew softer under its influence. After all, Edna was right in saying that it was harder to suffer through one's own fault. An affliction that comes straight from God's hand (though, in one sense, all trouble is permitted by His providence) wounds, and yet heals at the same time, and Bessie was to learn this by degrees; and, after all, her cross was wreathed with the soft flowers of hope.

One morning early in October Bessie had a most unexpected pleasure. She had just returned from a long walk, and was on her way to the morning-room in search of her mother, when Christine opened the drawing-room door and beckoned to her with a very excited face.

"Do come in, Betty," she said, in a loud whisper that must have been distinctly audible inside the room. "What a time you have been! and there is a friend of yours waiting for you."

Bessie quickened her steps, feeling somewhat mystified by Christine's manner, and the next moment she was face to face with Edna. Bessie turned very pale, and could hardly speak at first for surprise and emotion; but Edna took her in her arms and kissed her.

"My dear Bessie," she said, softly; and then she laughed a little nervously, and it was not the old musical laugh at all—"are you very surprised to see me? Oh, it was a bright idea of mine. I have been visiting those same friends (I had returned from them that day you know, when we were snowed up together). Well, when I saw Sheen Valley, all of a sudden the thought popped into my head that I would stop at Cliffe, and take a later train; so I telegraphed to mamma, who is in London, and now I have a whole hour to spend with you; is not that nice?"

"Very nice indeed. I am so glad to see you, Edna, but you are looking delicate; you have lost your colour."

"What nonsense!" with a touch of her old impatience. "You are as bad as mamma; she is always finding fault with me. People who live in glass houses should not throw stones at their neighbours. You do not look like yourself either, Bessie."

"Oh, that is different," and Bessie's lips trembled a little; "I have gone through so much since we parted. I try to take it properly, and everyone helps me, but I think I miss my Hatty more every day."

"You want a change," returned Edna, kindly, for she was much touched by the alteration in her friend's looks.

Bessie had lost her pretty fresh colour, and looked pale and subdued in her black dress; her grey eyes had a sad look in them, even her voice had lost its old cheery tones, and her very movements were quieter; the bright elasticity that had been her charm was missing now, and yet Edna thought she had never looked so sweet.

"My poor little daisy," she continued, "you have a crushed look. You want country air to revive you. Will you come to us? Mamma will be delighted; you are such a favourite of hers; and as for myself, I want you more than I can say."

"Not yet; I could not leave mother yet," returned Bessie, but a faint colour stole into her face. No, she could not leave her post, and yet it would have been nice to see the Grange again, and Richard's friendly face; he had been so kind to her; and there was Whitefoot, and the dear dogs, and the lanes were full of hips and haws. "No, not yet; but I should like to come again one day."

"Well, well, I will not tease you; by-and-by I will make another appeal, but if your mother be not well——" She paused, and then something of the old mischief came into her eyes. "You see I am improving, Bessie; I am not always trying to get my own way; my goodness makes mamma quite uneasy. I think she has got it into her head that I shall die young; all good young people die—in books. No, it was wrong of me to joke," as a pained look crossed Bessie's face; "seriously, I am trying to follow your advice; but, oh! it is such hard work."

"Dear Edna, do you think I do not see the difference in you?"

"Am I different?" she asked, eagerly, and a wistful look came into her lovely eyes. "Richard said the other day how much nicer I was; we are quite friends, Ritchie and I, now, and I won't let mamma be so hard on him. He was very kind to me when—when—Neville went away; he tells me about him sometimes, for once or twice he has seen him in London; but just fancy, Bessie, he never even asked after me. 'Are your people well?' That is all he said; but of course he will never forgive me; men are like that."

"He may not think that you want to be forgiven," returned Bessie.

Edna's colour rose.

"He will never know it," she said, proudly; but the next moment her tone changed. "Oh, Bessie, what shall I do? Sometimes I am so miserable that I hardly know how I am to go on living. I never thought I should miss Neville like this, but I do—I do."

"Do not think me unkind if I say that I rejoice to hear it; it proves how deep and real your affection was."

"It was the only real part of me," was the reply. "Now it is too late, I have discovered it for myself. I never would let myself think seriously of my engagement. I liked Neville, and I meant to marry him one day, and that was all I thought about it; but now I see that the real feeling was there all the time, only choked up with rubbish, and I am quite sure that I could never care for anyone else in the same way—never—never."

"Poor Edna, it is very hard, and I am so sorry for you." But as Bessie spoke Christine came back into the room with a small tray of refreshments, and her mother followed, so she and Edna were obliged to break off the conversation.

THE COWSLIP.

THE COWSLIP.

BY CLARA THWAITES.

BRING me the earliest cowslip,
Wet with the spring's soft rain,
For the radiant hours of summer
Come to the earth again.

Rooks in the elms are calling,
Lambs in the meadows bleat,
And under my lattice window
The violet's breath is sweet.

Ye of the bright young faces,
Ye are blithe as we were of yore,
When we gathered the yellow cowslip
With the friends that are no more.

Hyacinths in the woodlands
Are blue as the summer skies,
And the stately arums cluster
Where the early primrose dies.

Bring, O rejoicing children,
Flowers from the hill and vale,
From the cuckoo-haunted meadow
Bring me the primrose pale.

THE CHEF.

BY MARY POCKOCK.

WAYS IN WHICH A FRENCH COOK DRESSES BEEF AND MUTTON.

IN the article on soups directions are given for boiled beef, the ordinary "bouilli" that one sees on French dinner-tables. The rump of beef is considered the best piece of beef for boiling; it is boned and tied up; part of the shoulder or the top of the round is also good. A piece of beef weighing seven or eight pounds is boiled thus:—Put it in a stewpan with salt and warm water, let it just come to a boil, skim it, and let it simmer gently for three hours; then put in vegetables, herbs and spices as for stock, and let it simmer an hour and a half; then pull it back and leave it for an hour, where it will keep hot, but not boil; drain the meat, and serve with the vegetables round, or serve with stewed cabbage and browned small onions, or with only watercress.

Beef boiled in this way, or in the stock-pot, is also put on a dish with fresh parsley round it, and sent to table with horseradish sauce.

Beef is interlarded with strips of bacon, that is, the bacon run into the meat with a larding needle (not in and out), and then cooked about four hours in the stock-pot, served surrounded by parsley and with tomato, piquante, or Italian sauce.

Boiled Salt Beef with Spinach.—Take a piece of salted brisket of beef weighing four or five pounds, wash it, and boil it five hours with carrots, turnips, and onions; place it on a dish with parsley round, serve with it a dish of épinard au jus (spinach with gravy). Cold boiled fresh beef is cooked up in various ways, as—

Bœuf au Gratin.—Grease a dish with some fat from poultry or with butter, put a few pale raspings over it, then cut cold beef in nice slices, and arrange them in the dish, one partly over the other; chop two onions, cook them in some butter or dripping without browning them, add a little thick gravy to them, put over the slices of beef, then put chopped parsley, pepper, salt, and raspings over, and bake a quarter of an hour in a moderate oven, and serve in the same dish.

Bœuf aux Fines Herbes.—Butter a dish, sprinkle it with chopped parsley and shalots mixed with a few raspings, put the cold beef cut in thin slices on it, laying very thin slices of fat between the slices of lean, sprinkle with sweet herbs, chopped shalots, parsley, a finely chopped gherkin and some pale raspings; put little pieces of butter over, and cook about fifteen minutes in the oven.

Beef en Miroton.—Cut some onions in slices, cook them in a stewpan in a little butter or dripping until they are nearly done, then add a tablespoonful of flour and let them brown, but not burn; add sufficient broth for gravy, salt, nutmeg, and pepper. When the onions are done and the gravy is good enough, cut the meat in thin slices and put it in; let it simmer a quarter of an hour. At the time of serving add a few drops of vinegar and some mustard.

Beef en Vinaigrette.—Cut the beef in thin slices, put it in a salad bowl, lay over it fillets of anchovies or of pickled herrings, chopped scallions or spring onions, chervil, gherkins, and parsley; season with pepper, oil and vinegar, and serve.

Bœuf à la Mode.—Take a piece of sirloin, of round, or of any part of beef that is preferred, about five or six pounds; bone it, take a quarter of a pound of fat bacon, cut it into strips, and with a larding needle run them into the beef in the same direction as the fibre runs, leaving just a little piece of the bacon out of the meat; put it in a pan with a marinade of salt, pepper, cloves, sweet herbs, parsley, chervil, a little chopped onion, and a glass of light wine or one or two tablespoonfuls of good vinegar; leave it twenty-four hours, turning it three or four times. Chop two ounces of bacon, put it in a stewpan; drain and wipe the meat; put it in with the bacon for about twenty minutes, then add a lump of sugar and a teacupful of broth, and let it nearly dry up; then put in a slice of raw ham, a calf's foot chopped in two, or a piece of knuckle of veal, four large carrots, a clove of garlic, and the marinade from which you have taken the beef; add broth until the meat is just covered, and a glass of light wine (red or white); cook over a slow fire for five hours, brown twenty small onions in the frying-pan and put them with the meat. Put the meat on a dish, surround it with pieces of the knuckle of veal or the calf's foot (without the bones), with the onions and with the carrots cut in pieces. Skim and strain the gravy, and pour it over the meat. If the meat is only to be eaten cold the gravy is clarified with white of egg, and left in a basin so as to be used on the meat the following day as savoury jelly.

Beef à l'Ecarlate.—Take a piece of beef, remove the bones and lard it (running the bacon into the meat), rub the meat all over with salt and pounded spices and a little brown sugar, then put it in a pan with thyme, juniper-berries, cloves, bay leaf, basil, clove of garlic, and two onions cut in slices; cover the pan with a cloth, and leave it four days; then turn the meat, and leave it four days more; then sew it in a cloth and boil it gently in water, with onions, parsley and sweet herbs. A piece of beef weighing six pounds takes about four hours to cook. Remove the cloth, and serve with sauce espagnole. Beef dressed in this manner is much eaten cold.

Beef à la Portugaise.—Take a square piece of beef, chop some parsley, thyme, a bay leaf, a clove of garlic, add pepper, salt, and spice; when the whole is well mixed roll some thick strips of bacon in it, with these lard the beef the way of the grain, running them into the meat; put it into a stewpan with some fat from roast poultry or some butter; chop mushrooms, a little garlic, scallions, and parsley together, and put over and round the meat, add a glass of white wine and cover closely; let the meat cook in its own juice until tender; put it on a dish. Strain and skim the liquor from the meat, let it get cold, then put it over the beef. Prepared in this way, the meat is served cold; it is not meant to be eaten hot.

Filet de Bœuf Roti (roast fillet of beef).—Take a small piece of fillet of beef (about two pounds), remove the skin from it, and some of the fat; lard the fillet on one side, then place it in a pan, sprinkle it with chopped onions, sprigs of parsley, sweet herbs, pepper, salt, a bay leaf, and two or three tablespoonfuls of olive oil; leave it from six to twelve hours as convenient, turning it several times; then roast it, basting it with the marinade in which it was laid. Serve with a piquante sauce or its own gravy.

Filet de Bœuf Braisé, aux Olives.—Lard a fillet of beef, place in a stewpan two carrots, two onions, a bunch of sweet herbs, with parsley and a bay leaf, two or three slices of bacon and some bacon rinds, pepper, salt, and a cupful of broth; place the beef on the vegetables, put on the fire, and let the broth nearly dry up; then add more broth and let it boil ten minutes; then draw to the side of the stove, and let it cook very slowly for an hour and a quarter; then drain the fillet and put it on a dish; strain and skim the gravy, thicken it with a little butter and flour. Have ready some olives prepared thus: Remove the stones by passing a knife round the olives so that they look whole, put them in a stewpan of water, give them one boil, drain them, and while they are hot put them in the gravy; pour it into the dish with the fillet. Cooked in this way fillet is also served à la financière, à la jardinière, or mushrooms that have been cooked in a little butter and lemon juice are added to the gravy instead of the olives.

Filet de Bœuf au Restaurant.—Take a small fillet of beef, remove the skin and some of the fat, cut it in two across the grain so as to have two thick steaks, beat these with a steak-beater or rolling-pin, to flatten them a little, then lard them, letting the pieces of bacon go right through them, sprinkle with salt, pepper, and a little nutmeg. Put two or three slices of bacon, two thin slices of veal, and some sliced truffles in a stewpan, lay the beef on them, add half a pint of broth, cover the stewpan, and let the fillets cook very slowly (at the side of the stove) for three hours; take them out, strain and skim the gravy, and serve it over the fillets with the pieces of truffle.

Chateaubriands.—Cut two or three thick fillet steaks, beat them, put pepper, salt, and a little oil over them, and leave three or four hours, then broil for about twenty minutes over a moderate fire, turning them as soon as red gravy appears on the top; when they are a little firm to the touch they are done; put on a very hot dish with a piece of maître d'hôtel butter on each, and surround them with fried potatoes.

Fillet or Rump Steaks with Cucumber.—Put some butter in a sauté-pan (or a shallow stewpan), place the steaks in it, sprinkled with pepper, salt, and a little nutmeg; turn once; when done serve with cucumbers that have been peeled, cut in pieces, and cooked in butter first, then in velouté sauce; or put a little sauce espagnole into the stewpan after taking out the steaks, stir with a wooden spoon to detach the gravy from the bottom, and pour very hot into the dish with the steaks.

Biftecks à la Provençale.—Chop four ounces of raw beef marrow, mix with it salt, cayenne pepper, and finely-chopped shallots, put it in a dish, and let it melt slowly in the oven or on the stove. Broil a steak eight or ten minutes, then put it in a dish with the marrow, turn it so as to have the marrow all over it, and serve.

Civet of Beef.—Cut two pounds of beefsteak in pieces, and six ounces of pickled pork in slices; put the pork in a stewpan with a little fat, turn it, and when cooked take it out with a strainer, so as to leave the melted fat in the stewpan, then put in the meat, and cook it slowly for twenty-five minutes; season with pepper, salt, a bunch of sweet herbs, a bay leaf, and parsley; add two tablespoonfuls of flour, then moisten by degrees with half red wine and half hot water, until the meat is covered; let it boil, then draw to the side of the stove, and cook very gently for two hours; then add the pork, remove the herbs, and serve with small baked onions round. These are prepared so as to be ready by the time the meat is done.

Beef à la Chicorée.—Cut some cold beef in thin slices, put it in a stewpan with a very little broth, just to make it hot; by the time it is quite hot the gravy should be nearly all gone; then put pieces of butter, pepper, and salt on the meat, and serve it on stewed endive or spinach.

Beef with Onions.—Cut some thin slices of cold beef about three inches square. Chop two onions small, put them in a stewpan with some butter or dripping; cook them slowly, so that when done they are light brown; then add the slices of meat and a clove of garlic (not chopped); season with pepper and salt; when the meat is brown sprinkle chopped parsley and a little lemon juice or a few drops of vinegar over it; remove the garlic, and serve at once on a very hot dish.

Langue de Bœuf à l'Ecarlate.—Thoroughly clean a tongue, wipe it dry, then rub it all over with plenty of pounded saltpetre; put it in a pan with cloves, allspice, basil, thyme, bay leaves, peppercorns, and two handfuls of salt; pour just enough boiling water over the whole to cover it, and leave it six days; at the end of that time wash it in fresh water, and boil it in two quarts of water with carrots, thyme, onions, basil, bay leaf, and cloves, for at least three hours; then take it up and skin it, trim the root and serve the tongue on a purée of dried peas, lentils, or haricots. The liquor in which the tongue is boiled serves for soup.

Langue de Bœuf Braisée.—Put a fresh tongue in boiling water, and let it remain ten minutes; drain it and trim it, put it in a stewpan in which you have previously placed some pieces of bacon, bacon rinds, any uncooked bones, the trimmings from the root of the tongue, sliced onions and carrots, sweet herbs, parsley, bay leaf, two lumps of sugar, pepper, salt, and half a pint of broth; the bottom of the stewpan must be well covered with the vegetables, etc., so that the tongue rests on them; put over the fire, and let the broth dry up; then add half a pint of light white wine and some broth, until the tongue is just covered (not more); cook over a moderate fire (with cinders or charcoal on the lid, if you have a proper brazing pan) for about three hours—a very large tongue will take longer; then take it out and skin it, skim and strain the gravy, reduce it a little by boiling fast, then add a little flour mixed with butter; boil for five minutes, and put the tongue back in the stewpan with the gravy, and let it simmer ten minutes, basting it with the gravy once or twice. Olives or mushrooms prepared as for fillet of beef, are sometimes added to the gravy; or it is served with tomato- or piquante sauce, or on a purée of sorrel.

Fresh Ox Tongues are also simply cooked thus:—First scald the tongue for ten minutes, then put it in the stock-pot and boil until tender; serve with gherkins, with spinach cooked with gravy, with young carrots stewed, or with almost any kind of vegetable. Tongues braised or boiled are frequently served cut in slices, with a sauce or with maître d'hôtel butter, with gherkins and tarragon added to it.

Langue en Hoche-pot.—Cut a braised tongue in slices, put the gravy over it, and surround it with small brown onions.

Langue de Bœuf au Gratin.—Cut the remains of a cold tongue in slices, warm in a little gravy, mince two or three onions, cook them in butter, add a little flour and a little white wine, cook five minutes. Place the slices of tongue on a dish, cover with the chopped onions, add a little chopped parsley and some chopped mushrooms, cover with raspings and some little pieces of butter. Brown in the oven, and serve.

Cervelles de Bœuf (ox brains).—Soak the brains in vinegar, salt, and water, then carefully remove the thin skin that covers them; take care that all the blood is removed, then put them in warm water with a little salt, vinegar, a chopped onion, parsley, clove, and pepper; boil them fifteen to twenty minutes, drain well and put them on a dish; pour piquante sauce over them, or they may be served with a brown gravy. The gravy or sauce must be thick enough to mask the brains, otherwise the dish is ugly. Another way is: After boiling the brains dip them in a frying batter; fry them, and serve garnished with fried parsley only.

Queue en Hoche-pot (ox tail en Hoche-pot).—Soak an ox tail in warm water for half an hour, then dry it and divide it at the joints; put it in a stewpan and brown it a little with butter and flour, then add sliced carrots, herbs, parsley, bay leaf, and onions, pepper, salt, and water or broth, and stew gently for four or five hours (it should be well cooked); then put the tail on a dish, skim and strain the gravy, and serve.

Queue Sauce Tomato.—Cook in the same way, but serve with tomato sauce instead of the gravy.

Queue aux Champignons.—Same cooking, but cook some mushrooms in butter; add the strained gravy to them, boil it fast to reduce it a little, then pour it over the tail.

Ox Kidneys are cooked the same way as calf's or sheep's.

Palais de Bœuf (ox palates).—These are first prepared by being put in boiling water for about half an hour, then plunged in cold water and skinned, and next cut in pieces.

Palais à la Ménagère.—Brown some onions in butter or dripping, throw in the pieces of palate, leave a minute, add some broth, a bunch of herbs, salt, and some slices of potato, stew, and let the gravy reduce, add a small spoonful of mustard, remove the herbs, and serve.

Palais en Blanquette.—Put the slices of palate in sauce allemande and cook them; before serving add a thickening of yolks of eggs and a little lemon juice; serve with fried sippets.

Gras Double (tripe).—There are many ways of cooking this; space does not allow me to give them, but it may be cooked in the same ways as ox palates. Tongues, tails, palates, and tripe are all cooked a long time.

Mutton.—Gigot Roti (roast leg of mutton).—Hang a leg of mutton as long as it will keep, then beat it well all over with a rolling-pin, raise the skin at the knuckle, and slip a clove of garlic in between the muscle; roast it, sprinkle with salt, and baste it well as it cooks, serve with its own gravy and with a dish of vegetables. Hot potato salad is sometimes served with it.

Gigot Mariné Roti.—Cut the knuckle of a leg of mutton short, then put in a pan vinegar, chopped onions, a clove of garlic, slices of lemon, parsley, sweet herbs, bay leaf, pepper, and salt; put the leg of mutton in; leave it two days, turning it and pouring the pickle over it occasionally, then drain and wipe the mutton, rub it all over with oil, and lard it, roast it, sprinkle salt over it, and baste well as it cooks. Make a sauce by boiling down some of the pickle, straining it, and mixing with the gravy from the meat. Serve separately.

Gigot de Mouton au Riz (leg of mutton and rice).—Remove the bone from the thick end of a leg of mutton, and fill the space with a forcemeat of fresh pork, a slice of raw ham, a little bread panade, chopped onion, parsley, and a clove of garlic, pepper, salt, and a whole egg. Sew up the meat to keep the stuffing in. Put a little fat bacon in a stewpan, let it cook, then put the mutton in, and brown it a little all over, then cover it with hot water or broth, add two small onions, and four tomatoes cut in quarters, boil ten minutes, then simmer gently until done; then take the mutton out of the stewpan and keep it hot. Skim and strain the broth, boil it up, and for each pint of broth allow a quarter of a pint of rice, boil twenty minutes, and finish with two handfuls of grated parmesan and a lump of butter. Serve the rice round the leg of mutton.

Selle de Mouton Braisée (braised saddle of mutton).—Take a small saddle of mutton, remove the kidneys and the outside skin, roll the flaps under and tie it up (it is sometimes boned). Put in a stewpan three carrots, four onions, and a piece of celery (all cut up), sweet herbs, parsley, bay leaf, two olives, pepper and salt, and the bones of the meat (if it is boned); also the skin and any trimmings from it; pour a little fat broth on these, leave over the fire a few minutes, put the meat on the vegetables, add a little more fat broth, and let the meat braise gently for about three hours, turning it once or twice; when nearly done take out the vegetables and gravy; strain, and skim the latter and put it back in the stewpan; put on the fire, and glaze the saddle by basting it often with the gravy. Then untie it, place it on a dish, serve the gravy separately, and a purée of chestnuts, petits pois, or other garniture with it. Leg, shoulder, loin or any other part of mutton is dressed in this way.

Gigot à l'Eau.—Bone a leg of mutton, put it in a stewpan with some butter; let it brown a little all over, pour a small quantity of broth in, add two cloves of garlic, three or four large onions, some carrots, salt, pepper, and a tablespoonful of flour, and let the whole cook very slowly for six hours. There should be sufficient broth to cover the vegetables. The meat must be turned once or twice as it cooks, but a fork must not be stuck in it to turn it. Keep the stewpan well covered while cooking. Serve with the vegetables round.

Mouton à la Daube.—Take the meat of a leg of mutton, cut it in thick squares, lard them with pieces of bacon and of raw ham; place them in a pan with pepper, salt, and sweet herbs; pour six tablespoonfuls of vinegar over and leave for twenty-four hours. Chop six ounces of fresh fat pork, let it cook a little in an earthenware stewpan; drain the pieces of mutton, put them in with the pork, let them be over a moderate fire for twenty minutes, turning them so that they are evenly cooked, then add the pickle in which they were with a clove of garlic. Cook for ten minutes, then add half a cabbage, or if very large a quarter, some little onions, and a piece of celery root cut in pieces. Cover the stewpan with a round of paper, then with a common plate half full of water; put it on the stove, where it will simmer very gently for four or five hours. Skim and serve.

Emincé de Mouton.—Cut some cold mutton in thin slices. Put in a saucepan a piece of butter the size of a nut, and a little flour: cook them a minute or two, add some broth, salt, pepper, a few drops of vinegar, and two finely chopped shallots; boil five minutes, then put in the meat, let it cook without boiling. Instead of vinegar, chopped gherkins can be used; they are added just before serving.

Hachis de Mouton.—Take some cold mutton; chop it very finely. Put in a saucepan a lump of butter, a few sweet herbs, and chopped parsley, some cooked chestnuts, or two or three boiled potatoes, a tablespoonful of flour, pepper, and salt; stir and let all brown a little, then add some broth, and the chopped meat; let cook slowly for about twenty minutes, then serve with fried sippets or poached eggs.

Another Mince.—Take some cold mutton, remove the skin and fat, and chop it; chop an onion very small, cook it in butter until it is gold colour, shake in a tablespoonful of flour, stir for a minute, add a little stock, stir, and boil five minutes; add the meat, let it get very hot without boiling, season with nutmeg, pepper and salt, and serve with finely-chopped parsley on the top, and quarters of hard-boiled eggs round.

A GOSSIP ON PORTFOLIOS—HOW TO MAKE AND ADORN THEM.

By GLEESON WHITE.

To adorn a distinctly useful object and fittingly decorate some common thing of everyday life, has been rightly deemed a worthy aim in all living periods of art. Wherever art has flourished indigenous to the people, and not merely as a costly exotic, bought by the rich and chosen by them more for fashion's sake than love of it, the contrary has usually gained.

A Greek amphora of common earthenware has nevertheless true beauty of its own, while even in savage countries the crude art they knew is at least a flourishing living thing, and betrays the love of ornamental forms in their common domestic implements and clothing; it is the parvenu and the real Philistine who but love decoration for display, and prize it only when it is costly and looks worth the price paid for it. Not of this sort were the men who lovingly wrought the carven stones of our cathedrals. There, placed aloft where no human eye has seen it since the worker's hand left it, until some chance accident of scaffolding brings it once again within reach, we see the same patient care, the same infinite finish, that has been used for work in the sight of all men. Akin to this feeling was the desire of the old-country folks to have all their home appointments honest and good; not cotton-backed satin, or imitation oak to make a brave show, but lasting textures and solid furniture, all fit for its use, and therefore more beautiful than many a modern thing elaborately decked with ornament, that weakens and hinders the real purpose of the article which it professes to enrich.

This is an oft-preached lesson, yet to-day it is as needful as at any time, and quite to the point of this gossip, if we crown our drawing-rooms with costly bric-a-brac, and leave the useful adjuncts mean and unlovely. How often at a well-appointed writing-table some gorgeous thing in wood and metal is guileless of a scrap of that blotting-paper it professes to protect; or if the household be a musical one, and some music of a past season is required, have we not all seen the dingy, battered portfolios, with their cargo of untidy dog's-eared music, brought into sight in a room wherein they were a positive eyesore, out of keeping with all the show-splendour of the surroundings? Those who really love decoration for its own sake will not grudge the time or cost to make a portfolio comely as well as capacious; or a blotting-book a good substantial thing in place of an empty sham. This is as sensible as painting flowers on a milking stool, or embroidering an antimacassar, and needs no apology for the suggestion. If, however, display is the sole object of modern fancy art, then it would be a pity to waste time over the method to construct portfolios, for that is a distinctly useful acquisition, and admits ornamental work merely as an added thing; as a popular lecturer puts it, "The joy of the workman in his work is so great that, having wrought a thing well, out of sheer love to make it excellent as may be, he adds the final decorative touches."

It is the object of this paper to explain the various stages in the building of a portfolio, then to suggest some ways of ornamenting them. But the lesson will be badly taught if the advice to aim at strength and neatness first is not clearly insisted upon. Then by choice of more beautiful materials, or some extra decoration bestowed upon the finished work, so far as it can be added without prejudice to the regular use of the thing itself, it may be turned to a pretty trifle in appearance, as well as a lasting and serviceable object.

Better far to make half a dozen common but strong folios, and so keep all the music tidy, than to evolve one sumptuous thing, all gold brocade, tied with silken bows, for show alone, employing the unsightly bulging objects to do the real work, while the impostor swaggers with an air of being serviceable, when it is really only an excuse for displaying another piece of dexterous fancy-work, and exists merely for effect.

There are divers degrees of fitness, and for special purposes a thing may be elaborated to be almost mere ornament, and yet escape the reproach. Nobody expects an imperial crown to be peculiarly comfortable or serviceable as a head-covering, so at the other end of the scale, by parallel argument, a portfolio kept on view in an ornate room, to hold merely the last sweet thing in drawing-room songs, or the newest platitude in waltz rhythm, may be of use in its way, although quite unfit to trudge to and fro from school, bearing the well-thumbed studies and daily exercises of sweet sixteen. Finery is not vulgar in the right place, but infinitely so in the wrong one.

The art of making portfolios and blotting-books is not an abstruse one. Bookbinding has become a popular pastime, even in ducal households; hence to highly-skilled amateurs the description in minute detail of the method to make such a simple example of the craft may be as absurd as instructing a pupil fresh from the highest school course of cookery lessons how to make a piece of toast. But home bookbinding, done completely and well, demands not alone a certain amount of technical skill, but a good many important accessories which are not required for this elementary case-making.

Given paste and paper, cardboard and leather, or some texture as its substitute, and anyone may start fully equipped. When a napkin press is not available some substitute will be needed; and although it is a little détour off our main purpose, it may be as well to suggest one which is handy for many things besides pressing portfolios. It merely consists of a few common bricks packed up in cretonne, just as you would neatly wrap a brown paper parcel, but the cretonne is stitched after being so folded; then a wide tape for the string, leaving a broad loop for handle. A few of these placed upon a board are very useful for any purpose where a press is required. Even one brick so covered, with a pair of boards, covered to match, is handy in a bedroom to put upon gloves, ribbons, or laces, and take out the creases. These bricks can be made into very tasteful objects for inexpensive presents, and find a ready sale at bazaars, where any useful novelty is welcomed with avidity.

But to return to the subject, and enumerate the materials needed. Cardboard in some form, of course, preferably the common mill-board sold in large sheets from twopence to fourpence. This is less easy to cut than ordinary pasteboard, but much better to work upon, as its inherent stiffness is greatly increased by the added paper, and the tendency to warp, a property of all pasteboard, is hardly noticeable in this felt-like material. For the mculage bookbinders' paste is best, but the official paste, or stickpaste sold in bottles, answers equally well. As, however, the former is much the most economical for use in any quantity, it will be best to give the recipe for its preparation. Stir two tablespoonfuls of flour into half a pint of cold water until it forms a thick smooth cream; then add gradually, stirring all the time, boiling water in which a teaspoonful of alum has been previously dissolved; pour the whole back into the saucepan, and boil until it thickens to a paste. This will keep sweet and wholesome for several weeks, especially if a drop or two of oil of cloves has been added to the boiling water.

For the back of the portfolio leather is undoubtedly the best, but to explain its use would be to trespass too closely upon the art of bookbinding, and exact a higher amount of skill and more elaborate touch than this paper aims at demanding. Next to leather, bookbinders' cloth is naturally brought to mind, but personally I dislike it, both to use, and for its appearance after. It professes to imitate a certain material, and fails to do so well enough to deceive a baby; thus it is worse than a crime, it is a blunder. American cloth is clumsy and hideous, but very strong. On the whole nothing I have tried wears better than cretonne, when it is used over the material for the joint itself. For the joint white ticket buckram is far and away the best for amateurs' use. For small cases for dainty purposes the white surface is very pretty, and can be decorated by etching or other painted device. It is peculiarly easy to manage, it pastes quickly, does not shrink or stretch to any noticeable extent, dries firmly with a good substance, helping to keep the shape of the back, and is not costly—eightpence to tenpence a yard, double width.

Deferring for a while the actual manipulation, I wish to speak particularly of the decorative aspect of the finished book, and of a few stuffs not generally employed as covering to portfolios and blotting-books.

Only those who have tried them know how gorgeous an effect the gold tinselled brocades sold at Liberty's, and kindred stuffs, yield when pasted on book-covers. They cost two shillings to five shillings a yard, but a third of a yard suffices for a good-sized blotting-book, and about a half-yard will suffice for a music-folio. If they are rather expensive they repay their cost, and raise the portfolio to the level of a beautiful object, while in no way detracting from its use.

An adequate substitute for these brocades may be found in cretonne and printed cotton fabrics. If a good pattern is chosen, and the strings wherewith it is tied be of a colour that harmonises, the effect is only less good than the brocade.

There is more method than madness in the advice to use these materials. To keep various groups of music sorted, easily at hand for reference when required, the distinctive colour and design of each covered portfolio assists the search far more than a label on the cover, which is only visible when the whole case is uppermost in a pile. Here is a pile near me. Moskowski in red and white, Bach in a sombre green, Schubert in blue and white, modern songs in a pink flowered pattern, gavottes, minuets, and kindred pieces in a red and black cover. These colours are merely named at haphazard. A very soulful person might symbolise the hidden meaning of each tone-poet by an emblematic colour, but as I cannot fathom the esoteric mystery of such transcendental analysis, the hint must suffice.

The Japanese gold leather wall paper, to be purchased in small quantities at Hindley's, Oxford Street, is excellent for this use, being sumptuous in its appearance, of good wearing quality, and not very dear—a shilling upwards for a square yard. It is especially good for blotting-book covers, as it does not catch the dust or show chance ink spots so quickly as a woven texture.

If any of these materials are chosen, and the idea of sorting the music in variously patterned cases is adopted, a question of sizes comes next. We all know there are at least four sizes of ordinary music. First the usual English size; next the size for foreign piano-forte music, which is shorter and broader than the English; then the Peters, Augeners, and Litolf editions in upright quarto, and the piano duet and organ music of the same editions, oblong quarto. Add to these the various series of part songs and anthems, and the need for an assorted series of sizes, as well as coverings, is apparent.

The sizes, too, need sub-dividing. A methodical person likes not to let Bach keep company with Offenbach, or Schumann lieder dwell with to-day's ephemeral trivialities. So, too, violin music must be sorted from piano solo; and the possible number of portfolios needful to keep all these groups properly sorted is limited only by the quantity of sheet music the owner possesses.

Many of the thin volumes of the German editions are usefully treated if set in a portfolio exactly as blotting is added to its case, the elastic or ribbon of the back allowing the contents to be shifted at will, which is an advantage.

Add to these reasons for an ample supply of folios and their species, the effective presents they make, whether to friends or bazaars, and the special pleading on behalf of an increased popularity of this home industry must be allowed.

Now for practical tuition. Having chosen the size of the case to be made, cut the required pieces from a sheet of millboard in this fashion: Take a T square and mark upon the board to be cut pencil lines at the proper place, at right angles to the edge of the board, hence the use of T square. Take a straight flat ruler, laid close to the pencil line, and pressed there very firmly with the left hand. With a very sharp penknife draw lightly down the line, and then in successive cuts, given smoothly with a firm, sustained pressure, cut until the piece is detached. As surplus cuts are sure to result (not on fingers if care is taken to keep each hand very firm), it is as well to choose someone else's best dining table for the operation; or to place first a good thick piece of board upon one's own.

If the material is to cover the whole surface of the covers, it will be best in most cases to apply it over the buckram or cloth back, for ease in working and increased strength; so that the half-bound style, as it is called, will be enough to explain here. If corner pieces are needed, as they are in the true half binding, and are not if it is merely a foundation for after clothing, fix them as indicated in fig. 1, the first thing, while the boards are separate. Then cut out the piece of buckram or cloth for the back about an inch and a half wider than the needed thickness of the case each way, and an inch larger. Have ready a similar strip slightly shorter than the case, and not so wide as the other, to line the back. Paste the back piece and lay it on the table; then place the boards (as shown in fig. 1) down upon the back, turning over the top and bottom part, and then lining the back. See that the back piece is smooth before lining it, rubbing it, not directly with a duster, but laying a smooth, stout piece of paper over the pasted material and then rubbing it heavily with a cloth. In adding the lining to the back, see that it fills the depression between the covers, and work in close to the edge of the boards with a bone paper knife, so that it makes a shallow wide groove. Prepare beforehand marble paper, or any material chosen for the sides, cut as in fig. 2. These should be pasted in place, and the strings added as in fig. 3, before the lining paper is pasted on.

To insert the strings, cut a slit through the cover about an inch from its edge; pass the ribbon through, leaving an inch to paste down inside. Then the lining paper, cut a shade smaller than the cover each way, will secure the ties firmly.

These processes should follow each other as soon as practicable to avoid warping; but if the cover is to be of cretonne or other texture, let the back and its lining piece dry before applying the outside covering. The shape for this is indicated by fig. 4, which shows the way to use the material for the whole, without the buckram back piece.

If each of these parts is done well, the whole is well done, and finished in hardly longer time than it takes to write the directions.

For a blotting-book a piece of ribbon or elastic should be sewn in the fold of the case, under which to pass the paper.

A pretty addition to the book is shown in fig. 5, where a wider ribbon passes in and out through two slits in the cover, and ties the whole; this is very effective with brocades, cretonnes, or the Japanese gold leather papers. The idea is originally, I believe, Japanese, and used in French éditions de luxe, but practically unknown in England.

A pleasant variation from the orthodox shape of the blotting-book, made from half sheets folded across, is gained by cutting the whole sheets once across; this yields an oblong page, which is more round than the usual size, and in every way equally serviceable.

A few hints may be added. See that your covers have the corners with their proper part outside before pasting on the back. Remember that the holding powers of the case are determined by the space left at the back between the boards, and measure accordingly. Be careful in using sides of paper to paste it on parallel to the back of the case, and exposing equal parts of each corner. Paste the cloth for the back and corners a minute before use, to allow the adhesive matter to sink into the material, giving a second coat if needed just before application.

Place the case flat under weights as soon as it is finished; if you wish the back to be unwrinkled, lay a narrow slip of cardboard inside the back, otherwise the thicker covers will prevent it obtaining any of the applied pressure.

The Liberty brocades, for some purposes, are improved by a lining of silk. As this material is hard to paste, and impossible to apply to other textures, while the raw edge is unsightly, cut a piece of paper the needed size, stretch the silk over, pasting only the turned-over edge; put it under pressure, and when quite dry mount it inside the covers with a thin line of coaguline or mend-all round the edge.

To add flaps is difficult to describe, unless you think of each flap as merely another case with another back-piece—then the mystery is clear, for having made two covers into one, it is as easy to add any number in the same way.

For small folios, vegetable parchment is a pretty after-covering; as this will not take paste well, cut it and crease it over, fastening only with the lining paper, and using adhesive matter on the edge of that only, so as to avoid "cockling."

If embroidery is used, the contents of the folio, or initials of its owner, may be worked on the side. But if brocade or cretonne be used, the wide ribbon shown in fig. 5 may be embroidered with letters; in this case make four slits on the top cover, as shown in fig. 6.

Real embroidery or crewel work would give scope for much dainty design, but there is no space left to suggest any details. I mind me of a book in the studio of a certain painter, clad in old ecclesiastical broiery; and this regal specimen offers a splendid reward to those who are brave enough to undertake such coverings; but having named this king of book-covers, no meaner things must be said, but the gossip abruptly ended, with a sincere hope that my explanation is clearly set forth, and that many will reap pleasure from the pursuit here set forth.

A SURREY IDYLL.

By LILY WATSON.

CHAPTER III.

IN an incredibly short time Olive Woodford found herself installed as nurse and house-keeper pro tempore at the Manor House. She could hardly tell how it came to pass, but from the first moment of her entrance into the sick room her uncle clung to her. Perhaps his wandering memory recalled the old days when he and his sister were happy children together, and so gave the younger Olive her place in his imagination. Perhaps it was that Olive's gentle ways and nursing skill, acquired at ambulance lectures and by practical experience also, were doubly soothing, because Squire Dale had so long been unused to feminine tendance. At any rate he was as docile as a child in her hands; and though he could at first speak but little, he followed her about with loving gaze wherever her dainty figure in its white apron flitted to and fro.

The coachman's wife, a sensible, practical body, came to divide the night work with Roger, and Olive spent all her days in the sick chamber. The poor Squire had a horror of professional nurses, due chiefly to sheer ignorance of anything but the Mrs. Gamp and Betsy Prig type as portrayed in "Martin Chuzzlewit."

Olive was glad, as his dread was unreasoning, that she could save him from the necessity of having such aid. At one time his life was in danger, but he was at length pronounced convalescent.

"You cannot think what difficulty I had to get proper beef tea," said Olive to Blanche, as the sisters strolled on the Manor House lawn one bright October morning.

wanted to put in the beef just as it came from the butcher's, and boil it all up over a smoky fire. I had the greatest difficulty in getting her to cut the meat small and put it in a jar, and she would not believe a little water more or less 'made any odds.'"

"I wonder she let you teach her," observed Blanche.

"It needed the utmost care; but she is a good-hearted girl, after all," replied her sister.

"You find most people good-hearted, Olive, because you know how to approach them," said Blanche. "How do you get on with Touchstone?"

"I think the question is,

How do you get on with him, Blanche?" said Olive, looking with a smile at her sister's face. "He seems to find it necessary to spend a great deal of time at Miller's."

"A CHEERFUL GLOW BEAMED FORTH INTO THE DARKNESS."

"That is because he and Horace get on so very well," rejoined Blanche, dogmatically. "It is such fun to see Horace discoursing to him by the hour together about his parish, parishioners, and church, while Roger would evidently much rather talk about turnips and mangold wurzels."

"Do you call that 'getting on so very well'?" rejoined Olive. "And, pray, what do you and he talk about?"

"Oh, I tease him most of the time," rejoined Blanche. "I think it is only kind to divert his thoughts while he is worried about his father. And he is, oh! so grateful to you, Olive. He says you are like a good angel; that he never can thank you enough for spending your holiday like this in nursing; that he never saw anyone since his mother died to whom his father showed any affection, and so on, by the hour together."

"There is the doctor's carriage," interrupted Olive. "Roger is with his father, but I must run in and relieve him."

These visits of the doctor—"The idiot from Moorhead," as Squire Dale had first called him—were the most trying episodes of Olive's day. Doctor Dulcimer was the only medical man within convenient distance of the Manor House, was the family attendant, and bore a good reputation; but his bland urbanity of manner was peculiarly irritating to the blunt, downright Squire, who was apt to flash out into positive rudeness. Olive had consulted with Roger on the possibility of suiting the patient's humour better by calling in some other practitioner; but he had replied, truly enough, that Doctor Dulcimer was the cleverest man near, that he did not mind Squire Dale's incivility, and that, as he was an old family acquaintance and intended before long to retire from practice on his savings, it would be a pity to offend him just now.

"When he sells his practice we may get someone whom my father will take to better," concluded Roger.

Olive thought that the patient's comfort was to be considered before anything else; but when the Squire was asked if he would like to see another doctor, he declined, to his son's relief.

"Well, and how are we to-day, my dear sir?" inquired the rubicund doctor, softly rubbing his hands together as he entered the sick chamber, brightened, trim, and tidy through Olive's reign.

"I want you to tell me that!" growled the Squire. Then he added, in a very audible undertone, "Little use in having a doctor if he can't tell you how you are!"

"Just so, just so," said the doctor, affecting to laugh, and elaborately drawing a chair to the bedside. "You are always hard upon the faculty, my dear Mr. Dale. Ha, ha, ha! Well, we have our faults; but we try to do our best for our patients, I hope. And now tell me, did we have a better night?"

"We? I don't know anything about 'we'!" snarled the Squire. "You may have had a very good night for all I know; but that sleeping draught you gave me kept me awake half the time, I can tell you that much!"

"Oh, I hope not—I hope not," said the doctor, caressingly, making the mental note that of all his patients Squire Dale was the rudest; and he proceeded to further inquiries, received in the same manner, while Olive hovered anxiously near.

The patient was in reality much better, but sturdily refused to admit the fact.

"Don't send me any more of that sleeping draught!" he called to Doctor Dulcimer, as he was leaving the room, after a most unpropitious interview. "I can assure you it will be labour and physic thrown away, my good sir. Keep it for such of your patients as like to be drugged within an inch of their life!"

The doctor controlled the muscles of his face into a smile till the door had closed behind Olive and himself.

"I am afraid, my dear young lady, you find this a most harassing task," he blandly and sympathetically remarked while they descended the stairs. "Our friend—your uncle, I believe—is displaying the irritability incident to convalescence. I regret you should have so trying a patient."

"I am more sorry on your account, for with me he is always tractable and gentle," replied Olive, truthfully.

"Ah, perhaps he makes my visit a safety valve, so to speak," mused the doctor.

But after he drove away, Blanche, wandering near the porch with Roger, darted to Olive to whisper: "I very nearly asked Doctor Dulcimer a conundrum just now. 'What constellation does your patient most resemble?' Can you guess the answer? It's very easy—'The Great Bear!'"

When Olive returned to the sick room, she had to hear a long dissertation on the imbecility of doctors in general, and of Doctor Dulcimer in particular. Squire Dale was evidently so much better that Olive thought she could venture to amuse him by a little information on her private affairs.

"Why, uncle, do you know that's one of the things one would rather have left unsaid? I'm engaged to be married to a doctor!"

"What—what, my child? And a capital doctor's wife you'll make, too, Olive. But not yet—no, no. Your old uncle wants you yet awhile. He shan't have you yet."

"He won't have me for a very long while, I'm afraid, uncle," said Olive, cheerily, but with downcast eyes.

"Who is the fellow? Tell me all about him," commanded the Squire.

And Olive, nothing loth, began and told all the story of her Scottish lover—his peasant parents, his resolution to make his way, his struggles and self-denial in pinching poverty while he studied at the Edinburgh University, and, finally, his successful but ill-paid work, striving to earn a livelihood and make a home to which he could fetch his Southern bride. It was a brave and creditable story, and Olive was proud in the telling, though it went a little to her heart sometimes.

"How do you ever meet him, then?" inquired the Squire. "Four hundred miles is a pretty good distance for courting."

"I met him first at the house of Edinburgh friends," replied Olive. "But we seldom meet; we cannot. He cannot afford the journey or the time to come and see me."

It would have been against Olive's principles as a good nurse to show any distress or personal emotion in a sick room; but the tiny break in her voice was not lost upon the Squire, who appeared to ponder deeply.

"You're a good girl—a very good girl, my dear," he observed at length. "And I don't doubt this Scotchman—what's his name?—has good stuff in him. There, there! I didn't mean any harm in what I said about the profession. Every doctor, thank Heaven, isn't such an idiot as old Dulcimer, with his bromide of potassium!"

The Squire thought a good deal during the rest of that day and the whole of the next, and had a talk with Roger. On the third morning he requested to see Doctor Dulcimer alone; and to judge from the face of that medical luminary as he left the room, his patient's remarks had been of a more agreeable character than usual. Then the Squire sent for Olive.

"Yes, my dear, he says I shall be up in a day or two; but that isn't the point. He wants to sell his practice at Christmas and retire on his savings, does the old fellow. High time, too! Well, now, my dear, do you know any doctor who would be disposed to buy Dulcimer's practice? A fine opening, remember. All the town of Moorhead, pretty nigh, and all the county families round. Oh, it's worth a great deal to any competent man!"

Olive wondered for the moment if feverishness had suddenly come back again and her uncle was delirious; but a glance at him dispelled the thought.

"Why, uncle, no. How should I?"

"I thought," said her uncle, looking at her keenly, "you had a friend in the medical profession?"

The girl's heart gave a sudden leap. What could he mean?

"Perhaps your young Northerner wouldn't care to come South?" continued the old man, still bending his bushy eyebrows on his niece.

"He would if he could," replied Olive, trying to control the low voice in which she spoke. "But you know, uncle, Alan is poor—and proud."

Squire Dale suddenly put out his long, thin fingers, and gripped Olive's in his own.

"Too proud to take a present from you, eh? Then I don't think much of him. Now, my child, listen to me. I may be an invalid, but I have a head on my shoulders. You have saved my life. Don't interrupt; you have. I did your mother a wrong, many and many a year ago—yes, I did. You're very like her, Olive. I meant to remember you in my will, both to make up for that and to reward you; that was only fair and just. But why shouldn't I make you happy while I live? Why should you wait till the old man's dead and gone before having reason to be grateful to him? Now what I propose is this: You shall write to your Alan Graeme, and ask him if he will take a gift from you now, instead of waiting a few years to find he has got a wife with a little money. You shall present him with old Dulcimer's practice. We will send for him to come down here on a visit and see into things. He can stop with Roger and me; and in the spring, when the primroses are coming out in the woods, you shall let me give you a wedding breakfast in the old Manor House. Then I shall have you both near me, and abuse him like I abuse old Dulcimer."

Olive clasped her hands and could not speak. The prospect suddenly opened before her seemed too good to be true. She and Alan married, and settled in her beloved Surrey, away from the bleak Northern airs she had of late been fearing for her hard-worked lover! It was like a fairy tale.

"Uncle, I cannot thank you! It's too much—" she tried to ejaculate.

"Don't try, my dear. I owed your mother something, Olive. It is fair and right to pay it to you. And now I am sure it is time for me to have my beef tea."

A fortnight later, the moon was rising high in heaven and pouring a flood of pale radiance upon the wide Surrey landscape. There was the dusky outline of Leith Hill, with the long sweeps of undulating country below lying hushed in utter silence. The road cleaving the dim stretches of field and forest gleamed white and empty, save for one figure—that of a tall man striding rapidly along. The bag he carried proclaimed him to be a traveller. He might well have been weary, for he had been journeying many hours; but his heart was uplifted by a delight that allowed him to feel no touch of fatigue.

As he marched along his mind went over and over again through the wonderful circumstances of the past two weeks—the tidings from Olive, the astonishment on his part at the fairy good fortune thus thrown in his path, the delicate insistence with which she had overcome all scruples, and the wonder of a future thus made plain. There would be work still, but in his chosen profession; no longer in the wynds of Edinburgh, but in the breezy upland town of Surrey, with the woman he loved by his side!

Alan Graeme's past had been a laborious one. Like many a young Scotchman before him, he had pinched and almost starved himself to win the education he prized. Step by step he had fought for his laurels, and now that happiness was so nearly within his grasp he could scarcely believe his good fortune.

Surely, the farm must be nearly reached! Yes, here was the gate Olive had described. The avenue was traversed, and the moonlit gables of "Miller's" stood out against the sky.

Noiselessly lifting the latch, the happy visitor stole on tiptoe into the garden. From the latticed window on his right a cheerful glow beamed forth into the darkness like a welcome. Alan could not resist stealing up to look on the scene his heart had often pictured. Yes, there was the cosy interior, with the old-fashioned farmhouse furniture. There sat Blanche, pretty and espiègle as ever, on a low stool near a homely, stalwart fellow, whom Alan guessed to be Roger Dale.

Horace was spending the evening at the Manor House to talk over business details with the Squire about his sister's marriage. Any less partial observer than Dr. Graeme would have reflected that there might possibly be a second marriage for the clergyman brother to perform in the spring! But, after all, the others were only accessories to the central figure of the picture; for there was Olive opposite Roger and her sister, the glow of the fire reflected in her knitting needles as they moved swiftly in her nimble fingers. Her face, in its tranquil content, was fairer than ever her lover had remembered it; for she knew he was coming, though not the hour or the way. And as Alan looked, he felt, with a great throb of happiness—here is Home at last!

Home! What happiness is there that is not embodied in the word? Love, tenderness, hope, and peace—all these dwelt that night under the roof-tree of the sweet Surrey farm.

[THE END.]

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

RAFFERLY.—You should obtain Cassell's "Shilling Guide to Female Employment in Government Offices."

A THANKFUL ONE is recommended to procure the manual above-named (for "Rafferly"). You might endeavour to get a situation in the Civil Service. The style of writing to a tradesman in paying a bill, as you have expressed yourself, is very suitable.

BERTIE.—You might apply to the lady principal or secretary of the Mildmay Deaconesses' Institution (founded by the late Rev. W. Pennefather), at Mildmay Park, N. You could also write to the branch home at 15, Effra Road, Brixton, S.W.

A. S. O. E.—Write to Miss Webb, 267, Vauxhall Bridge Road, London, S.W., secretary of the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East in Zenana, Harem and Schools. This society sends out English missionary teachers, and trains native ones to instruct women and girls of all ages in Asia and Africa. There is a Zenana Medical College at 58, St. George's Road, S.W., hon. sec., Dr. G. de G. Griffith (near Victoria Station). A diploma is granted here after two years' curriculum; fees, £17 10s. a term, for board, residence, and instruction.

TWO SISTERS AND DUAL VERGINES.—In order to enter Girton College you should write to the secretary, Miss Kensington, 22, Gloucester Place, Hyde Park, London, W. You should be above 18 years of age. Cost, £105 per annum. Entrance examination in March and June. 2. Your writing is not formed.

L. A. E.—The cost of a course of lessons in cookery at the Training School, Exhibition Road, South Kensington, for "plain cookery," is eight guineas for fourteen weeks. The cost of training for the appointment of "cookery instructor," in all branches of cooking, is twenty-one guineas for the full course of twenty weeks. But there are other schools of cookery in town. Classes are held at the Crystal Palace, and there is a technical training school at 1a, Victoria Square, S.W.

MISCELLANEOUS.

QUEENIE.—The 18th June, 1850, was a Tuesday. The 18th December, 1870, was a Thursday. You must wash and dry the currants for a cake, and flour them before putting them into it.

ALEXANDER.—The letters of Royal personages are usually opened by their secretaries, however they are addressed. Contributions to the Princess Louise Home are to be sent to the editor of the "G.O.P.," who will acknowledge them in the paper.

TOM-TIT.—You must ask permission of the author, through his publisher, whose name is on the title-page, before you undertake translations of books.

Y. W. C. A.—To people who live in the country, topics such as the habits of birds and animals, and anecdotes respecting them, are interesting. The antiquities of the county, any neighbouring old castles or houses, and some practical topics, such as shoes and boots, hats and bonnets, gloves, and their history, etc.

DOROTHY.—It is for the gentleman to take the initiative, and speak to your father and mother; and of course as he has been courting you so long he has means to live upon, and is his own master, or he would not have been dishonest enough to address you without your parents' consent or even knowledge. In any case they should be told at once; and we fear they will think your conduct both deceitful and silly.

ANCHOR OF HOPE.—We think the lines are taken from a song of Lover's, called "The Shamrock." Your writing is torturing to the eyes, and you had better change it at once.

AN INQUIRER.—We would fain believe that "The Soul's Awakening" represents a girl, but the subject is suitable to either sex, is it not? And so is the poem.

ICE CREAM.—When your pardon is asked you should say, "Not at all; pray don't mention it," or some slight and gracious remark of the sort. Never say "granted," which is in the worst taste, implying that an injury had been done and a pardon was due.

AU DESEPOIR.—The 13th October, 1867, was a Sunday. You made a mistake in not bowing after you had written and spoken, and if opportunity serves you should bow and speak next time.

EVA GRACE.—If you have no plate given you at afternoon tea, you must hold the cup and saucer underneath the cake or bread and butter which you are eating, and the crumbs will drop into them; but you should make no crumbs. If you should be asked in to afternoon tea with "muddy boots," wipe them thoroughly on the door-mat as you enter the house; as indeed you should always do.

ESSY NIARAM L. should give up tea if it makes her nervous, or affects her rest at night. She need not drink milk unless she likes it; water would do instead.

ADMIRER OF KINGSLEY.—Mogadore was named after Sidi Mogodol, a saint whose tomb is on an island off the coast. It is a fortified seaport of Morocco, on the Atlantic. The neighbourhood is a barren waste, but the town has a fine appearance from the sea, and merits its Moorish name of the "Beautiful," or "A picture."

FUTURUS had better cease to walk out with her friend until he makes his intentions clear. She had better see him at home in the midst of her family in future.

MAYFLOWER.—Artemisia was a Queen of Caria. Her husband, Mausolus, was famous for his personal beauty. She erected to his memory a monument, or mausoleum, called one of the seven wonders of the world; the term has from thence been applied to all monuments of great size and splendour. She was inconsolable for her husband's death, and died two years after through grief.

ANGIOLA.—General Prim was a Spanish soldier and politician, born in Catalonia, December 6, 1814. From 1837, when he became colonel in the army of the Christians, he was constantly embroiled in some way with the politics and government of Spain. He was banished, and in 1868 directed from Brussels the insurrection which terminated in the flight of Queen Isabella, and his own triumphal entry into Madrid. He was Minister of War in Serrano's Provisional Government, and then became Marshal, Commander-in-Chief, and President of the Cabinet, 1869. As such he successively offered the Spanish throne to Espartero, Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and Amadeus of Savoy, who accepted it, and on December 27, 1870, he was shot by some unknown assassins in his carriage, and died, aged 56, December 30, the day King Amadeus landed at Cartagena.

ONE IN DISTRESS, MALTA.—"To be, to do, and to suffer," has always appeared to us to be the division of the earthly life of God's children, and He who knows best bestows the lot as He sees fit. "To be" seems, perhaps, the hardest of all, because implying an amount of self-abnegation not always agreeable to our nature. But if this lot be laid upon you, it means you are "to be" a small providence in yourself. Hope, happiness, wisdom, thoughtfulness, kindness, and sunshine must flow from you, and you must cultivate the—"Heart at leisure from itself,

To soothe and sympathise."

Remember, "God giveth to all men wisdom," so ask for it very earnestly, and begin at once. At the end of one day we think you will find that the task of Christ's service, of being your best self, is not less difficult than "doing and suffering" for Him.

K. H. (Montrose).—We think, in praying for certain things, you must ask "according to His will" only. "We see through a glass darkly," and the thing we think good to-day a year or two hence we might be thankful had not been granted to our entreaties.

TWO RUSSIAN GIRLS.—We are glad to hear from you again, and we thank you for your congratulations and kind words, as well as for the interesting particulars about the important position that salt holds in Russian ordinary life. Its symbolic use dates from the earliest times, and in the Bible constant reference will be found to it. It was an emblem of perpetuity, and a token of confirmation and fidelity. The Covenant of Salt is read of in Numbers xviii. 19, 2 Chronicles xiii. 5. As a symbol of fidelity you will find a notice in Ezra iv. 14. In the Old Testament we find all offerings were to be offered with salt—Lev. ii. 13, also see Mark ix. 49.

FRENCH READER.—The only way to find pupils would be to put an advertisement in the best English papers. You can purchase English ones in all parts of France, and can find out the addresses from them. The sums paid for English schools of the kind would be from £40 to £80 per annum, according to age. We regret that we cannot help you otherwise.

DOLLY M.—The dress must be re-dyed, for when the colour is quite destroyed, there is no other way of restoring it. The dyer will tell you what colour it will take best, or whether the same colour would do again.

ANTOINETTE M.—"Had I a heart for falsehood framed" is by Sheridan, and will be found in The Duenna (1778).

A HUMBLE INQUIRER should address the doctor, when writing to him, as "Philip Smith, Esq., M.D.," not "Dr. Philip Smith."

A DISTRESSED SUFFERER is like Mr. Ready-to-Halt, the pilgrim in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," who journeyed to the Celestial city on crutches. Will she not, like Ready-to-Halt, join Mr. Great-heart's party, and "casting aside every weight, and the sin that most easily besets her," finish her course in great joy and happiness? Perhaps not quite so blessed as Ready-to-Halt, in being carried to heaven in a chariot of fire; but still, like him, using the suffering as the ladder by which to ascend. She should read Bunyan's works; his lessons seem never finished, nor his knowledge exhausted.

PATIENCE.—If not forbidden to correspond with your friend you may continue to do so. But tact will be necessary, and you should avoid thrusting the subject of your friendship, or the name and trouble of your friend, very obtrusively before your parents. You should also endeavour to induce your friend to conciliate them, and make some sort of apology, if possible to do so with self-respect and truthfulness. "A soft answer turneth away wrath," and "follow peace with all men, by all means."

VACUNA.—We regret that we can only give you a similar answer to that which we give "Shamrock" as regards the verses, and thank you for a very nice and creditable letter. Perhaps you may compose something pretty when you have studied the art of poetical composition, as much good feeling is evidenced in your letter.

SORBERTON E. C.—Probably you have been depending on your own strength of purpose in resisting temptation. On the contrary, you should pray for the help of the Holy Spirit, and, depending on His grace, you should keep quite out of the way of temptation. May you have grace to triumph!

ELSIE GORDON.—We should think that a course of the Bath or Buxton waters would be the most serviceable to you; but you would have to consult a doctor as to which waters would be proper for your case. Many doctors prohibit the eating of meat entirely in cases of rheumatism, and we hear much of boiled celery for it—the celery to be eaten, and the water in which it is boiled to be drunk.

AMERICAN GRL.—The subscription price to the "G.O.P." would be the same, only the postage would make the difference.

PERPLEXED.—Southport would be a milder residence than Blackpool, we think, as regards climate, but otherwise we cannot say how it would agree with you.

MIMICA SANDYS.—The verses are not original, nor are they correct in metre. We could find no use for them.

M. A.; "M. H."—The depôts of the Flower Mission vary; but information may be obtained of Miss Iwisaday, 13, Eastbourne Terrace, Hyde Park, W.; or for the Bible Flower Mission, from the Mildmay Home of Industry, 60, Commercial Road, E. They will be very glad of your flowers, we are sure.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER (Dresden).—We should advise you to try and modify or change your diet. Perhaps meat, or wine, or beer have bad effects, and an exclusively milk diet, as it is called, with light puddings, brown bread, macaroni, and rice, might do you much good. We should doubt that climate has much to do with it.

PRINCESS CHRISTIAN.—See last part of the "Fairy of the Family," called "Spots and Stains." If you wish to make a collection of fossils, you should visit a place like Lyme Regis, Folkestone, or the neighbourhood of the Caves of Banwell, near Weston-super-Mare. Otherwise you should purchase them. In reference to grease spots on a woollen material, you might draw them out by placing a piece of blotting paper upon them (on the wrong side of the stuff), and passing a hot flat-iron over the paper. Otherwise you might scrape a little French chalk over the wrong side, and rub it in with the finger.

SHAMROCK.—We thank you for your nice, creditable letter, and regret that the good sentiments you expressed in rhyme are not written in correct verse. They also lack original ideas.

CARL.—Your father should get a doctor to examine his ears, as there may be water or something else needing removal. It is not necessary to go to an aurist for that.

JULIET.—You should apply at one of the great steamship company's offices for all such information. Their rules vary respectively one from the other.

RETIREMENT.—Amongst the English poets, those who hold a high and lasting place in the literature of their country are called "standard writers"; and so with reference to historians and writers on science, natural history, art, etc. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Shelley, Byron, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Tennyson, and others were authors of standard works; so also Hume, Gibbon, Agnes Strickland, Mrs. Jameson, Mary Somerville, Locke, Newton, Paley, Lubbock, Buckland, and very many others, were standard writers.

"MY DEAR, ARE YOU VERY TIRED?' SHE ASKED."

CHAPTER XX.

"BESSIE'S SECOND FLITTING."

JUST before Edna left them, Dr. Lambert came into the room. He seemed very pleased to see her, and at once offered to drive her to the station. Bessie was a little disappointed at this, for she had hoped to walk down with her friend; it would have given them time to finish their conversation; but Edna certainly looked tired, so she refrained from a dissenting word.

Edna bade her good-bye very affectionately, and begged her to write to her frequently, and just before they reached the station she said a word or two to Dr. Lambert; would he spare Bessie to them by-and-bye—not now, but a little later—for Oatlands was pleasant, even in the winter?

"Yes, by-and-bye," he returned, hastily; "but her mother cannot spare the girl now; she is not well; her strength has flagged since Hatty's death, and Bessie is her mother's crutch; but later on you shall have her, and indeed she looks pale, and in need of change, and I shall be thankful to let her go." And when he reached home he told them all of Edna's invitation to Bessie, and how he had answered her. Mrs. Lambert looked wistfully at her daughter.

"You would like to go, Bessie; it would do you good, and indeed I am growing stronger every day. I would spare you willingly."

"No, mother, I am not going to leave you just now. Why, you have not been down yet to breakfast. When you are quite well and strong I will think of it." And Bessie looked tenderly at her mother's thin faded face. Perhaps it was not quite so thin as it was, not so pinched and anxious, but there was plenty of room for improvement, and though Mrs. Lambert sighed, she could not conscientiously own that she was well. But when she was alone with her husband, she spoke to him about Bessie's looks.

"She is not like the same girl," she said, sadly. "She feels darling Hatty's loss more than the others. What does it matter about me, Herbert? A mother must think of her children before herself."

"Perhaps so," he replied, rather dryly; "but it is my duty to think first of you, my dear Dora. We both love our children, and would willingly do our best for them. I am not blind to Bessie's looks; but she is really strong, and her health will not suffer."

"No; but the change will do her good," she pleaded.

"I do not doubt it, and I wish you were strong enough to spare her; but Bessie is young enough to wait a little. It is we who are growing old, my dear, and who need to be comforted quickly; the young have their life before them." But though the doctor expressed himself after this stoical fashion, he was very tender in his manner to Bessie, and though he would not have avowed it to his wife, he watched the girl narrowly, and often took her for drives, or contrived errands for her at the other end of the town. Nay, more, he became extravagant, and brought home books for her and Christine, bidding them improve their minds, and Bessie found herself the possessor of several nice books, not wholly instructive—for "Lorna Doone," and Miss Austin's "Emma," and a "Sister's Story," by Mrs. Craven, were among them. Bessie had other little surprises that pleased her greatly; every week or two a hamper came from Oatlands—new laid eggs and cream, a chicken or two, and often a brace of partridges or a pheasant. Bessie, who was housekeeper, used to rejoice over the contents of these hampers; she knew the game would tempt her mother's sickly appetite. Many of Dr. Lambert's patients remembered that he had an invalid wife, and fruit and flowers and all sorts of delicacies found their way to the doctor's house, for the Lamberts were much respected in Cliffe, and even the poor people would step up with a couple of new laid eggs from the speckled hen, or a pot of blackberry jam, or a bottle of elderberry wine for Mrs. Lambert.

"The world is very full of nice people," observed Bessie one day, when, near Christmas, she looked at the larder shelves fairly laden with good things. One kind friend had sent them a barrel of oysters. Aunt Charlotte's contribution had been a stock of apples that would last them half through the winter. The hamper from Oatlands had been unusually rich, for a turkey and a great fat goose dangled from the ceiling, and Edna had added a rich cake and a packet of bonbons and chocolate for Ella and Katie. But the letter that accompanied it had made Bessie somewhat anxious. Edna had a cold, a severe cold, for she could not shake it off, and her mother had decided to take her to Brighton for a month or two. The doctor had recommended Hastings or Bournemouth as being warmer, but Edna had a fancy for Brighton, so her mother had taken a suite of rooms in the Glenyan Mansions—a big drawing-room overlooking King's Road and the sea, and a small dining-room leading out of it. "And we have four bedrooms," wrote Edna, "for Richard proposes to run down for a night or two now and then, and mamma suggests an invitation to you. Do you think that you could come, Bessie—that your mother could spare you? We are going on the third of January, and want you to join us a few days afterwards. Do try, there's a dear! My cold has made me so weak and miserable, and the cough will not let me sleep properly at night, so, of course, my life is not very pleasant. It will be such a comfort to have you, for I never can talk to mamma; she frets herself into a fuss over everything, and that makes me, oh, so impatient; I should like to jump into the sea! But you are such a patient, reasonable, little creature, Daisy dear, and I am so fond of you. By the bye, Richard has sent you a message. He was very particular in repeating it more than once. Let me see; oh, this is it: 'Do you not think that you owe some duty to your friends, especially when they need you? That he was sure you could do me good, and that he hoped you would make every effort to come, if only for my sake.' Was that not kind and brotherly of him? But then Richard is very much improved too."

Bessie hardly knew what she was to say in reply. Her mother was better certainly; but she could not propose to leave her. She was much surprised when her father asked her that evening if no letter had accompanied the hamper, and on her replying in the affirmative, he coolly asked to see it.

"Well," he said, interrogatively, as he handed back the letter, "what answer do you propose to give, Bessie?"

"I do not know; at least I have not thought about it," she answered.

Her father looked at her steadily.

"You have never been to Brighton?"

"Never, father."

"So much the better; it will be all new to you. Sit down and write to Miss Edna at once, and tell her that you will be glad to spend a week or two with her and her mother. Let me see, what time did she say? The first week in January; that will fit in well. I am going up to town on the seventh, and we can travel together. That will do famously, will it not, mother?"

"Do you think you can spare me, mother?" asked Bessie, anxiously. And Mrs. Lambert answered without hesitation—

"I certainly can and will spare you, Bessie, and I am very grateful to Mrs. Sefton for her invitation. My dear," as the girl still hesitated, "your father and I have long wished you to have a little holiday, so your mind may be quite at rest." And after this Bessie was satisfied.

But it was with very different feelings that Bessie left her home in the mild-tempered sunshine of that January day, to those when, seven months ago, she paid her first visit to the Grange. Things had been well with her then; no trouble since her brother's death had chequered her bright sunny existence. She had gone in holiday mood to seek fresh interests and new enjoyments; but now how utterly changed were her feelings! She could no longer look out upon the world through the rose-coloured spectacles that youth generally wears. For the second time in her life she had been brought face to face with death, and the great reality had sobered her. A deep sense of responsibility, of the inner meaning of life, seemed to cast a weight of gravity over her. A bond of sympathy seemed to unite her with all those who were in sorrow, so many were unhappy, so many had lost their nearest and dearest. Oh, how she longed to comfort them all!

Bessie was not one to speak of her feelings; the best of her life was out of sight. Only once she said to Christine, as they were walking home from church in the starlight—

"People are very proud when their relatives achieve any worldly honour or attain to any rank, yet no one seems to feel an added dignity when any dear one has finished his or her earthly conflict most gloriously, and has won a heavenly crown. Why is it, Chrissy? Somehow it seems such an honour to me to feel I have a sister as well as a brother in heaven; it makes one more careful not to do anything unworthy of them."

Bessie's grey eyes had a softer look in them than they had of old; her voice had grown more gentle. Mrs. Sefton, who was at the station, hardly recognised the girl as she came quickly towards her; the black dress and crape bonnet made her look older, but when she smiled it was the same Bessie.

"My dear, are you very tired?" she asked, looking at her kindly. "It is such a cold evening that I dare not let Edna come with me, for her cough is still troublesome. I had some difficulty with her, but at last I got my way. Edna is not nearly so self-willed as she used to be." But here Mrs. Sefton sighed.

"Do you think Edna is really better?" asked Bessie, when the carriage door was closed, and they drove away from the station.

"I do not know," returned Mrs. Sefton, in a troubled voice. "Dr. Milton assures me that there is nothing radically wrong with her health, only want of tone and a severe cold; but I cannot feel comfortable about her; she is losing appetite and flesh, and her spirits are so variable. She is not happy, Bessie, and she cannot always hide her feelings from her mother. Richard says that we can do nothing; but how are we to go on like this?"

Bessie hardly knew what to answer; she was full of sympathy for the anxious mother; she knew Edna was her one thought in life, and that no happiness was possible to her if her child suffered. They were in the King's Road now, and the brightly-lighted shop windows almost dazzled Bessie. On the opposite side she could see a dark line that was evidently the sea; a dull, heavy surging of waves broke on her ear; now and then the splash of the white surf was clearly visible.

"Edna is young," she said, vaguely; but after all there was scant consolation in this truism, for the young suffer very keenly; a sense of impatience, of injustice, aggravates their pain. The old accept their strokes more meekly; their reason comes to their aid. "Man is born to trouble," they say, and the philosophy enables them to endure at least with some show of dignity.

"Yes, she is young; perhaps she may be consoled," replied Mrs. Sefton, with another sigh; and then the carriage stopped. "Our rooms are on the first floor," observed Mrs. Sefton, as they stood in the large, brilliantly-lighted hall, and she conducted Bessie up the staircase and down a narrow corridor, and then into a long, well-furnished drawing-room, where they found Edna.

She was sitting on a low chair, looking at the fire, but she sprang up and welcomed Bessie warmly.

"My dear little Daisy, how delighted I am to see you!" she said, with something of her old animation. "Mamma, is it not delicious to have her again? Sit down there; you look tired and cold, and I mean to wait on you. Mamma, the tea is all ready, and I am going to pour it out. Take off your warm jacket, Bessie; oh, and your bonnet too; and then you will look more like yourself."

Bessie did as she was bidden, but her eyes followed Edna's graceful figure. How delicate she looked—far, far too pretty! She was almost dazzling to-night. The ruby velvet set off her fair hair and white skin; her face was flushed, and her eyes were too bright; and as she moved about Bessie heard her cough once or twice—a hard, dry cough. But there seemed nothing wrong with Edna's spirits to-night. She was evidently overjoyed to have her friend with her again; she talked and laughed after her old fashion.

"You will be sure to like this place, Bessie," she said. "The shops are delightful, and it is so amusing to see the people; and the sea is magnificent. I have my ponies here, so we can have plenty of drives; and there are some people that we know at the Bedford. We don't intend to mope, mamma and I; we are going to the grand bazaar at the Pavilion, and there are some first-rate concerts. But you shall be as quiet as you like," with a sudden change of tone, as Bessie looked grave; "your only duty will be to talk to me. Now I will show you your room, and you shall unpack and get ready for dinner."

Bessie was not sorry to be left alone in her comfortable room. When she had finished her unpacking, she put on her best cashmere dress, with its soft white frilling, and fastened a few white flowers at her throat. Then she sat down before the fire, and had a quiet quarter of an hour before Edna came in search of her and carried her off.

All the evening Edna was as merry as possible. She played several of her favourite pieces, and even sang a little; only as the evening drew to its close she began to have a white, exhausted look; but she followed Bessie into her room, and sat down on the rug, with the evident intention of having a talk.

"Edna, you must not stay; you look far too tired," remonstrated Bessie; "and we shall have plenty of time for talk to-morrow."

"But I like fireside talks best," replied Edna, wilfully; "and I am not inclined to sleep yet. I do hate the night!" with sudden petulance. "It is so stupid to lie awake and watch the fire go out, and count sheep jumping through a gap in the hedge; anything to cheat oneself into oblivion. Do you sleep well, Bessie?"

"Yes, always; trouble never keeps me awake. I always think of Hatty when I lie down, and wonder what she is doing, and what the angels are teaching her, but I fall asleep in the middle of a thought, and it is morning before I wake."

"Oh, you have a good conscience," replied Edna, bitterly; "you have no remorseful thoughts to goad you into wakefulness. If one could only have one's life over again, Bessie! I want you to help me, while you are here, to think what I had better do. I cannot go on like this. Is there anything that I can do? Any work? If it were not for mamma, I would go to some hospital and learn nursing; it is too dreadful living like this just to amuse oneself, and try to forget. I must do something, something for the good of myself, if not for my fellow-creatures."

Bessie listened to her with some surprise. Edna's manner was excited; she looked feverish; her voice had a hard ring in it.

"Tell me what I must do," she said, fixing her large eyes on Bessie.

"Dear, you must get well first," replied Bessie, tenderly. "You are far from strong; your mother is right, Edna."

Edna shook her head impatiently.

"It is nothing—a cold; what does it signify? How can one feel well with all these worrying thoughts? It is work that I want, Bessie—work that will take me out of myself and make me forget."

"Are you sure that God wishes you to forget?" asked Bessie, softly. "Oh, my dear," stroking her hand, "you can never say again that I do not know what trouble is, that I cannot feel for you; but I have learnt that we must not run away from our trouble; girls so often talk like that," she went on, "about going into a hospital, but they do not know what they want. Nursing is too sacred a work to be done from such a motive. What good would such a work, undertaken in a selfish, self-seeking spirit, do them? Edna, when God wounds He heals, but it must be in His own time, and in the proper place; and even troubles caused by our own recklessness must come under this head."

"But, Bessie—"

"Wait a minute, dear; I seem to see it so clearly. You have work, only you are throwing it aside and asking for more. 'Thou camest not to thy place by accident; it is the very place God meant for thee.' Don't you remember those lines? Surely, surely an only daughter's place must be with her mother; to make her happy must be no light duty. You are her one thought from morning to night; it breaks her heart to see you unhappy. Edna, if your mother died, and you had not tried to make her happy!"

"Do you mean—oh, I see what you mean, but I am too selfish to find it out for myself. I am only thinking of my own good, not of her at all. I have never been good to her; she gives all, and I just take it."

"Make her your work," whispered Bessie, "and by-and-bye comfort will come to you, as it would not in any hospital, in any self-chosen duty; for where God puts us, He must find us, or we shall have to give an account of why we have erred and strayed," finished Bessie, reverently.

ART AND HEART; OR, DECORATION FOR THE POOR.

By C. HARRISON TOWNSEND.

The arches that we have mentioned as occurring at either end of the room seemed to offer the point of departure for the decorator's work. These, then, which the reader will remember are about seven feet wide, are filled with semi-circular panels of naturalistic flower subjects, painted in oil on a gold ground.

It has taken us some time and many experiments to arrive at the best gold ground for our decoration work, in which of course it plays a fairly important part. For instance, we have tried in vain to find a gilded American cloth which did not turn black and cloudy after it had been exposed some time to the action of the light. Even varnishing this material does not seem to prevent this occurrence. Japanese leather papers, however, seem to meet the difficulty, the gold ground was allowed to half assert itself. The flower subjects, painted in bold and firm style, were selected as types of the four seasons, and represented for spring, Pirus Japonica; summer, purple clematis; autumn, sunflower; and winter, Christmas roses.

The key elevation of one end of the ward on page 117 and the engraving on the opposite page show the over-mantel, which forms another part of the scheme. It is a cheap and simple design, and, as the reader will see, is adapted—as regards the lower centre panel—to accommodate itself to an existing gas bracket, the position of which the authorities did not wish to alter. It consists of a centre portion, framed by slim pilasters carrying a top shelf, and of two side panels, about a foot wide and two feet high, in which are placed various wards of the hospital are connected by wide corridors, and out of one of these, and separated from it by a couple of arches some eight or nine feet wide, is the day-room in question. It forms, in fact, a kind of bay in connection with the corridor, and is a spacious room, thirty-one feet long by twenty wide, and about twelve feet high. At either end is a fireplace, with stone jambs and mantel slab. On each side of these chimney-pieces is a recess about seven feet wide, and with a circular or arched head. The room is lighted by two wide windows. The society was fortunately asked to lend its aid just before the periodical repainting of the hospital was undertaken, and they were willingly allowed a voice in deciding the colour treatment of this ward. They were thus able to prepare a scheme of colour ab initio.

The dado round the room is painted a warm brown, and the walls above are distempered a warm buff, whilst the mantels, etc., are painted grey green—the tint that decorators understand and describe as “duck’s egg green.” (The best materials, by the way, for arriving at this particular tone are lamp-black, chrome yellow, and white, mixed “to taste,” as cooks say of their recipes.) The ceiling of course remains white and to give one what is wanted—a gold-faced material, the brilliancy of which is likely to last. As a matter of fact, we may say, in passing, that this merit is due to the fact that the Japanese do not rely upon a cheap—and consequently adulterated—gold for their surface. Their paper is covered in manufacture with “white metal” leaf, and this is protected from the action of the air by being coated with lac or lacquer. The lac is transparent, and of course by mixing with it a transparent yellow medium any desired golden effect may be obtained. Japanese gold paper is principally imported into this country by Messrs. Rottmann, Strome, and Co., St. Mary Axe, and is made in different varieties, either smooth or embossed in pattern, or of morocco leather surface, etc.; and in various tones of gilding. Its price varies from 18s. to 30s. the piece of nearly twelve yards, and it is generally one yard wide.

For the purpose we are now describing we made use of the plain surface, highly varnished, and bright gold ground. A reference to the illustrations in the last article will show that the flower subjects did not cover the whole of the semicircular panels or “lunettes.” A space of about ten inches was left round the circular part of the panel, and this was filled with the conventional wreath or “swag” work shown on the engraving, executed in brown, semi-transparent paint, through which two canvas panels. These oil paintings represent “Work” and “Rest.” The oblong panel above the gas jet contains the motto of the Kyrle Society, “To the Utmost of our Power.” Executed in American bass wood; the cost of this over-mantel, unpainted, was 25s. Both it and the existing stone mantel-piece are painted shades of greyish green, as mentioned above. Detail D, on page 117, shows the stencil pattern which has been executed on the jambs and head of the mantel-piece. It is executed in dark and light greens as regards the leaves, and the blossoms in pale blue and salmon tints. It is, we may say, perfectly easy for the art amateur to prepare his or her own stencil-plates. The design is transferred to the oil-paper that is sold for copying books, and with a sharp knife the part forming the pattern can then be cut out. Care must be taken, though, to leave what are called "bridges"; that is to say, spaces of paper are left uncut to prevent too great a space of perforation and the consequent falling to pieces of the stencil-sheet. A better way of repeating the designs to any extent is, however, that which was generally practised by the old decorators. The pattern was cut out as if for stencil-work, and was "pounced" over at the back with powdered chalk. This left an indication of the design, which was then worked over by hand. Thus the hard, mechanical, and print-like effect of the stencil was exchanged for the greater freedom of work resulting from the use of the freehand brush.

Part of the scheme of decoration in the ward we are treating of has not yet been carried out. The walls, as we have said, are in tone a warm buff. Above the dado it was intended to run a six-inch band of conventional foliage design; and further, a frieze, fifteen inches deep, would run round the room, separated from the wall proper by a two-inch wood moulding. Both of these would be a blue design on an ivory ground. An inscription or motto would be carried by the frieze, of which we give an illustration. We do so because, although this part of the work is not at present to be carried out, yet we think the way in which it would be executed offers hints to our readers. The pattern part of the frieze is bought ready made, printed in oil (and hence washable) on canvas. It is a new material that has come into general use in place of wall papers, and is known as the "Patent Sanitary Wall Hanging." As regards cost, the design we illustrate, printed in almost any two colours, is 1s. per yard. The lettering is then worked out (in the present instance in a dark green oil paint) by the volunteer artist, artistic perception being called into play to arrange the letters so as to gain a good effect by interlacing them over and under the sprigs of the design. Their outline should be traced round with a line the colour of the ground, and about an eighth of an inch in thickness. This emphasises the form of the letters. And here we may indulge in another digression; for the reader must please understand that the pieces of decoration of which we write are brought forward more as pegs upon which to hang an account of the Kyrle Society's experiences than as models of decorative work described for their own sake.

We find that the question of lettering, by which we mean the selection of the kind of letters to form our various inscriptions, mottoes, and texts, is an important one. Common sense and experience both lead us to advocate the use of a simple alphabet, and one more easily "understood of the people" than either the Lombardic, German, or Old English, with which church and schoolroom decorators have made one but too familiar. To be artistic, an alphabet need not be illegible. A letter of Roman type may be a beautiful thing, granted that thought has arranged that its proportions and curves should be the best. So much is this the case that Albert Dürer himself did not disdain to write a book on the subject, and to design alphabets which to the present day stand as models of what letters should be. The illustration we give is an example of some of these. The letters are elegant in themselves, and possess another merit as great as that of their beauty, that is, legibility. The people we cater for have not been educated up to "Gothic" or "Old English" letters, and it is not fair to embarrass them with an inscription that is intricate and hard to read.

Another of our illustrations in this number shows part of the scheme of decoration at the Girls' Recreation Room, Nelson Square, Southwark. Here a frieze, about two feet deep, has been painted on twilled canvas, the background of the work being the grey tone of the unpainted canvas. The conventional foliage is executed in shades of sage green, with pale lemon blossoms, and is broken at the corners of the room and in the centre of each wall by dwarf pomegranate trees, with rabbits seated under. The walls of the room are coloured terra-cotta. The effect of the frieze—thanks in great measure to the soft and receptive nature of the canvas on which it is painted—is very soft and pleasing.

Apropos of this material we may here digress again so far as to say that in all our hospital work we make it a rule that the decoration that the society presents to such places shall be executed on glazed or varnished surfaces. That every object in a ward shall admit either of being washed or removed and cleaned is, we find, a condition generally imposed on us by the medical authorities. But in such rooms as parish rooms, institute halls, and clubs we allow ourselves more latitude.

As an example of our inexpensive scheme of treatment, let us describe the Working Men's Institute, St. Barnabas, Edgware Road. The grant for this, made by the committee on the basis of the Visiting Members' report, was £4. This defrayed the cost of a band of light-green American cloth, on which are painted flowers somewhat naturalistically executed. Oval panels at intervals are treated as landscape subjects, and between them runs a lower band of autumnal leaves, in dull reds and browns, painted on the same material. The members of the club or institute were proud of the opportunity of putting up their decoration, and thus saved the important item of "Man's time, so much an hour."

At the Girls' Institute, St. Mary's, Hoxton, there has been carried out a still cheaper scheme. The material is bronze-green American cloth, which the manufacturers now prepare with a rougher and less highly glazed surface than the old make. There are three door panels, having as subjects arum-lilies, iris, and clematis, and a long, narrow panel of water-lilies and marsh marigolds for the mantelpiece. On each side of the door is a figure panel, the subjects being Joan of Arc and Grace Darling. Another flower group contains old George Herbert's fine lines:—

"A servant by this clause
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws
Makes that and th' action fine."

There were given in addition three other flower panels, and a body of volunteer workers painted an Indian-red dado round the room. Exclusive of a mantel-hanging and curtains worked by a member at her own cost, the expense of this decoration did not exceed £2.

The other illustration in this number shows one end of the long room or hall the society has lately decorated for the Sisters in charge of the All Hallows Mission, Southwark. The room is used for all kinds of school and parochial purposes, but more especially for the assembling together of the girls under the charge of the mission. One end of it is occupied by a stepped gallery, and the walls are unplastered, and are distempered cream colour, with the exception of the dado, which is painted dark red. Those forming the two sides of the room have, at intervals, brick pilasters, about 18 inches wide, and twelve in number. The decorative project took advantage of these, and has placed a high panel on each. These contain flower subjects, filling the lower portion of the picture, while tree branches—such as those of the apple-tree and weeping willow—or flights of birds, occupy its upper part. Each panel (executed on a dark red ground) occupies the width of a pilaster, and is framed in a deal moulding stained dull black.

The "Three Virtues" are commemorated in a scroll over the gallery in the form of the words, Humility, Obedience, Charity, one of these words being in each of the three spaces into which the wall is divided by its pilasters. Reference is thus made to the figure subjects (partly shown on our illustration). They are about six feet high by two and a half wide, and represent "St. Christopher bearing the Infant Christ," "St. Francis Preaching to the Birds," and "St. John the Baptist surrounded by six Apostles"—the latter after the beautiful Lippo Lippi in the National Gallery. All the figures are painted on a gold Japanese paper, not smooth in surface as that we have just mentioned in connection with the Victoria Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, but with an embossed design, selected as not being too Japanese in pattern to accord with the subject executed on it. Over this bright gold background was passed a sponge containing amber, straight from the tube, and with turpentine—but no oil—as medium. The result is a rich brown tone of gold, and the effect gained is decidedly happy. The border around the Lippo Lippi (see sketch) is executed in the same method, out in a stronger shade. The frieze around the room contains the quotation from Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner":—

"He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us
He made and loveth all!"

It is painted in light yellow letters on an Indian-red ground, the material being prepared canvas. Above and below this inscription are placed borders of "Lincrusta Walton," a material with which most of our readers will be acquainted. It is one of which the Society's decorators have made considerable use. It is not expensive; the designs are for the most part good; it is easily fixed, and it takes colour well. A four or six inch border forms an effective frame when placed around a wall picture, and treated well in colour.

The initial letter to this article also forms an illustration of a series of panels that the Society placed some years ago in the Baker's Row Playground, "an open space" bought for and dedicated to the use of the Whitechapel poor by some philanthropists. The work is executed in oil, on sheets of zinc, which is a material we consider most suitable for work intended to stand in the open air exposed to the weather. The panels are further protected by a prettily-treated pent-house roof of wood.

MITTENWALD. AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER V.

"Given: a log of wood;—Make: a fiddle."
—Problem.

HAVING watched the pieces of pine and maple, with all their pent up forces, gradually assuming familiar shapes under the hands of skilful workmen, we leave them for a time in order to look about for some agent which shall not only support and draw together these two graceful tables, but have power to release the sweet sounds which lie within them, and give life to that mysterious something which is to bind them to mankind and enable them to take part in the songs of angels.

If these tables are to tell out their strange and wonderful secret of sympathy and of harmony, they must be brought together by a bond which shall be in harmony with them, sensible of their emotions and capable of reflecting them. It must be willing to convey and mingle the sweet sounds of both one and the other without intruding its own identity, and as a preparation for this solemn work it must be willing to submit itself to the knife, fire, and water.

Is there anything animate or inanimate which would be willing so utterly to sink itself in order to bring out the sweetness of others?

This question was often asked by the old Italian masters in their search for, what seemed, the impossible. They knew well enough that unless they could light on such an agent their aspirations after fame would come to naught and their instruments turn out failures.

Those who had spent so much love and devotion on these tables knew how very fastidious they were, and that though willing enough to give forth their richest and sweetest sounds as long as they were treated with dignity, they could yet scold like angry women if any attempt were made to unite them by means of an unworthy or unsympathetic agent, showing decidedly that "Evil communications corrupt good manners."

This explained the masters' earnestness and perseverance in seeking a proper support for their upper and lower tables, and at length, after making many experiments, they were rewarded by the discovery that ribs or sides of maple, corresponding in character to the lower table, would answer every requirement.

As the Mittenwaldians follow in the steps of the old Italian violin makers, we were not surprised on entering another room of the factory to find a number of workmen engaged on long strips of this particular wood, which they were planing to a thickness of about $\frac{1}{4}$ th of an inch.

This being done, they were passed on to others who cut them into short lengths, according to a pattern which decided both width and length. Six of these were necessary for one violin.

We now witnessed an interesting process, that of fitting and bending them to the model. I have not spoken of the moulds or models further than to say that they were very good; but in order to make clear what we saw done with these strips of maple, we would mention that there is an inside solid mould round which the instrument is built up, little by little, and an outside frame or mould inside which the building grows.

In order to get the strips to the position they are to occupy in the violin they must be bent to the curves of the upper and lower tables; this is done by dipping them two or three times in water and compelling them to the required form by means of heated irons, much in the same way and on the same principle as a boat-builder deals with the planks he is going to use for his boat.

This process, to be effectual, must be gradual; the consequence of hurrying it would be either to snap or warp the wood. Supposing it to be done properly, the sides are pressed round the inner mould and joined by means of glue. No nail or metal is ever employed in uniting the various parts of the instrument, and how exquisitely these joins are made one can see by taking up any decent violin.

These six bouts (the proper name for the sides), which are to support the two tables, have assistance given them in their arduous task by twelve linings and six blocks, which give, says Otto, to the inside of the violin the appearance of an Italian guitar. All these work harmoniously together for the good of the whole.

As we stood watching the admirable way in which one part after another was bandaged and put in stays, we fancied it not unlike being in a hospital ward looking at a skilful surgeon binding up broken limbs.

There is still something to be done before the box can receive the upper table, which is as important to the well-being of the violin as is the heart or the nervous system to a human being.

The sound-post is to be put in, and in such an exact and exquisite manner as to make it part and parcel of the upper and lower tables, in fact as if it grew from one to the other.

It takes a very skilful workman to adjust this post as well as to form it; it is a little round prop of fine, even-grained pine; it must not be a shade too long or it would force the back and belly apart; it must not be an atom too short or it would fall when the strings were let down.

So important is this sound-post that the French call it the soul of the violin. It is a tiny thing, but it does a giant's work; for example, it regulates the power and quality of the sound, it performs the functions of the heart with unerring regularity. It communicates to the back the succession* of shocks given to the strings by the bow; it has the same effect upon the upper and lower tables as the bow has upon the strings, and not only so, but it continues the vibrations and keeps them regular with one another. "Through it," says Mr. Haweis, "pass all the heart throbs or vibrations generated between the back and belly."

Having secured the heart, the next thing to do was to provide the nervous system of the violin. This was done by making a bar of fine, soft, even-grained pine, and placing it inside the upper table from end to end, in a slightly oblique direction, under the left foot of the bridge. This is called the bass or sound-bar, and is a curious and deeply interesting part of the instrument, and so very sensitive is it to external touch that it is spoken of as the nervous system of the violin. If it by chance get out of place or out of order, or is made of wrong material, the violin is attacked by a nervous fever known to violinists as wolf-notes. In selecting material of which to make this delicate organ care is taken to get the pine which yields the highest note when struck.

The work allotted to the sound-bar is that of transmitting to the entire belly, or upper plate, the vibrations communicated to it by the left foot of the bridge, and to prevent them from entering into a series of segmental vibrations. Nor is this all: it is its duty to strengthen the belly to bear the heavy pressure of the strings, and to be in perfect harmony with the bridge. But who is to know the exact dimensions of this bar—how thick it is to be, how strong? It takes a lifetime of study, and only the most skilful of the workmen are entrusted with the work.

The sound-bars put in by the old Italian masters have all become too weak for the modern high pitch, and there is scarcely one but has had its sound-bar replaced, otherwise they could not have borne the present increased tightness of the strings.

The bar requires the most delicate handling;

* If any one should care to know how the vibration is communicated by the sound-post from one table to another she can do so by a very simple experiment. Have a saucepan of boiling water on the fireplace, one end of a poker on the lid, the other to the ear or between the teeth, and she will hear the sound of boiling distinctly, the sound being conveyed more readily through the solid iron than through air.

to force or confine it is to harden the sound and change the wood into steel. As a proof of this the following true story is told:—

There lived long ago in Paris a certain amateur, whose collection of violins was most choice and formed all his worldly wealth; every penny he possessed went in the purchase of violins. There were instruments by Amati, by Guarnerius, by Straduarus, and even a real Stainer. He was content, and his ambition satisfied, when suddenly he discovered that the famous violin ordered by a certain marquis of Straduarus had been brought to Paris.

It had lately been rebarred in Italy and badly done, but its beauty was incomparable, it was a perfect picture. For a collector the temptation to possess it was very great, and the amateur of whom we are speaking was not strong enough to resist it; he felt he must have it at any cost. And so he sacrificed several superb violins in order to acquire one whose sounds were decidedly noisy, harsh, intractable and strong, yet without substance.

There was no doubt about its beauty; it was perfect both in form and colour; it had every quality that could attract notice, and a handle and corners whose angles were perfect; such, indeed, as one finds in the models of Straduarus, which have no rival. And so this amateur having made the sacrifice, became the possessor of this squealing, howling thing, and, strange to say, he was not dissatisfied, for taking into consideration the wood, the maker, the model, he felt sure that this vice did not belong to it by nature, but was occasioned in some way by a misunderstanding between the sound-bar and the bridge; and he was right. The violin was untabled, the operation performed, and the substitution of an elastic pine bar for one of wood quite unsuitable, worked wonders. Its singing at once resembled its plumage, and it was difficult to know which most to admire, its beauty or its excellence; at all events the amateur was content, for he was heard to say that an empire could not tempt him to part with his king of violins.

Leaving the bass or sound-bar to be glued on to the inside of the upper table in such a manner as to lead us to believe it had grown there, we must return to the sides or bouts for a few minutes; they are in readiness to be fixed on to the upper table as soon as the bar is dry, and so far all is right. Their office and self-denying work have been explained; but something has been left unsaid concerning them which is of the utmost importance to the violin—viz., that the instrument must breathe, and can no more live without air than we can. The sounds which issue from it owe their sweetness and intensity entirely to the proper measure of air within its body, and this in its turn depends upon the height of the sides.

If there is want of exactitude in measuring the air, inequality of the sounds will result; they will be slumbering when they should be flying, or launching forth when they should pause, and so, acting with too much haste, would get entangled or broken.

It seems that Amati and Straduarus both made some slight alteration in the depth and curves of the sides, one making them a trifle deeper, while the other extended the curves; but these deviations only occur in a few of their instruments; in every case, however, they were in harmony with the two tables whose servants they are.

This regulating the air is a most difficult point to crop up just as we think we have seen the body completed, for who is to know to a hair the depth of the sides which will enclose a certain volume of air in the box, and who is to know the exact amount of air which is to be enclosed? And yet this is the very essence of violin-making.

Several of Straduarus' violins were tested by Mons. Savart, who found in every case that the sound yielded by the mass of air within each was equal to one hundred and twelve vibrations in a second, and this is what every violin-maker strives for in the disposal of his materials. He must know to a hair what is needful to facilitate the undulation of the air, to make it oscillate within like the pendulum of a clock, and to prevent its jerking or shaking. We shall find as we go on that the regulation and measuring of the air for the violin is quite as indispensable to its life and action as it is for human beings in a hospital ward. We shall see this more clearly when we come to the make and use of the bow.

The upper table now being fixed to the bouts, the box or body is complete, with heart, nerves, and supports all ready for work in the new life about to set in; but it must have an ornament, if in all things it is to be like those of the old masters. This ornament is called purfling, and is a nice finish to the body. "Its only real use," says Ed. Heron Allen, "is that it preserves the edges of the instrument from splintering, by binding the fibres together as with a border.

Purfling is an inlaid border that marks the inner edge of all violins, the double purfling being a sign of the Brescian school. We watched it being fitted round the back and belly, and tapped into its place by a little hammer. This being done, the body is finished in the white, as it is called, and must be laid aside while we see the other parts made ready.

USEFUL HINTS.

Grilled Breast of Mutton.—Boil the mutton in the stock-pot; when done drain it, and brush it over with oil; dip it in breadcrumbs mixed with chopped parsley and shalots; broil and serve with piquante sauce.

Epaule à la Sainte-Menchould.—Bone a shoulder of mutton and braise it, take it out and drain it, dip it in breadcrumbs, then stir a little oiled butter into three yolks of eggs, brush this over the breadcrumbs, and then put a second layer of crumbs with a little butter over and put in the oven to brown; when brown serve with the gravy from the braise, strained and reduced. Breasts or necks of mutton are very good dressed in this way; the bones can be removed after they are braised.

Epaule Fourrée (stuffed shoulder of mutton).—Bone a shoulder of mutton, take half a pound of sausage-meat, cook it in a little butter until it is a light brown, add some chopped mushrooms to it, and see that it is rather highly seasoned; put this in the shoulder of mutton, tie it up securely, then braise, and serve with gravy from braise.

Mouton au Persu.—Take a piece of the best end of the neck of mutton; remove the skin and rub the meat with chopped onions, parsley, and oil; leave it two hours. Take some branches of parsley about two inches long, having one leaf at the top of each; with the larding needle run these into the mutton; salt the meat and brush it over with butter, wrap it in buttered paper, and bake in a hot oven for about twenty-five minutes, basting often; serve with gravy and a dish of haricots.

Haricot de Mouton.—Cut some neck or breast of mutton in pieces; brown them slightly with butter in the stewpan; take them out and make a thickening with butter and flour; cook until a light brown; add some broth, sweet herbs, parsley, salt, pepper, and a clove of garlic; then put in the meat, cover and let it cook. Boil some French beans in water; when the meat is nearly done, drain the beans and add to the meat, and let them simmer. Haricot beans, carrots, or turnips are used when French beans cannot be had.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

THE "LITTLE LORD FAUNTILEROV" DRESS FOR A BOY.

THE best occasions undoubtedly for the study of the newest ideas in dress are usually the private views of the two great galleries—viz., the Royal Academy and the Grosvenor. To these has now to be added the "New Gallery," the private view of the "Stuart Exhibition" attracting nearly everyone great in rank, literature, and art. This year, in the general remarks I have made on the dress worn, I see that "best dress" (as one would call it), silk or satin, velvet or brocade, has disappeared, and in its place we have the woollen gown, perhaps united with velvet or silk, but oftener not, of daily wear—the kind of gown that one could wear at any hour of the day. I saw fewer tailor-made gowns than at any former private views, though there were several ladies present who wore the stout Irish homespun and rough tweeds, made up without any other admixture of material, but few if any of the gowns bore any decidedly tailor-made stamp. The feeling for the "Directoire style" has very evidently been on the increase, as the "redingote" jacket and bodices, with the well-known revers, abounded. But the gowns worn were the ordinary walking gown of the day, and "smart dress" was nowhere. This change has been coming on for a long time, and has been visible to the prophetic eye, for as the years pass we women are following the example set us by men, and are becoming more simple in daily dress; and what an economy it will be when there are but two styles of gowns to provide for—viz., that of daily life and the gala-dress needful for those who go into society!

The general aspect of everybody is distinguished by long and graceful lines. Nothing is bunched up nor gathered, and steels have vanished from the dresses entirely, while the cushion, if worn, is not obtrusive. The gown is arranged in pleats behind at the waist, and in order to make these stand out they are stuffed with wadding or cotton-wool, and in the newest gowns all the "dress improver" that there is, is made in this manner. But it does not extend to the sides, and it is only at the back of the waist, at the very extreme top, where the "improver" exists at all. The fronts of the skirts are plain, or else they are gathered about two inches down, and there are small folds at the sides. All the fulness is reserved for the back.

The "Directoire redingote," with flat sides, pleated back, square pockets on the hips, loose front, revers reaching to the shoulders, and the vest and the petticoat of a different material, seems to be more worn than anything else for out of doors. But whatever style is worn, these full but plain skirts are invariable. Wide sashes are used both at the back and sides, being perhaps more usual at the back than at the sides. The sleeves also show a great amount of alteration. They are often made of a different material to the dress, or they are puffed all the way down to the elbow; or, again, they may have a pointed trimming which reaches nearly to the elbow, outside the arm. This trimming is generally of the same passementerie as that employed to trim the dress. Sometimes a long strip of an entirely different material is let in from the shoulder to the wrist. Some of the new bodices have one side made quite differently to the other. For instance, one side may be a polonaise, the other side a basqued bodice, and the polonaise side may be trimmed with fur, while the basque side may be plain. The old-fashioned bodice with the point at the back, the same as in front, is also seen, and some of them are corded round, and have the fulness at the back of the skirt gathered in and sewn round it.

At the Grosvenor "private view" there was a great deal of braiding worn, many of the out-of-door jackets being covered entirely with it, and the braid laid on upright sometimes, the idea being a red cloth foundation with black braiding on it. The waistcoat-fronts of many of the dresses were in this style: black braid on a white cloth ground being a generally favoured idea. There is also a very general rage for all kinds of embroidery in gold, black, brown, etc., and they all look handsome and suitable on the cloth dresses so much used, and moreover are not expensive to buy. All kinds of Oriental embroideries are worked in for the gowns made in the "Directoire" style. The trimming is used for the open fronts for the revers, the sleeves, and the cuffs.

The tea-gown is as much worn as ever. In fact, it seems to be gladly welcomed this winter weather by people who are afraid of exposure to draughts of air, and who yet have to make some change in their dress in the evening. The new tea-gowns are more open in the front, and have, as a rule, the high "Medici collar," which suits them so well. The fronts are of soft silks, in folds of handsome brocade of lace over coloured satin, or of fine Oriental embroidery, which has a very good effect.

And now I must devote a small space to hats and bonnets. The very large "Directoire bonnet," with wide open fronts, is seen, and so are the large "Directoire hats"; but side by side, and quite as popular, I find the tiny bonnets without strings, which are illustrated in "Dress in the Park." These require a good deal of hair in the front, of course, as the edge of the bonnet is not at all visible. Black hats and bonnets are a great deal worn; the former covered with black velvet trimmed with bows and feathers to correspond with the gown. But, as a rule, the newest bonnets are made to accord with the cloak or out-of-door garment. There is certainly no fear for the success of the home milliner with these small bonnets, for they are most simple in trimming and construction.

Last month I had an illustration of the new veil; there are, however, several new methods of wearing it; and the small scraps of tulle tied over the upper half of the face seem to be doomed to disappear before a larger and more important style, which is, in fact, a revival of the old. The long veil of net tulle, or lace, three yards in length, which goes over the front of the bonnet, crosses at the back, and is brought to the front, and tied loosely on the chest, is the first of the new styles. Next to this there comes a veil of plain unhemmed tulle, of the whole breadth of the material. White tulle is worn over a black hat or bonnet. The tulle is put on so as entirely to cover the face, and falls below the chin, where, when the ends are crossed at the back, and brought round the lower edge, it is caught and kept down by the tulle being tied in a bow below the chin. Then we have the old long square veil, with a string run through the hem; and also the old half-circle, which is bordered all round with lace. Above the lace border a ribbon is passed in and out of the holes in the lace, which draws the veil in, to tie on the bonnet or hat. On the half-circle side a fine elastic is run, which is drawn in just under the chin. Then I see that on the very large-fronted "Directoire" bonnets an old-fashioned lace "fall" is sometimes sewn, quite in the old style. From all this my readers will see that we are returning to very old ideas indeed, at least in the way of veils; and now that people can protect their faces, perhaps we shall have less neuralgia and fewer colds.

The idea of carrying ends to the back of the hat or bonnet, and then bringing them to the front to tie underneath the chin, is carried out in other things beside veils; for large hats are seen with ribbon strings arranged in this manner, and the feather boas are used to trim hats, and then are brought round the neck as wraps, from the back, producing a very pretty effect.

It seems most probable, from what one observes at present, that the summer will see a revival of the pure "Empire" style of dress; the simple skirt, the wide sash, and the folded bodice are all suitable and pretty to young people in daily life, for tennis, for boating, and also for washing dresses. There was a time when older people wore the same, and as all the tendency of our dress is towards simple lines, no doubt some modification will be found for them.

The long boas are as much used as ever, and those of ostrich feathers are exceedingly elegant and not very expensive. The newest are formed more like collars than boas, and have long ends in front. There is a decided tendency, I observe, to increase the size of the muff. I do not know whether we shall attain to the gigantic proportions of those worn of yore, when the great hats and large boas were also in fashion, and which ladies used as receptacles for carrying their lapdogs. But the tiny creations of lace and velvet worn during the last few years are quite on the wane now.

Two styles of "Directoire" dresses are given in the walkers facing us in the sketch, "Dress in the Park," which may be useful as models for our readers; and I have illustrated the much-worn and talked-of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" costume for boys. The sash should be of red silk, and the stockings black. This is a simple and pretty boy's dress for the evening, and can be easily made up at home in a moderately priced velvet. Two evening bodices which I have selected are both suited to young girls, and the one with folds over the front may be easily made up by altering and arranging an old or half-worn bodice.

The sketch of the "Three New Jerseys" should be a comfort to those who find a difficulty in getting their bodices made, or who wear out the bodice before the skirt, as they can all be purchased in the best shops, and are of good material, cut and fit.

The paper pattern for the month is a bodice with revers and pockets, suitable for braiding. The material used should be a fine cloth, and the braiding could be done on bands, to be afterwards applied to the bodice. The latter is in ten pieces—two sleeve pieces, cuff, collar, pockets, revers, front, back, and two side pieces. About three yards and a half of material would be required for a person measuring thirty-six inches across the chest. Bands of braiding could be used as trimming for the skirt, to match the braiding on the bodice. This bodice would be a useful one for an ordinary dress, and will be one of those most worn in the spring. The pattern of the "Little Lord Fauntleroy's" dress, for a child aged seven, can also be obtained, price one shilling, as "The Lady Dressmaker" finds it in such demand, and ladies in the country experience a difficulty in procuring it. The little coat and breeches constitute the pattern, which is quite within the power of any mother to make up; and as this pattern will be much used during the next summer season, it will be found most useful for lighter everyday use.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, including the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing-jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress-drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American bodice instead of stays ("emancipation"), Corday skirt with pleats, jacket-bodice with waistcoat, princess dress with full back, bodice with revers for braiding.

VARIETIES.

NO EULOGY REQUIRED.—"Woman," says an old bachelor, "requires no eulogy—she speaks for herself."

TOO FLATTERING A PORTRAIT.—When Anne of Cleves was spoken of for a wife to Henry VIII., Holbein, the celebrated artist, was commissioned by Cromwell to draw her portrait. He brought over to England so favourable a likeness that Henry consented to wed; but when he found her so inferior to the miniature, the storm which should really have been directed on the painter, burst on the minister. Cromwell lost his head because Anne was uncommonly plain-looking, and not a Venus as Holbein had painted her.

TO THE END OF THE WORLD.

"And do you love me so devotedly, dear," he said, "that you will give up home and friends and all that makes your young life bright and happy, to become my wife, and go with me to the uttermost ends of the world if necessary?"

"Yes, George," she whispered, softly; "when I am your wife your thoughts shall be my thoughts, your hopes my hopes; and if you should want me to go to the uttermost ends of the earth with you, I will go, oh, so gladly, George, for I do so love to travel!"

TRUE WISDOM.—The wisest girl is generally she who thinks herself least so.

A MOTTO FOR A LIBRARY.—The following motto will recommend itself to lovers of books, and will be found suitable for every library, large or small:—"Tolle, aperi, recita, ne lēdas, claude, reponē!" which freely translated means "Take me down, open me, read me, don't injure me, shut me up, but put me back!"

THE RIVAL.

Shall I bring you an ice," said he, "while Miss Yellfort is singing? Pray take something."

She was a rival of Miss Yellfort, and she answered, "Thanks, no; if I took anything it would be ether."

OUR PRIZE COMPETITION.

CONFESSIONS.

OUR contributors responded fairly well to our appeal to them in the September monthly part of last year, nevertheless the competition has not been so successful a one as we had anticipated. The number of papers sent in altogether is smaller than it was in the last three competitions, not so much care has been taken over the work, and less literary ability has been shown than we had been given to expect from the excellent results of the two former contests.

Our readers may remember the great praise we lavished on the work done in connection with the heroines from Shakespeare, and we scarcely expected that so high a standpoint of excellence would be maintained, nevertheless the great success of that competition has made the falling off of the present one more noticeable.

We believe the reason of this comparative failure (for after all it is only a comparative failure) to be a want of interest in the subject on the part of our contributors. We thought this was the case after going through the first batch of four hundred, and now, having read the remainder (nearly the same number), we feel sure it is.

In writing thus we exclude the work of girls of the age of eighteen and nineteen, who have sent admirable work, and far outdistanced the others, both from a literary and a critical point of view. The papers sent in since the September notice are a little better than the others, and great improvement has been shown by those girls who have made two attempts, for though none of them have changed their opinions, they have given far better reasons for their choice. Comparatively the worst work has been done by competitors between the ages of twenty and thirty, whereas in the Shakespeare competition they were the most successful. The failure of the older girls has rather surprised us; criticism of all the faculties is the one which gains most from experience; there is also a carelessness in the work done by these girls which was quite absent in their papers on Shakespeare's heroines.

"Your favourite qualities in woman?" has been answered far better than "Your favourite qualities in man?" A few of the girls who have a good idea of woman's duty seem to think that men were only created as machines to make money for them, or as companions to please them. There is not a single frivolous answer to the query, "Your favourite quality in woman?" whereas there are several to the companion one concerning men, girls of sixteen being the greatest offenders in this respect. A competitor whose object in life it is "to work hard in order to help her brothers and sisters," and who has a high opinion of what a Christian woman's life ought to be, prefers men of "nice appearance and plenty of conversation," because they can amuse her at evening parties; while another likes handsome men because their influence in the world is so great, in fact they "rule the world" according to her, and "will continue to do so." This ridiculous answer disfigures an otherwise excellent paper, and it is rather curious that this girl, who says that "beauty is of little account" in her own sex, considers it so important in men.

When asking the question, "Your favourite book?" we meant the Bible excluded, it being obviously impossible for a Christian to prefer the handiwork of man to the inspired Scriptures; nevertheless as we did not specify the exclusion, girls are not to be blamed for choosing it. The greater number of competitors, however, chose another book, with the remark, "the Bible of course excluded."

The favourite hymn is "Rock of Ages," "Lead, Kindly Light," being a good second, nearly half the contributors choosing one or other of these hymns. The little essays on "Your favourite Bible verse?" were very well done; the texts chosen of course varied very much, and they were, with only six exceptions, taken from the New Testament.

The favourite occupation, which in many cases formed a kind of supplement to the first query, "Your object in life?" and was almost identical with "Your favourite study?" betrays a burning anxiety on the part of girls to earn their own livelihood. This is a sign of the times, for be it remarked that not only girls who are in want of money, but also those who have means, wish to be "independent, and not a burden on others." The choice of the profession seems to depend on the money at the disposal of the girls; the poorer ones choosing teaching, and the richer ones the higher professions. Many of the teachers inform us that they have prospered in their career, and we heartily congratulate them. The lady doctors, novelists, and painters do not tell us the result of their endeavours; but one very ambitious girl, aged twenty—a metaphysician by profession—finds it "uphill work."

"Your favourite writer?" brought us very interesting answers, the majority of the contributors choosing a writer of fiction; though Carlyle and Kuskin are the favourites of a great number of girls, especially those over twenty years of age. Girls from ten to fifteen inclusive have given the palm to Miss Yonge; those from fifteen to thirty, Dickens.

We are surprised that Doré is the favourite painter, and still more surprised that he has been chosen "on account of his colouring." To us the fervid imagination of this artist is displayed to far greater advantage in black and white, than in those gigantic canvases which are so popular with girls. Next to Doré, Sir Edwin Landseer has been chosen most often, but the reasons given for their choice by many of the girls are simply ridiculous. For instance: "Because he is an animal painter," "Because I am fond of animals." It is to this query that the worst answer in the whole competition was given, viz., "I like Landseer best because he does animals, and I like those that do animals more than those who do faces or country."

Many girls who were serious when answering the other questions were humorous when writing about their favourite painter, and we quote from a paper sent by a contributor aged sixteen: "Landseer is my favourite painter, because I am greatly interested in animals, and care very little for 'musty,' 'fusty' old saints who I don't believe ever existed, and if they did I don't care!"

We wish girls would visit the National Gallery more often. So many of the London competitors complain that they have never seen any works of the great masters, because they have not travelled, and are evidently unaware that there are splendid examples of the greatest painters in the gallery in Trafalgar Square.

"Your favourite character in history?" brought forward a large group of personages, whereas the favourite characters in fiction were taken from comparatively few books, those of Dickens, Miss Yonge, and Mrs. Beecher Stowe being the most popular.

In conclusion, though our report is not altogether a favourable one, we trust our contributors will not be discouraged, because after all it is they who have led us to expect such great results from the admirable work they have done on former occasions. If the "Confessions" Competition had taken place before the one on Shakespeare's heroines, and the notable women of the reign of Queen Victoria, we should have been pleased with the result.

POULTRY KEEPING :

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

PART V.

HATCHING AND REARING CHICKENS.

"Now you have come to the interesting part," I think I hear someone saying. "Grown-up fowls are very poor fun, but chickens! Why, everyone likes chickens, from the egg-shell to the supper-table!"

You are right and you are wrong. Chickens are like children: a great pleasure and a great trouble, both of which I hope you will appreciate before coming to the end of this paper.

Many people, when starting poultry-keeping, rear their own stock instead of buying it, and if all goes well this is certainly the cheaper plan, as a broody hen and a setting of eggs cost comparatively little, and so some might be able to start in this way, being able to pay for the weekly food of the chickens, where they could not go to the expense of full-grown birds.

On the other hand, the successful management of chickens requires more care and experience than that of adult birds, and a long time passes before the chickens begin to return any of the money expended upon them.

Chicken rearing is a delightful occupation, but takes up a great deal of time, and no one should attempt to rear chickens unless she can do so apart from the laying hens. Should this advice be neglected, endless trouble and difficulty will be the consequence. The chief reason is this, that as chickens when quite young and when half-grown require constant food, and must never, up to the time of commencing laying, have less than three good meals daily, it will be seen that this sort of feeding would not do at all for the hens, and consequently either the chickens or the hens must suffer. I have tried it over and over again, always with the same result. As soon as I appear with the chicken food, all the hens come flying round from every direction. I drive them away one side, they come round at another. I try to shut the chickens up in a coop, and perhaps succeed in getting three-quarters of the brood inside, but in this case some chicks almost always get left out, and when the chickens grow almost as large as the laying hens, the same door will equally admit both.

I do not say that it cannot be done, but it takes time out of all proportion to the result effected; the only way at all to manage is to take out an army of brothers and sisters to keep the hens at bay while the precious charges are fed, and though this plan may be arranged during the holidays, at other times it is slightly inconvenient.

Taking everything into consideration, therefore, it may be said, especially where there is limited accommodation, that the space can be more profitably utilised by keeping more laying hens. I therefore take it for granted that there is a place railed off for the reception of the youngsters when they arrive upon the scene.

The first thing then to do is to secure a good mother or broody hen.

A "broody" or "clucking" or "clocking" hen is one that, having laid a certain number of eggs, wishes to sit upon them and hatch out the chicks.

This is a natural instinct, and one which is much stronger in some hens than in others. Birds of the feather-legged tribes usually make good sitters, and common barndoor fowls come broody very often.

You will always know when a hen is broody by the way in which she sticks to the nest at all hours without laying an egg. On going to the hen-house at night you will find that she is still on the nest instead of on the perch, and if touched she will sit all the closer, and fluff up her feathers and utter a sort of growling, scolding sound, which makes you retire rather quickly, especially if you receive a sharp peck for your trouble.

A broody hen in February or March is a great treasure, as these are the best months for hatching out chickens for autumn laying; but broody hens in May, June, and July are nothing but a bother, and should be cured of their desire by the plan advocated in a previous chapter.

Having obtained a fat, fluffy, furious hen, the eggs must now be thought of, and these must be quite fresh.

Stale eggs will often hatch, but they always come out later than the others, and do not produce such vigorous chicks, and in early spring these little weak ones will often succumb to the cold weather far sooner than chicks hatched from new-laid eggs.

In order to have good eggs from the home stock, it is necessary to have one rooster running with from six to ten hens, according to the breed; and should there be more hens than this kept, and it be inconvenient to separate them, the best-laying hens must be shut up with the rooster for an hour or so every morning. I say the best layers, because eggs must always be set from the best and healthiest hens only. In mating birds the object desired must be kept in mind.

If eggs are wanted, then good layers must be chosen; if for the table, then nice, plump birds, with deep, wide breasts and small bones; and if for show, then birds that have the special characteristics desired.

Be very particular only to breed from good, healthy birds. They must have come of a good laying, table, or show strain, and should be a little smaller than the hens they are with. Choose the mate with a nice, uniform colouring, as the chickens usually come the same colour, and partake of the qualities of the hen, and for this reason it is usually considered best to have a pure-bred bird even where thoroughly cross-bred hens are kept.

A cockerel is a young rooster in its first season, and should not be mated with pullets (hens in their first season), but always with one or two year old hens. Pullets, therefore, must be mated with a rooster more than one year old.

The new-laid eggs chosen should be neither extra large nor small, and should have firm, even shells.

Should there be no eggs suitable at home, then some must of course be bought; and here the beginner cannot be too careful, for nothing is more disappointing than to have all the trouble of carefully tending a hen for three weeks, only to find at the end that the eggs set were the veriest rubbish. It must, therefore, be ascertained where the eggs came from, whether the hens laying the eggs are healthy, and whether the other conditions specified above have been adhered to.

It is best, if possible, to purchase the eggs from someone near at hand, as eggs generally do better that have not travelled. Eggs sent by train, packed in the boxes specially prepared for them, often hatch out well; but they are much more liable to disaster, as all shaking and jarring injures the tiny germ. I had a quantity of eggs sent me in the winter that were so affected by the cold on the journey that the embryo was evidently killed.

There are also a few persons who, from ignorance or dishonesty, advertise eggs which would never hatch were the best hen living to give her whole attention to the matter.

In winter not more than ten or eleven eggs should be set, as the hen cannot keep more properly heated. Later on, however, from twelve to fifteen may be allowed, according to the size of the hen, but thirteen is about the average number.

There are many ways of making nests, and many positions in which they may be placed. When possible, it is best to have the sitting hen away from the other stock in some shed or outhouse, so that she may not be disturbed.

The nest-boxes generally used consist of three sides wood, one foot square, the front having either a movable slide or else being quite open, except for a three-inch piece of wood across from the ground. There is no wooden bottom to the nest; but where rats abound, a wire one is necessary. If the floor of the house is made of earth, then hollow out very slightly a round space capable of holding the number of eggs without allowing them to roll upon each other. The earth must be beaten hard, and covered over with a good bed of hay, and if in winter, with a few feathers also.

SILVER-SPANGLED POLANDS.

Where the floor is formed of wood, tiles, or pavement, a layer of clean earth must be brought in and the hay used as before. Be very careful to fill up the corners of the nest-box well, as if this is not done an egg is very apt to roll away from under the hen, and get completely spoiled.

When hens are broody and are left to themselves, it will be found that they always choose quiet and secluded positions, and therefore their wish must be granted them. Either cover the front of the nest with a piece of wrapper, or else turn it with its face about six inches from the wall. Thorough ventilation should be provided, by having some holes on each side or on the top of the box.

If the hens must be set in the ordinary hen-house, they must be entirely shut into their nest, in order that they may not be disturbed, and also that they may not leave their eggs by accident, and sit on any new-laid ones that may happen to be in the other nests.

A hamper makes a good nest, as the bottom can be filled with earth, hay, etc., and the hen can be shut in; and when taken off for food, she will learn to fly quite gently back again; the only thing to remember in this case is that the chicks must be removed as soon as they find their feet, or else they are apt to get crushed.

The nest full of eggs being now ready, the hen must be taken to them. It is best to do this at night, as then she is not so disturbed. The way to lift a hen is to approach her from the front. Put both hands firmly (not nervously) under her wings, the thumb being above the wings and the fingers grasping her legs underneath. In this way she cannot flap or kick, and will not be needlessly frightened.

Some hens are very nervous, and need the greatest care, and when put in front of the eggs will go anywhere but on to them. The only way to do in these cases is to leave the hens quite alone in front of the eggs, and, unless most determined, their maternal instinct will be usually too much for them, and they will settle without a murmur.

Always feed a broody hen well before first putting her on the nest, and then shut her in and leave her quite quiet for one day; that is to say, put her on at night, and don't attempt to feed her until another night has passed.

Of course many hens will sit anyway and anyhow, and seem as though they could bear any amount of noise and disturbance; and certainly if any reader wishes to make a study of hen character, let her have a succession of broody hens all through the breeding months; she will afterwards fully realise what a hen is, and what individual characteristics each displays.

Broody hens brought from a distance by train are a mere delusion. They cost, with the carriage, a great deal, and are generally speaking no use whatever, as I can testify from painful experience.

I shall hope to continue my remarks on the mode of treating a sitting hen next month.

Last month we finished the description of most of the so-called sitting breeds, so this month we will turn our attention to the non-sitters. These are, to my mind, more interesting than the others, as though the great, heavy, fluffy Cochins, Brahmas, etc., look exceedingly handsome, and have their uses, yet I don't think they are to be compared with some of the non-sitters. Of course it is quite impossible to fully detail the various points of each particular breed, and for mere domestic poultry keeping I do not think it necessary to know them, as breeding for egg production is more useful than for fancy points; still, should any girl wish to keep pure-bred fowls, so that she may combine beauty and utility, I will endeavour to give a few directions in order that she may not be beguiled into buying feather-legged Leghorns, or red-faced black Spanish, or black-legged white Dorkings!

Houdans.—This is one of the best and most popular French breeds that we possess. They look ragged enough in our illustration, but Houdans have a decided tendency in that direction.

The Houdan is a large, broad-breasted bird, with comparatively small bones and short legs. The feathers are marked black and white, very irregularly as a rule, giving the bird a splashed look. Both cock and hen should have a firm black-and-white topknot, with also a fringe of small feathers round the face. The comb in the hen is very small, but in the cock is larger, and stands out in two leaf-like wings. The Houdan is a very good table bird, and is also a good layer of white eggs, and would do well in a mild district with a grass run.

La Fleche.—This is another good French table breed, and is suitable for crossing purposes, but should not be kept where eggs are the object.

As the illustration shows, they are black fowls, with curious horn-like combs, and have broad breasts, suggesting abundance of firm, white meat.

Polands.—I always feel sorry for Polish fowls, for they never look as if they could enjoy life with their huge crests, which often effectually prevent their seeing before them. The chief varieties are the gold and silver spangled and the white-crested black.

Polands are a small breed, and are more of a fancier's fowl, though people who keep them say that they hold their own in the egg production line if they have a free, dry range. Polands have no combs, but instead have a fine full crest, which looks exceedingly handsome on a bright day, but very miserable on a wet one.

The colouring in each variety is what the name implies—gold and silver spangled, the white-crested black being a pure black fowl with a pure white crest.

Hamburgs.—For girls living in the south of England, or any warm climate with a free range, no handsomer or better breed of fowls could be kept than these, especially if no objection be made to small eggs.

There is no breed, I suppose, that has been known to have such high egg averages as the Hamburg, though some object to them because the eggs are small and white.

All five varieties are very handsome. They are small elegant birds, and should be in contour compact, and sprightly, and all agree in having a rose comb—that is a low, broad, double comb, tapering to a point behind.

Black Hamburgs are the largest, and next come the gold and silver spangled, and gold and silver pencilled.

A spangled feather is one of any light shade with a dark spot at the tip, while a pencilled feather has more or less regular bars of light and dark all the way up.

Hamburgs, although looking so handsome on a lawn or grass field, should not be kept in confinement, or they will suffer immediately.

Black Spanish.—These birds are splendid layers of large white eggs if kept in a warm district, and sheltered from storm and wind; otherwise they are delicate.

Black Spanish are slenderly built birds of a rich black colour, the cock having a large upright comb, the hen's falling down over one side of the face. The wattles in the cock are red and very long, and in the hen shorter.

On first looking at a black Spanish cock, one naturally thinks that he is very ill; this is owing to his curious white face, which some people admire immensely, but which really is decidedly ugly, having been so unnaturally exaggerated by breeding. The hen has the same feature, but is not quite so unsightly.

Minorcas.—This is another black breed of fowls, but differs from the Spanish in being very much harder and having a brilliant red face. The comb of the cock is large and upright, and in the hen should fall over on one side. The legs are dark and unfeathered.

The Minorca breed of a good laying strain is one of the very best kind to keep. They are quite hardy, and lay well in the winter, though they are not, perhaps, quite so good in this respect as some of the feather-legged varieties.

Minorcas lay on an average the largest eggs known. At the Dairy Show last year the first prize was taken by a set of enormous Minorca eggs.

Minorcas are hardy as chickens, and stand confinement well if properly cared for, and if hatched in March or early in April will make good autumn and winter layers, and as they do not become broody they make splendid summer layers. There is also a white variety, but if white fowls are preferred it would be better to keep white Leghorns, which are very much the same in appearance and are a good deal harder.

Leghorns.—We now come to a very favourite breed. People that keep Leghorns, especially the white variety, cannot speak too highly in their favour.

Leghorns are small birds, but are well-shaped, very active, and hardy. They lay quantities of moderate-sized white eggs, and do well either with a free grass range or in close confinement. In the latter case, perhaps, the brown variety are the best, as far as appearance goes, as they do not show the dirt in the same way as the white.

Where there is a grass field at liberty, the white look very lovely as they chase about looking for worms; and if their house is kept clean, and shelter is given them in summer from the rays of the sun, they will keep up their spotless appearance right through the year.

Leghorns have bright yellow legs and yellow skins, large single combs, upright in the cock, falling over in the hen. The brown variety have feathers of different shades of golden brown and red.

One great advantage in keeping Leghorns is, that though they are a small breed they mature early, and often lay at five months, and the cockerels, if hatched early in February, will make quite nice spring chickens, even though rather small.

A LETTER OF THANKS.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Let me beg you to convey to all those generous friends who have sent through you such a rich store of woollen comforts for the snacksmen, the assurance of most cordial appreciation of their sympathy.

Seven years ago a rough fisherman, after telling me some thrilling stories of accident, illness, and death, away upon the fishing grounds, two days' steaming from medical or surgical aid, exclaimed, "Do you suppose, sir, as folks ashore cares anything about it?" I very promptly assured him that "folks ashore" did not know, and that if they knew they would certainly care very much indeed.

Here then, Mr. Editor, is a case in point. As I glanced down column after column containing the names of those who had so readily and kindly responded to your invitation, I thought at once of my fisherman friend of August, 1881, and wished he could see this very practical answer to his sneering inquiry.

Your readers will all be pleased to learn—and the competitors especially so—that the snacksmen are most thankful for the interest thus shown in their welfare. Indeed, I have myself heard them again and again exclaim, "God bless those kind ladies ashore who have made these warm wraps for us!" an invocation which I heartily endorse.

If it were not such a Spartan adventure I would invite a select committee of your readers to visit the fishing-grounds before the close of the winter season, and inspect for themselves the conditions under which 12,000 of our fellow-countrymen toil to supply our tables with a necessary article of food. But perhaps it would be better if you, Mr. Editor, were to make the cruise in one of our mission vessels, and then furnish a detailed report of your voyage, from which your fair friends could draw their own inferences. If you will consent to such an arrangement, I will pledge myself to make you as comfortable as circumstances will permit, and you will have the satisfaction, on your return, of having vicariously performed a pilgrimage to which you would indeed be sorry to consign any of your tenderly nurtured subscribers.

Will you allow me to mention, in case any of those who took part in the recent competition are disposed to offer further help, that sea-boot stockings, stout steering-gloves and guernseys are the articles specially wanted at this season?

May I ask that your readers will one and all remember these poor storm-tossed smacksmen at the throne of heavenly grace, and also pray for the mission which seeks to minister to their necessities—"as well for the body as the soul"?

And in conclusion let me relate one of the many instances in which we have been encouraged to trust implicitly to Divine Providence for the supply of the numerous and urgent needs of this work. Four years ago an invitation reached me to lecture upon the mission, and exhibit dissolving view illustrations to the aged inmates of a metropolitan workhouse. At first I hesitated, for clearly there could be no collection in aid of the funds, but remembering what Holy Scripture says about "the poor in this world, rich in faith," I obeyed the citation of the ladies who had arranged the entertainment. During the evening I mentioned the gift of the Euston by the Duchess of Grafton, playfully adding, "of course I don't anticipate a similar gift as a result of to-night's meeting," a remark which the old folks appeared to consider very unnecessary.

That evening spent with the paupers had quite passed from my memory, when, a few weeks ago, came a cheque for £3,500 to cover the cost of building a cruising hospital mission-ship, coupled with a stipulation that the donor's name should not be divulged.

I was naturally curious to learn what had been the means of arousing the sympathy of this new contributor, and subsequent inquiry led to the interesting discovery that this, the largest donation ever made to the mission, was a direct outcome of the workhouse meeting—the one gathering of all others from which least was expected!

I trust, my dear Mr. Editor, that neither you nor your readers will be bored by my long "yarn," and that both they and you will believe me to be,

Very gratefully yours,

E. J. MATHER.

BIRD LIFE IN MARCH.

By A NATURALIST.

BLUSTERING winds of March sweep over our Surrey chalk hills, which are covered with short, velvety turf, affording fine pasture to the flocks of South Down sheep that range there, dotting the landscape in every direction. The South Downs are grand and beautiful; so are the green valleys and the hillsides, broken, and gleaming white in parts where the chalk has been dug and lime manufactured. That trade is still carried on to a great extent.

Jackdaws, hawks, and owls shelter in the cracks and the rents in the old abandoned workings, giving life to those quiet places, which are seldom visited except by the shepherd and his dog. Great fleecy clouds sail over these breezy uplands, throwing huge shadows on the hillsides as they come in a carry of wind from the sea. Light and shade shift and play continually when the clouds are moving overhead, frightening the wheatear that has come again to spend his summer on and about the South Downs. He is a beautiful bird, with his blue-grey back and rich buff breast contrasting with his dark wings and black and white tail, which he flirts out continually in some form or other with every movement. You will hear him "Chack! Chack!" as he flits from hillock to hillock or from stone to stone.

Although very numerous, they do not congregate together. You will see them in pairs, and when their young are capable of flying, then small families flit hither and thither. The wheatear compels your observation, for his plumage shows out on the rich green turf. A timid creature and gentle, the shadow of a crow's wing thrown on the turf as he passes overhead is enough to make him crouch and run for shelter. The shepherd and his lads know his weakness; when he runs to hide from the cloud-shadows that alarm him, they cut a turf and form a little lean-to shelter, and set a horsehair noose. Into this the wheatear runs. Great quantities are caught so, and sold for the table.

That noble bird, the buzzard, which once roamed in flocks over the South Downs, has become extinct; he is no longer the well known bird he was. Agricultural changes and the increase of population have caused him and his relatives to leave us for good.

March is not a favourable month to bird life; many of our winter visitors are shifting quarters, or have already done so, and unless the season prove a very warm one, very few of our spring emigrants will have put in an appearance.

The crows, both hooded and common, are on the look out for any lamb that may be so unfortunate as to have anything the matter with it. Happily the watchful and sturdy mothers are on the alert. The great plover or thick knee may be found on the downs and in the cultivated stretches. Those spots at the foot of some great hill where the ground is covered with flints—rustics would tell you these places grew flints all the year round—suit him best, and his plumage falls in with the earth and speckled flints admirably. He is a game-looking bird when you can get a sight of him, and very swift of foot and wing. A wild call note generally betrays his presence long before you catch sight of him.

The lapwings, or pewits, are in full activity, looking out their nesting places. March is the month when Master Pewit sticks his crest up, flaps with his broad wings here and there, and darts and tumbles about his mate, crying out "Pewit!" as loud as he can call. Now he and his partner alight and run nimbly here and there. Some huntsman's horse has left the print of his hoofs in the soft ground in places during the wet season. Into these slight hollows, now dry enough, fragments of dead fern, grass, and little twigs have blown; they are minutely examined by the full, bright eyes of our pair. Then they spring up to join hundreds of their family that are flapping and wheeling about in all directions on the upland fields and pastures. A pewit sometimes does good service in a garden. One I knew lived, a tame bird, in one for some years, and his master told me he kept the place quite free from insect pests; he was continually on the hunt.

As you travel on the downs or below them, you get many glimpses of birds that are the pioneers of incoming or outgoing migrants. It would be difficult to give any definite time as a rule for the arrival or departure of birds. They are governed by circumstances, such as the forwardness or lateness of the seasons. Some species occur plentifully, too, in some seasons and are few in others, to account for which it is difficult to offer any theory. They almost seem, like people we know who are habitual wanderers, to come and go when least expected.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BANDAI-SAN.—We regret that we cannot do as you request about the stamps. We are glad to hear that in your Japanese home you take so keen an interest in our work at home.

ANNIE'S eyes are evidently affected by her general health, for which she should consult a doctor.

E. H. S.—We can only suggest advertising for a situation as "mother's help" or nursery governess.

E. A. B.—We have read your letter with much interest. There are convalescent homes at both Bournemouth and Torquay. At the former, the Herbert Convalescent Home—address the matron; also St. Mary Convalescent Home, Dean Park—address Mrs. Nugent. At Torquay, Erith House, St. Raphael's Home, and Babbacombe House of Rest. Apply to Miss Skinner for the last-named, at Bayfield, Babbacombe, Torquay, Devon.

ROSIE.—There is no employment to be found for educated women in the Colonies nor in America, save and except so far as they can undertake and are willing to perform the duties of domestic servants. So far as we can hear, this is how the "Women's Emigration" question now stands. Why not try to get the same here in England? Nurses of high class are well paid, and so are parlour-maids and good cooks.

MARIE STUART.—"When I am dead, my dearest," is a song by Christina Rossetti, and will be found at page 110 of "Goblin Market, and other Poems."

SINCERITY'S question is very vaguely put, and she does not say what she wishes to do with "flowers." If it be a garden that she means, and if she be near a town and have the ground, there is certainly a little money to be made out of flowers, fruit, and vegetables, and she may add bees to the list.

NORAH O'HARA.—When you have to get up early, you had better make yourself a cup of tea the first thing. This will prevent the feeling of which you complain. Use a spirit lamp to boil the water quickly. Can you not get one of your brothers to walk with you? If not, the lonely walk may be enlivened by choosing a pleasant and useful subject for thought, or noticing everything you pass in an observant manner, so as to draw thought from it. The idle mind soon grows tired and weary, but not the busy one.

"XXX" deserves our thanks for her nice box of old-fashioned flowers. Her description of the garden in which they were gathered is very charming. We do not quite see what difference it can make to you, dear little "XXX," whether your editor be male or female, so long as you like the "G.O.P."

FORGETFUL.—If you ever come up to town, pay a visit to the South Kensington Museum, and there you will see a very long historical picture, which is chiefly of battle scenes. This is a fac-simile of the original tapestry kept on a wall in the hotel of the Prefecture at Bayeux, Normandy, worked by Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror, and her ladies. It is worked on linen, and is 20 inches broad, and 214 feet long. Harold and his warriors are represented upon it. A curious fact connected with it, which has surprised many embroiderers, is that some of the horses are of unnatural colours, such as green. But this is accounted for by the difficulties then attending the purchase of materials for work, and deficiencies in suitable colours were made up in the use of scraps of any description, which doubtless occasioned much amusement to the clever and industrious ladies engaged. As a reliable historical record of the events of those times, this tapestry has proved invaluable; 530 figures are represented.

JOIET.—As a rule we object to what you are in the habit of doing, as regards the companions of your walks, but "having always a child with you" somewhat alters the case. Still, we must give you much the same counsel which we give under other circumstances, i.e., consult your parents, and be guided by them. You are a minor, and under their protection and rule.

EVA BYRNE.—We should advise you to leave your money safely in the Post Office Savings Bank, and also to replace all the interest on it, so as to save as much as you can. You should try to improve your health, and get a pair of spectacles. Be cheerful and try to throw off needless repining and worry. If you believe in God as a father, you should not give way to anxiety.

ONE OF YOUR OLDEST SUBSCRIBERS.—We are bearing up as well as could be expected under the effects of your letter, and its threat of withdrawing your name from us. The only explanation which would be satisfactory to you, we suppose, would be to know that we did not steal the offending picture. We can honestly assure you that it was paid for, and that all such articles are very ordinary subjects of bargain and sale, though you might have been ignorant of the fact.

LILY'S lines are not very good nor original.

E. IRELAND'S acrostic at least shows religious feeling.

CORELLI'S lines are correct and fairly good.

MARY BAYNE sends us a very long poem with which she has taken great pains, and which must have been a great pleasure to write, even though we find it worthless and watery. Our girls very rarely send us real "poetry."

NEULLY and MARY.—There is a hospital for those suffering from paralysis and epilepsy in Portland Terrace, Regent's Park, and there are some free beds. It is near the St. John's Wood station. Apply for all further information to the secretary, H. Howgrave Graham, Esq. There are five physicians in attendance.

SCOTCH LASSIE.—Yes, the letter "h" should certainly be aspirated in the word hospital, and you should say, "that man is he," not "him," because you are speaking in the nominative, not the accusative case.

UNHAPPY BRIDE.—You have acted most unwisely—nay, worse, in an underhand way—in taking off your wedding ring, and making your employer suppose you to be a single woman. It is not always necessary to confide your family affairs to persons for whom you work; but when you become an inmate of their private home, and are given so confidential a position as that of governess to their children, concealment of your true condition as a married woman would be justly considered as "false pretences." As to "receiving marks of affection from a young gentleman," it is simply shameful to have permitted it, and shows already the difficulties in which your error has placed you.

JUNO.—We can only advise you to find some occupation or study which amuses and interests you, and pursue that. Perhaps your present discipline of silence and dullness is exactly what is good for you at the present moment. Keep a bright and cheery spirit within, and try and show it without, also, to make others happier.

WINSIE.—Take a tepid bath, and rub yourself well with a thick towel, or bath sheet, afterwards. Then do a few gymnastic exercises before dressing yourself. You should try to get a short walk early in the morning at least. Do not drink too much tea, and read the advice of "Medicus" to "working girls."

"HALF HOUR" very kindly writes to tell us that "dock roots"—which may be found in any field or garden—are very good; in fact, a cure for some kinds of skin diseases. They must be gathered and put to stew all night with enough water to cover them. In the morning you should take a cupful for a dose. A little lemon added to them is an improvement, as they are not nice in taste. "Half Hour" has known wonderful cures to result from their use.

A LOVER OF BIRDS must keep her canary out of draughts, which are sure to give cold. Sea-salted sand is not fit for birds at all.

HELEN OF TROY.—The white spots on nails arise from some constitutional delicacy. No application will remove them. Some people cannot hold a full clear note in singing because they are nervous, others affect this quavering style because they think it is expressive and shows emotion. Italians are fond of it, but opinions vary, and we think that any exaggeration of such a trick in singing should, in any case, be carefully guarded against. We have heard singers quaver on every note, which was quite distressing, as well as fatiguing, to hear.

STRAW HAT.—If you could combine your present trade with other work, you would do well; but to give up what you have learnt, and have an opening for already, would be unwise. It is impossible for us to say for what occupation you are suited. You are not a good plain-sewer, nor can you spell correctly. Your height would be in your favour as a parlour-maid or as a hospital nurse, being strong and healthy as well as tall. Perhaps you might like the latter employment. You would have board, lodging, uniform, and a small salary at once; the salary rising after complete training.

NINA.—The lines are very clumsy, and not too original; but if it gave you pleasure to write them, their end was attained, was it not?

DORIS'S poem shows some originality and thought, and with study she may do still better.

PEARL L. B.—There is no sequel to the book, we believe.

W. DORET.—We think you refer to the Westminster Training School for Nurses, founded by the Lady Augusta Stanley, at Queen Anne's Gate, S.W. Apply to the secretary or lady superintendent.

MARAH.—If you have a garden, nothing could be better for you than any out-door occupation to relieve your eyes. You give no address, and our correspondents are often deprived by such an omission of advice we might give them. If fond of botany you might make little expeditions to find specimens, and press and mount them. Fretwork wood-carving might also suit you, as a change. Appliances found at artists' colourman's shop, or you might get them at any good cutler's shop. There is a School of Art Wood-carving at the City and Guilds Technical Institute, Exhibition Road, South Kensington. Your letter unfortunately was mislaid.

IVY and MAY.—The lines are very dreary and not too original.

ELLA.—Persons who undertake to practise "massage" should be strong and healthy to begin with, and should have a practical knowledge of anatomy and physiology, and some acquaintance also with Ling's Swedish gymnastics. Massage lessons may be had at the Hampstead Physical Training College, Broadhurst Gardens, N.W., and it is advisable to start in connection with a medical man, as it requires medical direction.

STUDENT.—Certainly write "care of—" and then the host's address, never "c/o" unless writing in a commercial style.

ELSIE DEANE.—There is a home for invalid ladies of limited means at San Remo, at £1 5s. a week. Here a person who could not live alone might stay respectfully and in comfort. Address the secretary, San Remo, or else write to Miss Macdonald Lockhart, Lee, Lanark, N.B. The climate there would probably suit you.

J. R. F.—We imagine that your cat must have the mange. It is always difficult to treat cats for skin complaints owing to their licking the fur. Take it to a veterinary surgeon, and beware of handling it. If the cat be an old one, it would be charitable to destroy it, as it is not likely to recover, and it might infect other animals.

DAISY.—All grades of cousinly relationship are free to marry. Why do you not consult the table given in the Common Prayer Book? We cannot tell you from what cause your headaches proceed. Your mother is more likely to know than a perfect stranger, as regards your case.

SUBSCRIBER FROM THE FIRST.—Write to the secretary at the Central Office of the Y.W.C.A., 17, Old Cavendish Street, W., and so obtain a prospectus of the rules.

WINSIE.—Our blessed Lord draws a comparison between the worldly wise though wicked steward, and his quickness in looking after his pecuniary interests, and the strange apathy and want of effort and common sense exhibited by people—even the apparently good and respectable—in looking after their eternal interests. We might all "take a leaf," as it were, "out of the book" of business folks—even the evil ones—in energy, carefulness, and wisdom in those things which concern the glory of God and the salvation of souls. The passage, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways, and be wise," is not to be taken altogether literally; but we may learn a lesson from her thriftiness, and if we are half as quick-sighted, as prompt in action, and worldly wise about our holiest interests, as the wicked steward was about his worldly ones, we should do well. "Be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

NANETTE.—Your writing and spelling should be improved. Your low stature is against your being eligible for a situation as lady's-maid. Perhaps you might find one as "young lady's maid." Try to learn hair-dressing and to write a good hand and spell better.

TO OUR READERS.

We have had many inquiries respecting the competition in painting, and in reply we must refer our readers again to the instructions given, from which they will see that the original, by Birket Foster, is a painting in water colours, and as such is to be copied, and that the paper on which the outline drawing is printed is the only material on which the copying must be done to make itself available for examination.

* * Our next number will contain the opening chapters of a new story by Lady Margaret Majendie entitled "For the King's Sake."

"SIR MICHAEL CAME FORWARD AND STOOD BEFORE HER."

CHAPTER I.

AM very tired, Nell; very tired. Look how the yellow leaves begin to flutter to the ground. I should like to drop off like them, and rest, child!"

"You have walked too far, dear father," said his daughter, anxiously, bending her tall young figure yet more tenderly to support his faltering steps. "Come home and rest."

"I have done nothing, Nell. The leaves fall because they lack sap, the old man withers for lack of hope. It all comes to the same thing in the long run."

"Come in, dear father. Aunt Betty is beckoning to us. She is on the steps; she calls you."

Across the stillness of the autumn evening came a shrill, penetrating voice.

"Eleanor! Eleanor! thoughtless child! Have you given no thought to your father's tendency to catarrh? Bring him in, I say. Bring him in."

"Aunt Betty is right, father," said Eleanor, gently. "The dews begin to fall."

The old Squire, while suffering her to lead him up the broad gravel paths towards the house, seemed not to hear her words. He went on, muttering to himself, "Sapless! hopeless! Dropping off the tree. Nothing left to live for; all gone—all gone."

Eleanor bit her lips hard to control their trembling.

Mistress Betty St. Aubyn stood on the steps of the terrace. Behind her the old Manor House glowed red in the setting sun. She came sweeping down upon them, holding back the train of her black brocade gown. She cast a look of reproach at her niece as she took possession promptly of her brother to lead him in.

Eleanor did not follow them. Her breast swelled and her lip quivered as she heard the sad, querulous voice of her father, saying—

"I am tired, Betty; so tired! Nell was always headstrong. She does not understand."

A stone bench stood with its back to the red brick wall of the terrace. Eleanor sat down on that seat, her hands falling listlessly in her lap, her head leaning back, her eyes looking into vacancy, seeing nothing of the quaint beauty of the garden before her.

A grey twilight stole over all, over stiff yew hedges, trim straight paths, a slow dark stream of water which flowed between formal banks, and was spanned here and there by small bridges, each the counterpart of the other. The garden in its quaintness and formality had a harmonious, stately beauty of its own.

The only incongruous element in the scene was the face of the girl seated on the grey stone seat. Eleanor St. Aubyn was but twenty years of age, but the glory and freshness of her youth were already dimmed by care, and there were dark lines round the large eyes. The eyelids were deeply chiselled by the sculptor pain; the fine haughty face was very colourless. Those eyes were dilated, startled, despairing, like the eyes of a creature at bay. The gesture with which she pushed back the tendrils of hair which shaded her brow was that of one who panted for relief, yet saw none.

The slow step of the old gardener broke the silence; he came up to her heavily.

"Good evening, mistress," he said, as she turned towards him. "I saw you walking with the old Squire. He breaks fast; he breaks fast. He will happen never raise up his head again."

"Never again," said Eleanor, mechanically. Then with a little start, "You are an ill prophet, Abel! Autumn and winter pass; spring comes. We are not always dying."

The old man shook his head slowly. "Who talks of dying, mistress?" he said. "Dying ain't the worst! It takes a long time for a man to die of fretting, a cruel long time."

Eleanor rose to her feet, and stood in front of him; she looked down upon his bowed figure, his wrinkled hands restlessly working about the handle of his rake.

"Abel," she said, "you have known me ever since I was born, and your Rachel—you know what we owe her; she who nursed us both! You know all—all. What do you say? What does Rachel say? Am I to do it?"

The old man was hard on the sorrows of the young. The recollection of their own like experience fades and passes away. Perhaps they learn to take a broad view of life, as a man surveying a wide landscape sees all the wild irregularities of nature toned into one universal blue.

Abel spoke drily. "You know best, Mistress Eleanor," he said. "It ain't for such as me to advise."

"I have so few friends, Abel," cried the girl, passionately, "and you have always loved my brother and me."

"Yes, yes! Loved you! Ain't you the very apple of my eye?"

"What shall I do? Oh, Abel, what shall I do?"

The old man slowly cleared his throat. "You are young," he said, heavily. "You think you know a deal about sorrow, but you don't know nothing. Life is long before you, and time fits the burden to the young one's back. Bah! what's a young maid's fancy to an old man's grief? The Squire's breaking fast, but he won't die. Sorrow keeps you alive. Have you never noted that? Sorrow is very strong. The fretting won't kill him nor me, nor the rest of us; fretting don't kill."

"Abel, if it were only my fancy! But think of it, think of it! Remember Robbie's words before he crossed the seas: 'If you marry Michael Newport you will have seen the last of me!'"

"Ah, young blood! young blood! Did he know then that Sir Michael held the mortgages? I doubt he knew nothing of that."

"But if he had known it, Abel, I doubt not that his words would have been the same. I, a St. Aubyn, fail in truth, loyalty, in everything I owe to my brother, my country, and my King!"

"There, there, lass, let it alone," said old Abel. "What could you do for the King—a penniless maid, with an old father and a helpless old aunt on your hands? Sacrifice yourself and them also if you could do any good to his Majesty, God bless him! but if it won't, why, don't you see, happen the first duty lies at home? Nay, nay; look not so wild, child! You would be a good man's wife, though Whig he be. There are good and true men who serve King James; they know no better. Dear heart, what more can I say?"

Two slow tears rolled down Abel's furrowed cheeks. "If I were a bit younger," he went on, "I would work for you all, but all my bits of savings—You know the old cracked teapot?"

"Yes, Abel; you have them. For that at least I thank God," said Eleanor, in a stifled voice.

"I don't know," said the gardener, stooping to rake out an unsightly weed. "I don't grudge them to the cause; it is not that. Only if I had known how it was with the old master—"

"All gone, Abel?" cried Eleanor, horror-stricken. "Did Robbie—"

"Yes, mistress dear," he answered, looking up; "Master Robbie has taken them over the sea. It is all right; don't fret, dear heart."

"How could he?" cried Eleanor, passionately. "He should not have done it! All! All!"

"Come, there weren't so very much," said Abel, bravely; "and I have strong arms yet; and you see then we did not know, neither Mr. Robbie nor I, but what all was well with the Squire."

"I will do it, Abel!" cried Eleanor, clasping her hands. "Go now; let me be alone. You and Rachel also! Four helpless folks on my helpless hands! I will do it. God forgive me, and God help me!"

"There is Mistress Betty coming down the path," cried Abel, and he quickly shuffled away.

Eleanor seated herself again, striving to banish all trace of emotion from her face. Her aunt came close to her, and bent down.

"Nellie," she said in a sharp whisper, "do not turn round. Listen to me. The moment has come to decide. There can be no further hesitation; it must be yes or no."

She sat down by her niece, bending forward to screen from her view what was already passing in the far perspective of the garden. There were great iron gates; up to them rode two horsemen. The gentleman threw his reins to the groom, and dismounting, slowly entered the garden.

He was a tall, spare man, with hair already sprinkled with grey, his face full of power, grave and rough-hewn, with a square, somewhat protruding jaw; the blue eyes, under overhanging grizzled brows, had some of the cold kindness of the winter sun. He was dressed in black, and wore a felt three-cornered hat.

When he saw the two ladies seated together, he slowly removed his glove, shook the dust from his dress, and drew down the delicate lace of his ruffles, and then crossed the bridge.

The twilight had enveloped all, calm, still, and hushed; the song of birds was gradually ceasing; the last gleams of light flickered out on the many windowed Manor House. In the utter stillness of the outer world, within a multitude of thoughts thronged his brain, so strong, so conflicting that he set his face like a fine mask, that it might not turn traitor.

"Nellie," whispered her aunt, and the sharp whisper seemed like the voice of the tempter, "the time has come. Your father is breaking his heart. He cannot leave his old home. He will die, child, and you might have saved him! I will not speak of myself; whatever happens I can but starve; but even poor old Abel! Rachel was with me but an hour ago to know what you would do. Alas! so many helpless except yourself, and you so unreasonable!"

She stopped, for the step on the gravel approached, and the two ladies rose to their feet to receive the deep bow with dignified curtsies.

"Mistress Eleanor," said Sir Michael Newport, standing before her with uncovered head, "my impatience overrides my courtesy. You asked for a week—but a few days have elapsed, and I am here."

"My small request then met with no consideration at your hands," said Eleanor, hoarsely.

"Surely not," he exclaimed, earnestly. "Your lightest wish would be a law to me, but—"

He darted a look at Mistress Betty, whose alarmed expression betrayed to him that her summons had been secretly sent. He drew back stiffly.

"If I intrude," he said, "I can but ask ten thousand pardons, and leave you at once."

"Oh no," exclaimed Eleanor suddenly. "You mistake me; it was best to curtail the time; I was but taken by surprise."

Sir Michael looked at her earnestly. He loved her with all the fervour of a first love, though more than fifty years had already passed over his head, and he longed with an unspeakable longing to find some response in those magnificent eyes now looking up into his with an expression to which he had no key.

Generally it is to the young only belongs the power of showing without words the powerful emotions of the soul. To men like Sir Michael Newport, naught remained but words to express them, and words are not the best exponents. No one who beheld the stately figure and set face could have guessed at the stormy way his heart was beating under that self-controlled exterior.

"Let us go within," said Mistress Betty, leading the way. "The dews are falling; it is only the young and foolish who can risk the consequences of imprudence."

Sir Michael and Eleanor followed her in silence; neither could find light words to say, the hour was too full of trouble and suspense. Mistress Betty flitted on before them with her quick, frivolous movements, now with a restless hand plucking off a leaf of a shrub as they passed, or tapping the gold-headed cane she carried on the wrought-iron balustrade of the terrace. She made some light remarks as they went indoors, and she conducted them into a small room on the ground floor.

The room was panelled, painted in two shades of white; it was sweet with the fragrance of potpourri, which filled the many old oriental bowls which adorned it.

"This room has been witness of many a solemn conclave," she said, smiling and drawing forward her chair. "Here King Charles himself—but—"

She paused abruptly, then went on. "In my young days two proposals of marriage took place here; the first of Lady Edmonstone, my sister; of the other we will not speak, as it was received unfavourably."

The light talk jarred on Sir Michael. "Madam," he said, "may I be allowed to ask, as a very great favour, for five minutes' private conversation with your niece?"

"Yes," she answered, hurriedly. "Of course; it is customary. I will leave you."

She crossed the room to the door, as she went out casting a piteous look at her niece.

Eleanor read in that glance devouring anxiety. Poor, frivolous, idle, harmless soul! what would become of her, thrown on a cold world without home, and penniless—a creature who had never in her life done anything more useful than make comfits and potpourri, and work knotting stitch?

There was a pause when the door had closed behind her. Eleanor seated herself on a narrow sofa; Sir Michael came slowly forward and stood before her. All was very still, and the great clock in the corner throbbed loud and heavily like a human heart.

"Eleanor," he said (and at the sound of her name she gave a slight start and shiver), "I have that to say to you for which I claim all your patience and most kind indulgence."

"I am ready to listen," she answered, in a dull, still voice.

He walked once or twice up and down the room, then came quickly up and sat down beside her. "Eleanor," he said, "it is only young men that can talk glibly of their love; mine is too deep, too strong for words; rivers, when they have but lately started from their source, babble and sing and talk, but as they roll on they get deep and still, and the current is more powerful than it has ever been before."

"It is very likely," said Eleanor, gently, "I do not doubt it, sir."

"I would give my life for you, Eleanor," he went on, and now he took her cold hand in both his. "Think not that these are idle words; I would fain prove them to be true, sweetheart. To show you better this all-powerful love, I can even give you back yourself, and not accept that precious gift that your reception of me to-day has told me that you are prepared to give."

He paused; Eleanor had drawn away her hands, and clasped them both together. She was gazing at him with frightened eyes.

"Sweet one," he said, "do not look at me like that! Hear what I have to say. You, in your infinite generosity, were prepared to give up all the hopes and visions of your youth for your poor father's sake, and marry an old man with no merit but his love for you; but I will not be outdone in sacrifice. Look you, dear; I will give you back all the mortgage-deeds; they shall be but my lover's offering at your feet. They will save your father, and save you too, for I ask for nothing—nothing, child; least of all your thanks."

Eleanor still sat motionless, looking at him wildly; it seemed as if his meaning could scarcely reach her understanding.

He broke the silence at last. "Mistress Eleanor," he said, "do you understand?"

Then the strange look relaxed. She turned to him, putting out both her hands with the gesture of a child; the tears rained down her cheeks.

"I understand," she cried. "But it is too much. God bless you for your kindness, but I could not accept such a gift, nor could my father. It is impossible."

He looked at her searchingly, and there was a certain hardness in his tone.

"Tell me," he said, "on your oath, do you love any other man?"

Her eyes met his fearlessly. "I am ready to say it on my oath," she answered, "I love no one but Robbie and the King."

A dark, troubled look played over his face as he heard her somewhat childish answer.

"We must understand each other very fully," he said. "Let us not make any mistake, on one side or the other. You refuse my offer of restoring all the mortgage claims?"

"I cannot accept," she whispered.

"You will take no favour at my hands? Nay! I presume not to press you further; forgive me for a proposal which I fear has seemed to you unwarrantable. Well, well—"

He paused a moment as if to gather breath and courage to resume.

"Be it so. I understand, then, that though as yet no spark of affection for myself has kindled in your heart, yet that as no living man has awakened such an affection, I have everything to hope, if you will marry me."

Eleanor bowed her head gravely; the tears were still running down her cheeks. Would it never end? she thought. How long were these preliminaries!

He resumed. "But one thing must be clear between us; we are not of the same politics. The man whom you call king" (Eleanor was sitting upright now, and her flashing eyes warned him not to say too much) "I do not recognise. That your twin brother should be so close an adherent of that cause, and in exile, I regret extremely; but it should be understood between us that all intercourse between yourself and your brother, when you shall be my wife, must be of a purely social character, and loyalty to me must make you, if you cannot change, at least conceal your politics."

"You need not be afraid," said Eleanor, haughtily; "I have gauged the full depth of my obligations. Robbie told me that if I married you I should have seen the last of him."

"It is hard, very hard," said Sir Michael, thoughtfully. "Your twin-brother, so closely tied that you seem to have the same face, the same look."

"And hitherto the same heart and soul," cried Eleanor.

Sir Michael spoke again somewhat stiffly. "You have my offer; take it, and let me leave you; or refuse it again, and I cast all mistrust to the winds, and deem myself the happiest man on God's earth to-day."

Eleanor stood up before him and stretched out both her hands. "I cannot accept your sacrifice," she said, "so marry me. I will be a good wife; your generosity has made me trust you as I never trusted man before, much less Whig. Be kind to me. I will try that you shall never repent your goodness. I cannot change the politics ingrained in my blood, but at least this much I can promise you—long adherence to a vanquished cause has taught me how—I will hold my tongue."

Sir Michael bent down and pressed her hands to his lips. He would fain have spoken further of his love, but he forbore, for the colour was coming and going in her cheek, and her lips were quivering; and he judged wisely that she could bear no more.

WHAT SHOULD WE AFFORD FOR DRESS?

By DORA DE BLAQUIERE.

PART II.

THE usual remark on returning to England after an absence from it is, "How very well dressed everyone appears to be." And, in truth, social position seems to make but little difference in this country, where the materials are so cheap. The chief difference really consists in the style of the making-up, the goodness of the materials, and in the way of wearing them. The lady who has one hundred a year for all her needs must look as well as her equal in station who has a husband to supply her wants, and an income of £1,500 or £2,000, and in allotting £8, or £10, or £30, or £40 to clothes per annum, both have the same problem to face, and both must present an equally suitable and good appearance to the world. The case is the same with men, amongst whom the rate of spending on this object seems curiously alike. The only difference is to be found in the quality, and in the style of shops where the things are bought. This fact will, I hope, help us to make a general table, or list, of the needs of everyone, leaving out, of course, the accidents (as they may be called) of life—the extra apparel for fêtes, Court dresses, and for games. In these last, however, nearly every young man and girl of the present day seem to join. Both for the warbrobes of men and women, the articles really needed would be much alike, of course. We all wear gowns and bonnets, and men all wear coats and hats. I have slightly altered a reasonable list of apparel made out by a contemporary, for a young fellow living on an income or a salary of £1 per week.

One overcoat, to last two years, £2	£1	0	0
One umbrella, to last two years, 9s.	0	4	6
Repairs and re-covering, 5s.	0	2	6
Two felt hats at 4s. 6d.	0	9	0
One best coat and vest, to last two years, at £2 2s.	1	1	0

One black serge jacket and vest, for office wear, £1 10s.	£1	10	0
Three pairs trousers, to last two years, 12s. per pair, £1 16s.	0	18	0
Two pairs boots, to last two years, at 10s.	0	10	0
Repairs	0	7	0
Four pair socks, at 1s.	0	4	0
Three flannel shirts, at 5s.	0	15	0
Two pairs pants, at 2s. 6d.	0	5	0
Two under vests, at 1s. 6d.	0	3	0
Nine collars at 4d. each, 3s.	0	3	0
12 handkerchiefs, to last two years, at 6d.	0	3	0
Three neckties at 1s.	0	3	0
Three pairs cuffs, at 8d.	0	2	0
Two pairs gloves, at 1s. 6d.	0	3	0
Two night-shirts, 3s. each	0	6	0
	£8	9	0

Now, this list contains the usual articles required by men in the way of dress; but, of course the list would not be quite the same every year, and the circumstance of a person being a careful wearer of his clothing, or the reverse, would make a very serious difference in the amount that would be left with which to commence another year. The mending and darning would also be a consideration, and a great assistance towards making everything last out the time assigned to it. Exception has been taken to the two pairs of ten shilling boots to wear for two years, as well as to the fact that no every-day suit is allowed for. Of course a change in either item would entail an increase of dress allowance.

The difference between this list of articles for dress and that of a man with more means, must be regulated by the number of extra things required, as he may rise in the ranks of society. He would then need a suit of dress clothes, linen shirts, set of studs, house shoes, dress shoes, dressing-gown and slippers, cricketing flannels, caps, and belt, tall hat, railway rug and travelling bag, macintosh, etc.

A suit of dress clothes will last from three to five years, and I find that most men consider a great-coat good for four years. The various allowances made for dress by men with incomes varying from £300, £500, £800, to several thousands a-year, ranges from £18, £22, to £30, £35, £45, and one man only, a great traveller and wanderer, gets as high as £70! and doubtless men with such incomes can afford to go to more fashionable and better shops, and to have a great many more things. I find two suits of clothes a-year, two pairs of boots, half-a-dozen silk ties, and half-a-dozen collars very generally given as the usual amount required. As a rule bachelors appear to spend more than married men, and very rich men are generally careful and economical wearers of clothes, and spend but little upon them. The poor man, in fact, and the poor woman are obliged to expend more lavishly in proportion to their income than those who are better off, for they only have their respectable appearance to depend upon. In the case of the poor clerk or governess, shabbiness is one of the unpardonable sins, and would militate against their securing good situations. It seems to me that in this fact alone lies the answer to the many queries as to the propriety and rightness of paying attention to dress and personal appearance. Thus I would have girls and boys carefully taught every duty of the toilet as well as every secret respecting the due expenditure of money on their clothing, so that it shall yield the best results possible in its wearing qualities as well as in its appearance and style.

The great trouble of young people of both sexes appears to be that they usually enter on life and the command of money before they have had any lessons on its management. Therefore one cannot but wonder that they get on so well, and how few mistakes they appear to make. I trust that my few notes may prove a contribution towards helping them all considerably.

When I turn to the question of the clothing of girls, I find a very universal rule which fixes girls' allowances at £15, £20, to £30 per annum. In families whose incomes range from £800 to £1,500 per annum, the allowance of the wife would be about £50; or if there were three or four little children under ten, £65 would be a good allowance for the apparel of the mother and her children. Several husbands and fathers on being asked whether they had a certain ratio on which they made these allowances, have answered in the negative. They "only did what seemed usual, and what other people around them did." An income of £100 a year is not an uncommon one for women, from fortunes to which it seems to bear an extravagant ratio. But in this case it is intended to include other things, viz., travelling in all ordinary cases, books, stationery, presents, and charities, one far-seeing husband seeking to include all the wedding presents in his spouse's year's allowance. As these form a very great tax in the present day, when the first year came to an end the lady produced an account, which proved, in spite of her artistic needlework which she had lavished, and clever management, the presents had been too numerous for even her £100 to manage them all. So a compromise was arrived at by which she promised to pay half of six presents, or the whole of three; above six, her husband was to pay entirely for both of them.

And now I propose to give one or two lists of clothes which may be suggestive as to the disposition of a dress allowance of £15, leaving a small margin.

Four pairs of black stockings (thread), at 2s. 10d.	0	11	4
Four pairs of woollen stockings, at 3s.	0	12	0
One dozen handkerchiefs	0	5	0
One pair of black stays	0	10	6
Two pairs of house shoes, at 4s.	0	8	0
Two pairs of boots.	1	1	0
One pair of walking shoes	0	8	6
Gloves	0	15	0
Winter dress, 3s. per yard	1	10	0
Nun's cloth dress, 1s. per yard.	0	16	0
Linings, etc.	0	3	6
Washing dress	0	10	0
Bonnet	0	6	0
Summer hat, lace, and muslin	0	3	0
Ulster, £1 1s.; winter jacket, £1 1s.	2	2	0

Two flannel petticoats, 10s.	0	10	0
Underlinen	0	10	0
Winter petticoat	0	10	6
	£13	6	10

This last I have on careful inquiry found can be reduced, so as to meet the wants of a girl who has only £10 to dress upon, or only £100 a year on which to depend for everything; and it will be seen that the second and third year's lists would be much less than this, as there would be no winter jacket to buy, and no ulster.

Three pairs cotton stockings at 1s. 6d.	4	6
Three pairs wool stockings at 2s.	6	0
Eight handkerchiefs at 6d.	4	0

In both these lists I need hardly say that no provision has been made for the services of a dressmaker, though assistance might be got in the house with a workwoman hired by the day.

If in London, the shopping ground must not be Regent Street or New Bond Street, but Edgware Road, Tottenham Court Road, Westbourne Grove, and even as far away as Upper Street, Islington, where very excellent and cheap shops abound. Oxford Street, during the sales, is very cheap, especially in the matter of straw bonnets and hats. I saw quantities of both during the summer sales at sixpence and a shilling each!

When we come to allowances of £30 per annum, we generally find, as in the case of men, an increased expenditure needful, for out-of-door games have to be considered, a more or less appropriate dress for them being requisite. A riding-habit, too, may be needful, and evening dress must be thought of also. So far as my inquiries carry me, I find that people with £30 a year usually have a great deal to do with it, and much judgment is required to make it stretch over all the wants of their circumstances. In the matter of underclothes, while the stock should never be let down, it should never be a large one, four of everything being quite enough. Four good night-gowns, for instance, the work being renewed when necessary, will last nearly six years; and if the strain on them be relieved by the purchase of two new ones, for two years longer.

The clothes purchased must be divided, so that all the expensive outlay should not come into one year. For instance, you would do well to have one year a tailor-made gown, and the next year a good silk, or an evening dress. A mantle one year, and a summer mantle or jacket the next. I am of opinion that the fewer clothes one has, the better; and I think that the practice of buying many dresses of the same sort is a mistaken one. It is never well to be forced into buying things in a hurry, nor for "an occasion," as it is called. Therefore, the old plan of a "best dress" is not an unwise one. Three dresses a year is the utmost anyone should get on any allowance from £15 to £30 per annum.

When we come back to the question with which we started, of "How much should be spent on the dress of the family?" we think the answer, with reference to small incomes, would be about a tenth of the whole. But circumstances alter the case so often, that this is not a guide. Thus dress expenses resemble the rents paid in London, which are usually quite out of proportion to our incomes, so that we must save in other ways for the money which we are compelled to expend in this. We must have one servant less, or omit the luxury of cabs from our calculations. And in the matter of dress, women are more slaves to the world's opinion than men, for they must have suitable mourning for the dead, proper clothes for the marriage festivities, and when it seems right that the family should be fitly represented at the fête or flower show, it is the women who must consider their apparel. Men's clothes now are so changeless in fashion, and so sombre in hue, that the days when they too "walked in silk attire" seem to have passed away for ever.

VARIETIES.

HE CHANGED HIS MIND.

She (blushing deeply): And you wish to pay your addresses to me?

He (enthusiastically): That has been the dream of my existence since I first met you.

She: I scarcely know what to say. I think I must consult mother.

He: Certainly. I should expect you as a dutiful daughter to consult your mother on a matter of so much importance.

She: You have never met mother?

He: I never had the pleasure.

She: You will be delighted to know her. She is a noted woman's rights woman, and president of the Society for Woman's Emancipation.

He (somewhat frigidly): H'm! is that so?

She (proudly): Well, you would think so if you heard her talk. Why, she is just boiling over with fervour on the subject of woman's wrongs.

He (consulting his watch): Well—er—I—I—er—ought to have told you that I—er—couldn't stay but a minute this evening. My—er—uncle is in town, and—er—well, I will call again, when we can renew the subject of this evening's conversation.

ONE, TWO, AND THREE MAKE SIX.

A scholar just returned from the university sat down to supper with his father and mother. Three eggs were served up.

"Why," said the husband to his wife, "your supper is scanty. You should treat your son more liberally."

"Let us be content," observed the son, "since there are six eggs on the table."

"How," asked his father, "do you prove that?"

"Easily enough," he answered. "Do not one, two, and three make six?"

"I will then," rejoined the father, "give one egg to your mother, take two for myself, and you, my boy, may help yourself to the rest."

PART I.
AMBITION.

LUCY OLIVER stood contemplative over a large piece of linen that she was thinking of fashioning into a garment for one of her brothers. Thinking is scarcely the word, for her mind was astray, and her thoughts ran hither and thither like—so many wild animals. We wonder what became of the fugitives, for they were in London one minute and in the country the next, and they fled from one member of her family to another with amazing rapidity. Oh, these thoughts! If we could only regulate them, we should conquer the world, metaphorically speaking. And all this time Lucy kept her eyes on the piece of linen, just as if her meditations were wholly and solely concentrated upon it.

She was startled by the entrance of her brother Fred, and the words—

"Now shut up, Lucy, and talk to me. Come into the garden and we shall not be interrupted."

She hastily and not-unwillingly folded up her neglected work, and went with her brother into a long, old-fashioned garden at the back of the small house in which they dwelt.

He put his arm round her waist, and danced her down a narrow path between beds and borders of fruit and flowers, to a kind of sloping orchard at the end of this homely garden. Here he lifted her on the low branch of an aged apple tree, she out of breath and protesting all the while.

"Let us play at see-saw once more before I go to London," he said, seating himself beside her.

"To London!" she exclaimed, almost slipping from her seat.

"Yes, it is all settled. I heard from Bolton to-day, and he says I have only to come up and succeed. With my magnificent voice, as he expresses it, he thinks it a cruel shame that I should be tied all my life to a desk or counter. Mother almost agrees with him."

"But, Fred, it is one thing to be first fiddle in the country, and another to play no fiddle at all in town. Besides, what shall we do without you? My salary won't keep us all, and we can't depend on Martin's small earnings."

"But you don't understand, my dear Lucy. I shall make more in one night than I am doing now in a year. Everybody says so."

"But what if we were to lose you as we have lost Ruth! When she married and went off to Canada, you would have thought that she and William were about to conquer a kingdom, at least; and now, for aught we know, they and their children are starving."

"I hope you don't class me with my unworthy brother-in-law. He was a thorough good-for-nothing."

"So are most men, it seems to me. You think of nothing but yourselves. I beg your pardon, Fred, but the moment you are in a fair way of earning your living you want to go elsewhere."

The apple-tree branch began to move uneasily, for Fred grew angry. He was of an irascible temperament, and that his sister knew. Further conversation was, however, interrupted by a call from a neighbour-orchard—a green and dry ditch alone dividing the hilly, grass-grown, and tree-embowered slopes of these twin apple-gardens.

"Hullo, young people, are you stealing my medlars as you used to?" came from a gruff voice, and an elderly man, with a mat-basket in one hand and a strong cane in the other, stood on the opposite side of the ditch.

"No, we are honest as the day," cried Lucy, jumping off the tree, and slipping down one slope and climbing up the other. "I say, Mr. Gripson, Fred is going to London," she added, standing by the side of the old gentleman.

Fred, meanwhile, sat on, with his back to the pair, dangling his legs irritably.

"Too fine a spark for business, eh!" bellowed Mr. Gripson into Fred's back. "Wants a profession!"

This word was prolonged till it ended in a kind of provoking whistle, which fairly pierced through Fred, and sent him off the tree.

"Just so, sir. I am anxious for a profession," said Fred, facing Mr. Gripson.

"Like father, like son. Too grand for trade. Going after Will and Ruth, eh?"

Mr. Gripson set down the mat-basket, which was full of apples, and leaned on his cane. He trembled slightly, and Lucy perceiving it, put her hand within his arm. Fred immediately cleared the ditch and stood on the other side of the old man.

"Don't be a fool, Fred," said Gripson, recovering any self-possession that he might have lost. "You must be the mainstay of your mother."

"That is just what I mean to be," rejoined Fred.

"Then come and tell her so," said Gripson, and the trio turned and walked together up the orchard, Lucy carrying the mat-basket.

Old Gripson, as he was familiarly called, was a rich tradesman, who had made a fortune in a small shop which he had neither enlarged nor beautified. As he began life so he was ending it—with this difference, that he had begun it with little or no capital, and he would end it, so far as he could see, a rich man. He had an only son whom he had willed to succeed him, both in shop and fortune; but in this he had been disappointed. William Gripson had, as they say, a soul above the counter, and would not take up his father's business. Old Gripson refused to give him a profession, as he might have done, and so, for want of a little concession on either side, much misery ensued to both.

Hoping to bring his son over to the side of trade, old Gripson gladly consented to his marrying Ruth Oliver, his schoolfellow and next door neighbour; and for a time William Gripson condescended to undertake his father's accounts, with the proviso that he was not to appear in the shop. He soon tired of this, and, before the first year of his married life was spent, made up his mind to emigrate. As old Gripson perceived that his business would soon go to those voracious clear-alls known as "The dogs," he made no objection. Why, by the way, are all the bad bits and bad hits bestowed upon our most faithful friends? Why do we "go to the dogs," when we can go nowhere else? Old Gripson let his son take that doubtful journey without making any great efforts to stop him. "If you choose to leave a good business and good prospects and go off on a fool's errand, you must follow your bent," he said. "I'll give you a start, and that's all I can do. I shall take Martin Oliver as foreman in your place, and he won't be too proud to stand behind the counter."

All this had come to pass, with the usual results. At first glowing letters had been received from the Canadian backwoods; by degrees their colour became more sombre, and at last they ceased to arrive at all. At least nearly twelve months had elapsed since any news reached either of the twin-houses of the son and daughter who had left them. They had been gone over six years. Mrs. Oliver, Lucy, and Martin had written and written, but had received no reply. Old Gripson had maintained a rigid silence, though no one doubted his affection for his son. Martin Oliver had been almost more than that son to him, while Lucy had striven to soften his feelings towards the exiles.

This was the state of affairs, and while the trio walked up the orchard, each was thinking of the past in connection with the present. It was autumn, and a fine crop of ruddy apples dotted the trees and strewed the ground, awaiting the cider mill; for old Gripson was a careful soul, and let neither apples nor time rot. If he was somewhat hard, he was honest, and his well-earned gains were neither hoarded nor wasted.

He and his companions stood a few moments at the top of the orchard to rest after the ascent, and as the sun glinted through the trees and lighted them up, they made a pretty picture. Old Gripson, white-haired and somewhat bent, leaning on his staff; Lucy, dark-haired and erect, glancing through the branches at the sunny sky; and handsome Fred, turning towards the garden and house, as if anxious to be off. If the two orchards were separated by a dry fosse, the gardens were divided by a quickset hedge and redundant fruit trees. The latter grew in the Gripson garden, and an amicable arrangement had been made between the two families that the Olivers should claim all the fruit that grew on their side. A magnificent crop of plums crowned the hedge, and as our trio approached it Lucy said cheerily—

"We have the best of it this year, Mr. Gripson. The biggest plums are on our side."

"Thieves all of you!" said Gripson. "You manage to bend the branches your own way. But you young folk will go your own way, and have no respect for the opinion of your elders. It wasn't so in my day."

"Ah, the good old times!" hummed Fred, proving that he had a fine voice.

"We will go at once to your mother," said old Gripson, and he led the way through a passage into the street. This passage cut his house exactly in two, and had a long and somewhat dark shop on one side, and a small parlour with a kitchen at its back, on the other. One of the four bedrooms had been converted into a sitting-room by his wife, but after her death had been used as a sort of smoking-room by her son, and such companions as his father saw fit to encourage.

Merriton was a small country town, and it chanced to be market day, so the shop was full of customers. Lucy looked into it as she reached the street, and saw her brother Martin busily engaged. It was an unostentatious, unpretentious shop, with a small bow window, in which there was no display, for Mr. Gripson was wont to say that all the light was wanted inside, and he was too well known to need to be placarded, either by cheap and worthless goods or flashy advertisements. Accordingly, save for the bow window and a counter reaching into it, people could scarcely have recognised it as a shop at all. Uniform with it, but minus the bow, was the Olivers' small abode. A very respectable one it was, such as children of budding genius draw, with a door in the middle, and four windows, two at top and two at bottom. It was scrupulously neat, both without and within, and Lucy loved it dearly. She was gifted with that greatest of mental gifts, a contented mind, and when she and her companions entered the parlour on the right side of the passage, where Mrs. Oliver was seated at work, she thought it was the dearest and cosiest corner in the habitable globe, and wondered why Fred should wish to quit it.

Mrs. Oliver was a round-faced, good-humoured looking woman, who had taken life easily until she lost her husband. He had been dead about five years, and she had had a grievance ever since. The fact was that with him she had lost not only a kind partner, but a livelihood. He had been confidential clerk at the great coal merchant's down by the river, and had a good salary. He had purchased the small house they lived in with his savings, and when he was taken suddenly from his wife and children, this was all he had to leave them. He had procured a clerkship for Fred when he was about eighteen, in his own office, and had given him and Martin a fair education at the grammar school of the town; moreover, he had brought them up in the fear of God.

But as too often happens when the head of the family is removed, all did not turn out exactly as he could have wished, for Ruth, the eldest daughter, married a young man of whom he had not a good opinion, and Fred, his eldest son, kicked against the goads of office life, as so many unfortunately do in these restless days. His younger children were more promising, for Martin cheerfully accepted the proposal of his father's old friend Gripson to take a post in his shop, and Lucy went as daily governess to the children of Mr. Sempold, the principal lawyer of the town. This was the state of affairs when our trio entered Mrs. Oliver's parlour. She had never designated her two small rooms dining and drawing room.

"Here's a pretty kettle of fish, Mrs. Oliver," began old Gripson. "Fred's fever time has come, and he can't stop in one place, like the rest o' the maniacs."

"I don't wonder, Mr. Gripson," returned Mrs. Oliver. "His salary is too small for anything. I really can't give him enough to eat. We've a house over our heads, and that's about all; for work as we will we can't get food and clothing. I do all the housework myself; when Lucy has finished with her teaching she slaves over the making and mending; and the poor boys—"

"'Tis Martin's own fault if he hasn't enough to eat," growled old Gripson. "I don't stint him, and he has his meals with me. But does Fred think that food will fall into his mouth every time he opens it, just because he chances to have a voice like a bull, and roars in London. He's more likely to get it filled with pea-soup fog."

"Really, Mr. Gripson!" began Fred and his mother simultaneously, much offended.

"Yes, really—'tis the plain truth," echoed Gripson. "I was apprenticed in London, and saw a little of life. It was pretty fast in my young days, but it's a thousand times faster now. Stage coaches then—railways now. Take my advice, Fred, and stop where you are. Take warning by—" Here the voice faltered. "Don't leave your mother to go after a jack-o'-lantern. Bide where Providence has placed you, and the Lord will provide for you; but there's no promise for those as go astray."

"I am not going astray, sir, I'm going to use the talent I have."

"Pack o' nonsense. You can use it here at Merriton, and you do use it. When you're singing at the People's Concerts, as you call 'em, one can hear ee a mile off. Old Jack Mitchell said to me the other day, 'Master Fred do zing as if he wur a big bass-viol.'"

"I'm much obliged to him," said Fred, smothering a laugh. "That only proves that I shall fill a concert-room."

"And empty the pockets of everyone belonging to you. What do you say, Lucy? You've the sense of the family."

"I would rather he stopped at home and got on at the wharf."

"Lucy has no ambition either for herself or her brothers," broke in Mrs. Oliver. "She might have gone abroad with Mrs. Maynard, but she declined."

"And what would you have done without her, I wonder? Why, she stopped at home on your account, Mrs. Oliver, which is more than any o' the girls do nowadays. They leave their parents, and brothers and sisters that want 'em, to rush off to sisterhoods, or colleges, or some other societies that don't want 'em. I keep my eyes open, and see many disappear from Merriton whose duty it is to stop here."

"You are so conservative, Mr. Gripson."

"Old ways are good enough for me. But what do you mean to do, Fred?"

Fred put a bold face upon it, and said he was in correspondence with a friend who wished him to go up to London and have his voice tried. This friend had mentioned him to a celebrated professor, who was willing to hear him sing, but everyone believed he had only to appear in public and make a rapid fortune. The truth was that he had a fine but uncultivated voice. He had studied music to some extent, and could accompany himself on the piano. He had, indeed, a smattering of many instruments, and had been taken up by some of the influential people of the town. This it was that had made him discontented with his position, and given him the craze to get out of it.

The little conclave sat some time discussing this matter, but each member of it was of the same opinion when it broke up as when it began. Mr. Gripson took his leave with a very surly "Good afternoon," and Lucy accompanied him to the door.

"No news, I suppose?" he said.

Lucy shook her head. She was his only confidante, and knew how much worse his bark was than his bite. He had told her that he would give all he possessed to get his son and daughter-in-law back again, but that she must on no account betray his feelings. He repeated it on the present occasion.

"We must set some sort of an example to the other young folk," he said. "If I were to seem to give in, we should have your boys saying I encouraged them to leave home and to neglect their proper interests. But I'm forgetting mine, and Martin will be wanting me. We must warn him to keep Fred at home."

"I am afraid none of us will succeed in that," said Lucy. "He is tired of Merriton and desk-work, and thinks he is sure to make a fortune if only he can get into his 'proper sphere,' as he calls it."

Old Gripson laughed, and went into his shop, which he found full, for it was Saturday and market day, which accounted for Fred and Lucy's half-holiday comparative idleness. There were, however, plenty of assistants in the shop, and its master had not been missed.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.
ON THE PARADE.

BESSIE had spoken out of the simplicity of her honest heart; but there is a great power in earnestness, and her words were not to fall to the ground. In spite of Edna's faults, many and glaring as they were, she was very susceptible to good influences; her affection for Neville Sinclair proved this, as well as her friendship with Bessie; underneath the leaven of selfishness and self-will engendered by a false education there was a large margin of generosity and truth; if she were quick to sin, she was also quick to repent. Edna did not again allude to the subject of her unhappiness; there were no more fireside confidences with Bessie, but for two or three days she was very quiet and thoughtful, and there were no excited moods of merriment to jar on Bessie. She was gentle and affectionate in her manner to her mother, and this unusual docility seemed to add to Mrs. Sefton's uneasiness. Bessie did not feel comfortable in her mind about Edna, the old spring and elasticity seemed gone for ever; there was manifest effort in everything she did through the day, and yet she never rested willingly. She laid out plans for every hour, she made appointments with her friends; every day there was driving, shopping, tea-drinking, often a concert or recitation to finish off the evening; but now and then, in the midst of a lively conversation, there would be the look of utter exhaustion on her face, and when her friends had left she would throw herself on the couch as though all strength had gone. On these occasions, when she was spent and weary, it was not always easy to control her irritability. Mrs. Sefton was not a judicious woman, and in spite of her devotion to her daughter, she often showed a want of tact and a lack of wisdom that galled Edna's jaded spirits. She was always urging Edna to seek new distractions, or appealing to her sense of vanity.

"Mamma thinks a new dress or ornament can make any girl happy," she said one day, with a curl of her lip; "but she is mistaken, I don't care about them now."

One afternoon Mrs. Sefton had been lunching with a friend, and when she returned she brought Edna a present; it was a pin brooch set with brilliants, a most costly toy, and Edna had admired it in an idle moment; but as she opened the little case there was no pleased expression on her face.

"Oh, mamma, why have you bought this?" she asked in a dissatisfied voice.

"You admired it so much, my darling, and so I thought I would please myself by giving you this surprise."

"It is very pretty," holding it out for Bessie's inspection; "but I have more ornaments than I know how to use now. I am sorry you bought it, mamma; it must have cost so much money."

"Do you think I begrudge you anything?" replied Mrs. Sefton, who was much chagrined by this reception of her gift.

Edna looked up at this moment, and saw the disappointed look on her mother's face. Her better feelings were touched, and she threw her arms round her neck.

"Mother, dear, why will you load me so with things?" she remonstrated. "You give me everything, and I do nothing for you in return; please don't give me anything more for a long time. I am horribly discontented, nothing seems to give me pleasure; even this beautiful pin is wasted on me."

"Don't talk so, Edna," returned her mother, with the tears in her eyes; "if you knew how it troubled me to hear you; there is nothing that I would not do to make you happy, but if you talk in that way you take all the spirit out of me."

"Then I won't talk so any more," replied Edna, repentantly, and she fastened the brilliant pin in some lace she wore, and begged them both to admire it; and she was very affectionate to her mother all that evening, and seemed bent on making her smile. Mrs. Sefton looked almost happy that night; she thought Edna looked better and more like herself, and she had not coughed once, and no one knew that as the girl took off her trinket that night she suddenly hid her face in her hands and wept.

"It is all no use, mother," she sobbed; "no money can buy me content nor make me good and happy; if I were only like Bessie — Bessie is worthy of him, but I never was — I never was."

When Bessie had been with her friends more than a week she began to wonder that there was no news of Richard, and one day she asked Edna if he were all alone at the Grange.

"Yes, I believe so," was the careless answer; "but Richard is a regular old bachelor, and he will not be dull."

"But he comes to see you sometimes?"

"He has not been yet, but that is mamma's fault, and not Ritchie's; he wrote on Wednesday to say he was coming from Saturday to Monday, but mamma said she wanted the room for Miss Shelton, and after all she did not come, so it was a pity Richard should be disappointed; and now Miss Shelton may come next week, and there is no room for him again. Mamma has just written to say that she cannot possibly have him until Saturday week."

Bessie felt a pang of disappointment; she was going home on the Thursday, and would just miss him. What a pity!

he had been so kind and friendly to her during her visit to the Grange, and she would have liked to have seen him. She wondered vaguely if he would be disappointed too when he heard that she had gone. It was thoughtless of Mrs. Sefton to invite Miss Shelton, but most likely she had done it on purpose to keep her stepson away. Edna had told her rather sorrowfully the other day that her mother did not understand Richard any better.

"He is never at his ease with her, and so he never appears to advantage in her presence," she said. "Poor Ritchie! I am afraid he has a dull life at the Grange!"

Bessie was afraid so too, but she dared not say so; she could only appeal to Edna's generosity, and beg her to consider that she owed a duty to her brother. But she could not say much on this point: a girl cannot well enter the lists on a young man's behalf, however sensible and free from nonsense she may be; she is bound by a sense of conventionality; and though in her heart Bessie was very sorry for Richard, very much interested on his behalf, she felt her pity must be kept to herself.

Bessie was not ashamed to own her disappointment, and she was human enough to bear a grudge against the unoffending Miss Shelton, who proved to be an old governess of Edna's, and a most worthy woman.

In consequence of Edna's temporary indisposition, which made her languid in the morning, the family breakfast was unusually late, and was rarely ready before ten. It was Bessie's habit, therefore, to go out after an early cup of cocoa, for an hour's solitary walk; she enjoyed this more than any other part of the day. The Parade was almost deserted at the time, and she met few people. She loved to stroll down to the beach and watch the waves rolling on the shore; the cold, fresh air invigorated her, and her old colour returned. Her mother would have been at rest about her if she could have seen the girl's strong elastic step, or noticed how the sea breezes had brought back her fresh colour. Bessie would return from these morning walks with refreshed spirits and vigorous, youthful appetite that Edna good-naturedly quizzed. "You would be hungry, too, if you had swallowed those delicious sea-breezes," Bessie would answer, nothing daunted by these remarks, and she persevered in these early strolls.

The morning after their little conversation about Richard, Bessie went out as usual. There had been rain during the night, and the seats on the Parade were soaking; but the sun was shining now, and the little pools in the road were sparkling in the warm sunlight, and the sea looked clear and blue.

"What a delicious morning!" thought Bessie, as she walked on briskly. "There is rather a strong wind, though."

Oh, that gentleman has lost his hat!" The gentleman in question had been leaning on the railings, looking down on some boys playing on the shingle; but as his hat took to itself wings, and rolled playfully down the Parade, after the manner of hats, he followed it in quick pursuit. Happily it rolled almost to Bessie's feet, and she captured it.

"Thank you so much," observed the young man, gratefully; but as Bessie held it to him with a smile, they mutually started, and a simultaneous exclamation rose to their lips.

"Mr. Sinclair!"

"Good heavens, Miss Lambert!" and then rather awkwardly they shook hands.

"Who would have thought of seeing you here?" went on Mr. Sinclair, rather nervously, as he brushed the wet from his hat. "But of course one meets everyone at Brighton, so I ought not to be surprised. I only came down last night, and I have already exchanged greetings with half a dozen acquaintances. Have you been here long?"

"About ten days. I am staying with the Seftons, at Glenyan Mansions. Mrs. Sefton and Edna are both here."

"Edna here?" and then he bit his lip, and a dark flush crossed his face. "I hope Miss Sefton is quite well?" he continued, coldly.

"Indeed, she is not," returned Bessie, bluntly. But this sudden encounter had taken her by surprise, and she hardly knew what she was saying. "She is very far from well. Oh, quite ill, I should say; though she will have it that there is nothing the matter. But she is so changed that she is hardly like the same girl. Oh no, she is perfectly different, not like Edna at all, and —"

"What has been the matter with her?" he asked abruptly; but he turned his face away as he put the question. They were both standing by the railings, and now he crossed his arms upon them, leaning heavily against them, so that Bessie could not see his face. There was no one in sight, except the boys playing beneath them, and an old man hobbling on crutches. "What has been the matter with her?" he repeated, as Bessie hesitated.

"She caught cold, and could not shake it off, and so her mother got frightened about her, and brought her here. But it does not seem to do her much good. It is her spirits, I think, for she has lost all her fun, and she is not at all like the old Edna, and it grieves me to see her," stammered Bessie, confused at having said so much, and yet not willing to be silent. "What can I say? What ought I to do for them both?" she thought, in much distress.

"There has never been anything wrong with her spirits before," replied Mr. Sinclair, in rather an incredulous tone. But Bessie had caught sight of his face; it was quite pale now, and he was pulling his moustache nervously, and she was not a bit deceived by his voice. "Do you mean that she is not happy? I hope—that is—I trust nothing has occurred to trouble her."

"Nothing fresh. Oh, Mr. Sinclair!" and here Bessie burst out, regardless of conventionality, of probable consequences, of everything but her honest heart. "Why do you not understand what it is that ails Edna? If you do not know, no one can—no one—no one," and then, frightened at her own audacity, Bessie coloured up to her forehead and walked on; but Mr. Sinclair was by her side the next moment.

"Don't go, Miss Lambert. Please do not leave me yet. Tell me plainly what it is you mean. You are Edna's friend, and I know you will be true to her. You have a good heart. I see in your eyes that you are sorry for me; do not be afraid to speak out. Why am I not to know what is the matter with Edna?"

"That is a strange question for you to ask; surely you know Edna well enough to be aware how deeply she can repent of her faults!"

"Do you mean—speak plainly, I beseech you; do you—can you mean that Edna repents of her cruel treatment of me?"

"Repents! Of course she has repented. Mr. Sinclair, you were very wrong to leave her. Why did you take her at her word? It was all temper; her pride was piqued because she believed herself distrusted. I know Edna so well; in spite of her faults, she is true and generous. When she loves, she loves once and for ever; if she sent you away, she has been sorry for it afterwards. What must you think of me for telling you this? I am so ignorant of the world, most likely I have acted foolishly, but it seems to me that truth is everything."

"I think that you have acted nobly, Miss Lambert; you have made me your debtor for life, if this be true," and then he stopped, and passed his hand across his forehead, as though the sudden relief had bewildered him. "Oh, thank God!" she heard him say, as though to himself.

"It is true."

"I will believe it, I can trust you; my good angel brought me out this morning. The last seven months have not been the happiest time in my existence. I had my own trouble to bear, and then my mother fell ill. I thought I should have lost her, but I was spared that; still, her life hangs on a thread. I am afraid from your deep mourning that you have been in trouble too, Miss Lambert."

"I have lost a dear sister."

"That is sad; but you have other sisters left to comfort you."

"Yes, three."

"I had no one but my mother and Edna; I should have been lonely indeed. But now I must not keep you standing any longer; the wind is cold, and you are beginning to look tired."

"Yes, and breakfast will be ready; I must not be late."

"Is Sefton with you?" he asked, suddenly.

"No; he is at Oatlands; he is not coming until Saturday week."

"I am sorry to hear it; he would have helped me in a great difficulty. Sefton has always been my friend. Miss Lambert, I confess I don't clearly see my way. I can hardly present myself at Glenyan Mansions, and yet how am I to see Edna? If we could only meet, as it were, accidentally, it would be better for both of us."

"I see what you mean," returned Bessie, whose ready sympathy made her quick to detect his meaning. "Edna is very proud; you think it would be wiser to leave her in ignorance of this interview. Yes, you are right; there must be some other way," and then after a moment's consideration she added, "There is a fancy bazaar at the Pavilion this afternoon; some friends of the Seftons are stallholders, and we are all going; everyone will be there; why should you not go too?"

"Thank you," was all he said; but his face brightened perceptibly, and then in an eager tone: "What time will you go?"

"Mrs. Sefton said she should order the carriage at half-past three, so I suppose we should be there about a quarter to four. The Crawfords' stall is at the end of the room, and Minnie and Eleanor Crawford are to be dressed in sacques and hoops, with powdered hair, in the fashion of George III.'s time. Edna is very anxious to see their stall in its first glory before there is a rush of buyers."

"You have made me your friend for life," he said, lightly. "I must not go any further, for I see the windows of Glenyan Mansions," and then he shook hands with her, and quietly retraced his steps to his hotel.

"I wonder if mother would be shocked," thought Bessie. "I think I should have been shocked myself under any other circumstances; but when I thought of poor Edna, and saw him looking so pale and grave, I felt I must help them both. Was it very forward of me? Have I betrayed Edna's confidence? But no, I found it all out for myself; surely no one could blame me for speaking the truth. If Mr. Richard were here I would ask him. Truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth after all. One cannot be wrong if only one be absolutely true."

Bessie found it very difficult to preserve her ordinary demeanour that morning. The consciousness that she had a secret oppressed her, but neither Mrs. Sefton nor Edna seemed to notice any difference in her manner. Edna looked languid and depressed, and seemed to have lost all interest in the bazaar. She alarmed Bessie in the course of the morning by saying that after all she did not care to mix with such a crowd.

"Oh, Edna, I shall be so disappointed if we do not go," exclaimed Bessie.

"My dear, I was not talking about you," replied Edna, wearily. "Mamma will go, of course, and you can accompany her; but I am sick of bazaars, and the noise and chatter will make my head ache. You may take my purse, Bessie, and buy something of Minnie and Eleanor," and Edna threw down her work, and began looking over the batch of novels that her mother had sent in from the circulating library, leaving Bessie to digest her dismay and disappointment as well as she could.

ART NEEDLEWORK.

BY HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

FIG. 1.—CASKET FOR PAPER AND ENVELOPES.

IN this series of papers on Art Needlework, contrary to our usual practice, we give sketches of made-up articles, because so many people complain that they are unable to take in written explanations; and therefore, assuming that many of our girls are already practised workers, such sketches may suggest articles, at once useful and decorative, on which they can lavish their skill to the best advantage.

At the same time experience has taught us how impossible it is to convey accurate ideas by means of black and white, even through so-called "illustrations," so much must necessarily be left to the manual skill and artistic judgment of the workers, who have to enlarge and carry out the suggestions with which we endeavour to supply them.

Fig. 1 is a casket for holding writing paper and envelopes. It is from eight to ten inches long, by from six to eight inches high in proportion. It is one of the few things which we advise should not be made up at home, the inside divisions of the casket having to be considered as well as the actual mounting of the embroidered cover.

Our sketch shows a casket covered with pale greyish green satin of a shade you may often see in the ground colour of old china plates. Indeed, the entire idea of design and colour was suggested to us by just such a plate. The casket is solidly worked in satin stitch, in a variety of delicate colours and shades of silk, and has an outline of fine Japanese gold thread. This outline is, however, optional; it is only introduced to throw the design into clearer relief, and if preferred might be of fine black or dark coloured silk, such as olive green, instead of gold.

A great variety of small articles can be worked in this style of design, sprays being copied from pieces of real china or Indian ware, of which the finest specimens may be found in the museums, and "powdered" over the surface. The colouring of such sprays may also be imitated with advantage, for they are almost invariably in true artistic taste.

together, they are a most suitable and effective ornament to a lady's writing-table, and would make a very handsome present.

The blotter, of which we give a sketch, is of Kirriemuir twill, or strong evenly-woven linen. The design is outlined with dark blue in stem-stitch, and the ground is then filled up by being darned all over with a lighter shade of the same colour; either crewel, silk, or flourishing thread may be used.

All manner of materials will serve for the coverings of blotters—velvet, velveteen, or plush are most used, embroidered in various styles of design; but if the covering be of any linen fabric it can the more easily be taken off for purposes of cleaning. Stout mill-board foundations for blotters can be bought of any size, and we are sure that neat-fingered workers would find no difficulty in making up slip covers. They can be lined, according to taste, with silk, satin, or sateen, and the outside is costly or otherwise, and a case can readily be attached to one or both sides of the lining. In another paper we shall have more to say on the subject of embroidery, as applied to books, but it is too wide and interesting a subject to be dealt with amongst other things.

Fig. 4 is a work bag, well adapted for home manufacture. The stiff lower part is of olive-green plush, on which a spray of

Such a casket can also be covered with velvet, velveteen, or plush, on which suitable sprays of natural or conventional flowers have been embroidered. In Fig. 2 we give a sketch of a coffret in the South Kensington Museum, which was probably the original raison d'être of these pretty caskets. We are doubtful if it can properly be called needlework. It is fourteen or fifteen inches long by about twelve inches high, and is covered with crimson velvet, ornamented with bands of gold braid, which are fastened down at intervals with silver stars; but it is probable that the alternate star and vase-shaped ornaments which fill the squares, formed by the braid, and which are of fine copper wire, are of needlework; also the wreath of leaves round the lock, for it closely resembles some clever German handiwork of sprays of flowers in gold and silver, which we have seen.

Fig. 3 is a blotter, the design of which, forming an initial letter, is suggested by a very beautiful and elaborate illuminated alphabet of the sixteenth century. In most cases it would be best to work a blotter and casket to match, and the style of Fig. 1 might very well be applied also to a blotter. Both conventional honeysuckle is embroidered in delicate shades of natural coloured silks. The upper part is of olive-green satin, drawn up with silk cord to match, and the whole is lined with soft silk of a paler shade of green.

A circular piece of mill-board, measuring eight or nine inches across, will serve for the base of such a bag. This may be covered with silk or sateen. The upper side might with advantage have a piece of coarse flannel or a thin sheet of cotton wool inserted under the lining. Two or three sprays of flowers having been embroidered on a strip of velvet, velveteen, or plush, about five inches in width, the back of this is stiffened with embroidery paste, and it is carefully sewn on to a corresponding strip of mill-board, which should be cut an inch narrower than the embroidery, and must fit exactly the circular foundation. The strip is lined in the same manner as the base, and is very neatly sewn together. The upper part may be of the same material as the lower or stiff division, or of silk or satin of the same colour. The latter plan is the most effective, and this portion will wear better and be less limp if it be also lined. Ribbon or silk cord of the same colour can be used as strings, and it may be drawn up with double cord by means of eyelet holes on each side if desired; the hem should always be between two and three inches wide to look well.

Fig. 5 is a photograph frame of thick cream-coloured silk of a strong and even texture. It is embroidered with sprays of flowers worked with fine natural coloured silks in feather stitch. It must be carefully stretched in a frame, and the inside space of silk should not be removed till the embroidery is completed. The greater variety of delicate shades and colours which can be introduced into the flowers and leaves, the better. If well carried out, the finished work will resemble very closely the dainty specimens which were executed by great ladies and their attendant maidens at the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries. The frame from which we sketch is for a cabinet photograph, and the embroidery is from two to two and a half inches wide. Larger photographs would of course require the frames wider in proportion. We have seen them as wide as five or six inches, for frames about eighteen inches long. Such embroidered frames will also serve admirably for small mirrors, and the Japanese style of the casket, Fig. 1, is very suitable for decorating them. It might be used most effectively for the larger sizes, especially if the needlework be outlined with gold thread. We would not advise any attempt at mounting at home, because in the first place the wooden foundation must be convex, and secondly, the smallest inaccuracy or drawing of the work in fastening it to the wood would inevitably ruin the appearance of the whole.

IT'S STRANGE, BUT IT'S TRUE.

By MEDICUS.

"It's strange, but it's true," I said to myself this morning when I sat down to write. My foolscap paper was in position, the bit of blotting paper under my hand; the sheet of paper alongside on which to note fugitive ideas as I work, lest they be for ever forgotten. All ready for my Girl's Own Health Sermon, and my brain as busy as busy could be(e). But, lo! when I popped my pen into the ink bottle not a drop would respond. The violet ink frozen and the red ink as well, though this latter does not so often succumb! And yet it is the month of March, with cock robin singing outside there in the apple tree, though for that matter this little rascal makes a point of singing when he sees me. But the blackbirds are quietly building in the yew hedge, the sparrows are overhauling their last year's nests in the wistaria, in hopes they will do again for this season, and the thrush would sing too if his feet were not so cold. I had a fellow-feeling with that thrush, however, as I had to go all the way up to the house, from my outdoor study, to warm my ink bottle at the kitchen range; a little extra stamping on the orchard path restored my circulation, and put me in excellent spirits. There was a splendid fire in the range, and the temptation to warm my benumbed feet was strong. However, I know better. I never have my feet cooked. It's strange, but it's true, that a great many people are never tired of cooking their feet, to the everlasting detriment of their health and constitutions. A favourite method of feet-cooking is to have them roasted. Whenever you come in from a stroll on a cold day, be sure to go and stick the soles of your pretty little boots as close to the bars of the grate as possible. The best plan is to sink into an easy chair, pick up a book, and forget all about them, till presently you have got to jump and exclaim—"I do believe I've burned my boot!"

But what does a boot signify? It is neither here nor there. A burned sole makes trade for the shoemaker; besides, roasted feet encourage the formation of chilblains, and the growth of soft corns, with rheumatism and bunions in prospective.

Other people prefer stewed feet. The receipt is a very simple one. Cultivate a horror of damp roads, be as careful not to wet the point of your boot toe as if you were puss in boots, and wear goloshes whenever you go out. This renders the stew complete, because then both the stockings and boots become damp and hot, damp with the most unwholesome form of dampness, that from the perspiration of the body.

Another usual method of cooking feet is by "plotting" them. The word "plotting" is very expressive. It is Scotch, and I use it because I do not think there is any word in English that conveys so much. Scalding will not do, for plotting, although performed by plunging into hot water, hardly goes the length of scalding. Now, some people are always plotting their feet if they have the ghost of an excuse. It is done at bedtime. "I've got a bit of a cold on me," I heard a masculine fogley say one day; "I think I'll draw it down." He made the steward—it was at sea—bring him a bucket of boiling water. Into this he put a huge handful of mustard, then his poor feet. Thus he sat for half-an-hour, reading a book and drinking wine negus. Then he dried his feet with a warm towel, drew on bed socks and turned in. It was time, I thought. But I saw him on deck next forenoon—not morning mind you; people who plot their feet are not early risers—looking cold and blue, pinched and pecked.

Others, again, prefer to broil their feet, by taking a bottle of hot water, or even a hot brick or bag of hot sand, to bed with them.

Now, all these habits are most injurious to the health, for a person who has indulged in them many years loses to a great extent the right use of his or her feet. One becomes, consequently, averse to walking; exercise is neglected; the body gets soft, flabby, and unwholesome, or even adipose; the ankles suffer, and the knees get weak, so that by-and-by dyspepsia sets in. Humpty-dumpty's case is not worse than theirs then.

One day, two weeks ago, I was travelling to London; the snow was whirling past the windows and sifting in through the door chinks and ventilators. At M—— an elderly gentleman came in, and out of respect to his years I pushed the foot-warmer towards him.

"No, thank you," he said, politely. "I don't care to use that. It is not healthy."

"True," I said.

Then we got talking about the weather, and I happened to say it was the coldest day we had had.

"I don't think that," he replied.

"But I have proof positive," I added; "for the first time this year my bath was frozen hard over this morning, and the sponge was like a lump of flint. It served to break the ice for me."

"Oh!" he said; "then, like me, you are a perpetual bather. I'd sooner want my breakfast than my cold bath. Do you wear flannels?"

"No; these merino businesses," I replied.

"Well," he said, putting up his sleeve a little way, "I have nothing but what you see. I never wore anything but linen. I never caught cold, and I couldn't catch cold after the bath. It's strange, but it's true."

Now, reader, I will tell you one or two other things that are strange, but true.

We are all ready enough to believe that procrastination is the thief of time; but there is another fault and still greater defaulter common to many—to thousands—of my girl readers. What I refer to is far worse in this way; it not only aids procrastination in stealing time, but it purloins from the possessor health itself. Can you guess what it is? You are not good at riddles? Well, I will tell you—irregularity in habits of life. You do not see at once in what way this can injure your health. You have often been told, or have often heard the saying, "A place for everything and everything in its place." You never, I dare say, thought there was very much in it, until you came to be the owner of a room of your own, or proprietor of even a work-box or writing-desk. Then, perhaps, you have had to ask yourself often enough the simple but perplexing question, "I wonder where I put it?"

Now, whatever that little "it" may happen to be, if you had put it in its little place, you would not have had to spend an excited, anxious—perhaps even angry—half-hour looking for it.

Probably it is a book which you ought to have put away when done with, only you were too lazy at the time, or thought you would lay it there just now and put it in its place another time; and of course forgot. So you go wandering about like a knotless thread, looking here, there, and everywhere, and getting in everyone's way, displeasing everyone, and not improving either your own temper or beauty. It may have been a letter, and now you want it, you want it now at once, or sooner if possible; the post goes off in half an hour, and you meant to answer it so prettily, and a deal depends upon that answer. "Oh, where can it be? I'm sure I put it in my desk. Well, I ought to have done. Is it in my pocket? No, no; I've searched my pockets hopelessly again and again. Did I put it under my pillow? No. Surely I cannot have thrown it down somewhere. Heigho! how careless I am. Let me sit still and think a bit. Oh! now I know—I had my other dress on."

And you find the letter at last, but you have lost the mail, and are fit to cry about it. And no wonder. Losing a mail may mean such a deal.

But it is not any special acts of irregularity that I desire to instance. An accident may happen now and then to any of us. What I wish to condemn in toto is the careless habit which tends to irregularities of this kind, because it never fails to end in a kind of mental chaos. The girl who has not been drilled to the habit of regularity in the minutiae of life is utterly unfitted to run the race of life with those who are more exact. To put it in plain but truthful language, she spends at least a third of her time in worrying round looking for things. What is the consequence? She is hardly ever cheerful. She gives herself more work by that one-third than she need do. Existence to her becomes burdensome. She wears out her boots and soils her dresses when she needn't do anything of the sort. She wears out something else—her own patience. Hence she becomes peevish and discontented. Peevishness very soon tells on the constitution; it exhausts the nerves, tries the brain, and weakens the heart itself.

All this may seem strange, but it is undoubtedly true. Mind you, "care killed a cat." I do not know whose cat it was or what the peculiar care was that killed it. But among human beings it is the host of little worries that kill. The care that killed the cat might have been a big stone in a sack and a hoist seawards. That would have sunk her; yes, but a sack full of small stones would have sunk her just the same. It is the constant drop that wears away the stone. Therefore I say, cultivate habits of regularity in life if you would be well and look fresh and bonnie.

Again, it is strange, but it is true, that the possession of the cheerful habit, the habit of looking at everything on the bright side, tends to lengthen life quite as much as habits of indolence, procrastination, and untidiness tend to shorten it. But can such a habit be cultivated? "Yes," I reply, "it can be so in the young." And what is more, it tends to keep one young and fresh and beautiful in body and in heart as well. But regarding its cultivation, I do not think that cheerfulness is indigenous to the British nation, though, like any other imported plant, it can be grown. I have been in countries in which cheerfulness flourished and grew like a green bay tree, where every countenance I noted in the street was more happy looking than another, and where, although their lot in life did not seem a very exalted one, contentment reigned almost universally. In England we see less of it, but happy and healthful indeed is the possessor of such a virtue.

Well, it is now admitted by all psychologists and physiologists that certain portions of the brain preside over certain sets of not only motives but sentiments. Though I do not believe that this goes the length of erecting phrenological bumps in the skull, still the particular portion of brain most used becomes most easily used till the habit is formed. If you place a boy as apprentice with a blacksmith he will not be able to swing bars and big hammers round at first, but he'll try, and with use his dexterity will increase and his biceps also, till what he did at first painfully and awkwardly becomes no trouble at all, but, on the contrary, a pleasure. Do you see the application? It is the same with the cultivation of cheerfulness. Begin by trying. Remember it will be difficult at first. You will need to exercise self-control, and often you may actually feel that there is no real cheerfulness in your heart. But the habit of looking at the silver lining of every dark cloud will increase, and will really become a second nature. Happiness will follow hand in hand with health.

It is strange, but it is true, that the habit of living out of one's self is a safeguard for the health. It is a blessed habit; like charity, it blesses the giver as well as the recipient. I really cannot conceive of time being better spent than in giving pleasure to others, and helping others, though with sympathy alone. Indeed, a kind word will very often go further than gold. Even the exhibition of an interest in another's welfare does that other good. When a younger man I did not think anything of swimming a mile or more over a deep, dark Highland lake or loch, and I had a rustic companion who used to perform the feat with me. Well, often when ploughing away in the very deepest, darkest part of our journey, I would look round to him, or he would look round to me, and say, "How are you getting on, lad?" Not much in the words, but we cheered each other thus, and nerved each other's arms. So it is in the race of life. Do not run all for yourself. Think of your neighbours. Some people do not.

Suppose, says a great good man, that we were to live solely for ourselves; suppose that the heart of selfishness were not stretched so far in all men as to embrace the offspring of their own bodies; suppose that our parents, our nurses, our teachers, everyone through whose kind administrations we have grown up to be what we are, had lived altogether for themselves? What would have become of us? Should we ever have risen from our cradle? Should we ever have had a cradle to rise from? Surely our first moment would have been our last. We should have been drowned like so many puppies or kittens.

We oftentimes show selfishness and want of feeling in our conversation. Just one example—and I never go far away to fetch my examples—I called only yesterday on a friend I had not seen for two months. I was with him for about two hours. During all that time he talked about nothing but himself, his doings, his hopes, and successes; never once did he ask the simple question, "How do you get on in the world?" I said nothing, but I could not help thinking a word of sympathy would not have cost him much; and brain-workers need that sympathy more, perhaps, than any class of people. But mind you this, my friend is really a good, kind-hearted fellow, only thoughtless.

"What tragedy," says another writer, may be hidden in that little word 'friendless.' None to labour for, none to weep or smile with, none to care whether we lose or win in life's struggle. A kind word or smile coming from such a one unexpectedly, at some such crisis of life, how often has it been like the plank held out to a drowning man, lacking which he must surely have perished!

A higher motive than even health's sake draws us towards religion, but apart from every other feeling, it may seem strange, but it is nevertheless true, that a mind at rest with heaven has a firmer hold on even this life than a restless, careless being, who is ever on the search for that which we assuredly will never find here below—perfect happiness.

These things are all worth thinking about, whether you be an invalid or in the heyday of health and spirits. We never know what is before us and forewarned is forearmed.

THE PRINCESS LOUISE HOME.

By ANNE BEALE.

OUR girls will, we are sure, be glad to learn that one of their oldest friends has taken out a new lease of life. This is mainly due to them. But for their timely aid, and the donation of "C. R. S.," the Princess Louise Home would probably have died a natural, or unnatural (?) death. The latter is, perhaps, the more suitable adjective; for it would have been suicidal to have let it die of starvation after fifty years of honest work.

It has now, however, started afresh, with renewed vigour, and the numerous subscribers to the proposed Convalescent Home would, we think, rejoice to see the young inmates made happy by the transfer of their donations from a prospective Home to one already established, though failing for lack of funds. They will also rejoice to learn that the writer, thanks to their benevolence, has had the privilege of nominating four new girls, who are now within the friendly shelter of Woodhouse, Wanstead. These were in various stages of destitution and danger, but are now, through the mediation of a merciful providence, rescued to be trained for His service.

The said writer has also received a letter this month from one of the girls admitted through the instrumentality of the G. O. P., of whom mention has been made in a previous number. She is now in service, and writes, "I like my place very much, and I am quite happy. My mistress told me that I should go and see Miss Skinner (the matron) in March, and I am longing for it to come." It is a satisfaction to know that our dozen girls are either in service, or remain at the Home as laundry-maids. Also that the laundry succeeds, and bids fair to help to maintain the Home. Our readers will be surprised to find that the G. O. P. girls, as we must call them, have been taught, trained, and placed in respectable situations, since that first appeal in the magazine, such is the flight of time! We shall hope, soon, to give a full, true, and particular account of the sum handed over to Mr. Gillham, the Secretary. Meanwhile there are some more kind donations to acknowledge. Before doing so, we would transcribe a few lines from a letter written by "C. R. S.," to whom was mainly due the resuscitation of the Home last Christmas.

"I sometimes fear money may take too high a place in our thoughts. I want 'Our Girls' ever to bear in mind, it is 'the blessing of the Lord maketh rich.' He gives it to the pence equally with the pounds, and 'addeth no sorrow with it.'"

EDUCATIONAL.

LIZZIE F.—A probationer can be received into the Children's Hospital, Great Ormond Street, W.C., at the age of twenty-one. You might also apply to the secretary of the St. Alban's Diocesan Institution for Trained Nurses, which has small centres in the larger towns of Essex and Hertford. The head centre is at Witham, and the sister in charge is Miss Smith.

GLADYS.—Apply to Miss Kensington, 22, Gloucester Place, Hyde Park, W., for all particulars respecting the examinations for Girton College, Cambridge. The entrance examination takes place in March and June, the expenses amounting to £105 per annum.

A. B. is recommended to apply to Miss Thoys, Sulhamstead, Reading, Berkshire, the secretary of the Sulhamstead Girls' Question Club, which is designed for the use of farmers' daughters and others, or else apply to Miss Ellman, The Rectory, Berwick, Sussex, secretary of the Query and Definition Club.

MARION F. GIBB.—We have pleasure in reminding our girls of the Utopian Reading Society, of which you are the secretary (Glenlyon, the Avenue, Beckenham, Kent). Six hours in the week are to be devoted to instructive reading, and the annual subscription amounts to 1s. only, a stamped envelope being sent for the rules.

AURORA.—The art of landscape gardening is not one in very much request, and thus, as a means of making a living, we scarcely recommend it. It has been taught at the Crystal Palace School of Science, at a fee of £60 per annum, for a course of eighteen months, and six months for surveying.

EINE JUNGE FRAU.—As you give no address, it is impossible for us to give you the advice and information you desire. If you live in London you might obtain the lessons you want at the Polytechnic Institution in Regent Street. We do not advertise private teachers. Your letter is very gratifying, and we thank you for your good wishes.

NAN.—A salary of £20 for a morning engagement as teacher of three little girls is very good pay for a beginner. If you can obtain another engagement for the afternoon, you will be able to lay by something.

LADY SALISBURY.—There are many institutions for the teaching of deaf mutes, after the oral system. The secretary of the Asylum for Deaf and Dumb Children in the Old Kent Road, Surrey, is Mr. W. H. Warwick—offices, 93, Cannon Street, E.C. Board, food, clothing, and education are provided free of cost, but candidates for admission have to be elected. There are also homes for them at 6, Victoria Park Square, Bethnal Green; at 70, Pentonville Road; at 37, Camberwell Green, S.E.; and at Paddington Green, W. The Rev. W. Stainer is the treasurer.

KITTEN. "EARLY TO RISE," LUCY SIMPSON, &c.—Apply to Miss Maxfield, 82, Edith Grove, West Brompton, W., respecting the Early Rising Association, of which she is the secretary. The rules of this society are given free of charge. The members have to rise punctually at 7 a.m. in the summer, and at 7.30 a.m. in the winter. You are not obliged to sit the whole evening next to your chaperon when out at an entertainment. But it is better not to remain long out of her sight, and you should go to her from time to time, so as not to appear to be only making use of her, without desiring her society.

D. E. R. F. L. A.—You might perhaps be a nursery governess to very small children, or a "mother's help." But you should learn to write and to spell better. Elizabeth Fry was a Quaker lady, who was a preacher and philanthropist, and interested herself greatly in British and foreign prisons. Her maiden name was Gurney; she was born on May 21, 1780, and she married Joseph Fry in 1800, and died October 12, 1815. 2. Cleopatra's Needle was a great monument standing before the Temple of On, the great Egyptian seat of learning, where Moses was so highly educated. The true significance of the obelisk called tekhén (root "to hide") is said to be obscure, but it was a symbol of the sun, and of the god Amen (or Amen), the name signifying "the unrevealed." In very early periods small obelisks were erected by the tombs of kings, recording their histories.

MUSIC.

MIBBIE.—Miss E. Rees, Stafford House, Finchley Road, N.W., is the secretary of the Amateur Musical Club; entrance fee, 1s., and annual subscription the same amount. Books and music to the value of 3s. are given as prizes. The music practised may be selected according to the taste of each member; but this does not include dance music.

CONSTANCE.—Training for singing may be had in the Royal College of Music, Kensington Gore, S.W. Write for all information to the hon. sec., Charles Morley, Esq. Scholarships are open to both sexes, tenable for three years. Fifty-three open scholarships, and nine local scholarships. Students' fees, £40 per annum for tuition. Perhaps, however, the Guildhall School of Music might be more within your means, of which the secretary is Mr. Charles P. Smith, Victoria Embankment. The entrance fee, 5s.; fees for a year of three terms—twelve weeks each—from £4 10s. to £33 1s. 6d., according to the subjects and number of lessons given. A number of exhibitions and prizes awarded.

ROY RAYMOND.—You should procure one of Novello's shilling primers. Of course you should at least be acquainted with the grammar of music, if not with harmony (thorough-bass), and with all the signs and Italian words and terms employed in it, if you propose to "teach music."

MISCELLANEOUS.

M. M. A.—We are sorry that you did not give your address, as we could have put you in communication with a purchaser for your papers, if not sold. Send your name and address to this office.

EDIE.—Many thanks for the box of flowers. We think the substance you mention is quite harmless.

CEPHAS G.—The old-fashioned rosemary tea is as good as any modern hair wash, we think. If the back be weak and painful, you should lie down quite flat on the floor for an hour or so in the day. This will help you to stand and sit upright.

THEODORA.—It is usual to invite some of the bridegroom's relations to be bridesmaids; but it is not always possible to have his sisters. Why not consult him? The enclosed poetry is harmless. We are sure it amused you to write it.

MARY A.—Unless your sister is very young or giddy, we should see no objection to her going alone under the circumstances.

JOSEPHINE.—You are too young to think of matrimony, and assuredly a man, six years older than yourself, should know better than to persuade you to meet him clandestinely. No wonder that you are unhappy in deceiving your parents. Prove your repentance.

M. D.—What you describe is a species of gambling, and would not be a wise nor an honest way of making money.

ROVER.—Yes, there is a skating club. The addresses are—Archer's Hall, Regent's Park, and 1, Devonport Street, Hyde Park, established in 1830. The number of ladies admitted is limited to twenty-five, and of men to one hundred and fifty. The entrance fee is three guineas, and the yearly subscription for women is one guinea, and for men two guineas. The object of the club is to practise "figure skating" so that if not a good skater in an ordinary way, you would only waste money in joining. Besides this, we doubt your admission under other circumstances.

KYRIE.—The picture entitled "The last hours of Count Egmont," was probably designed to represent the Prince de Gavre, born 1522. He accompanied the Emperor Charles V. to Algiers in 1544, and he endeavoured to moderate the tyranny of the Spanish Government in the Low Countries, and incurred the enmity of the Duke of Alba, and was imprisoned by him, A.D. 1567. He was subsequently beheaded, together with Count Horn, June 5th, 1568. Your picture represents these cruelly persecuted and murdered gentlemen just previous to the final catastrophe.

A SUBSCRIBER.—It is not fair to our general readers to answer the same questions over and over again. If the shoulder-blade alone be out, let the child use a simple back and face board for an hour or more a day. Beware of putting on a permanent iron frame, as it is so irksome that she tries to get ease by drawing the body crooked, and so, before aware of it, the spine is drawn aside—a far worse evil than a shoulder-blade out. Perhaps you had better show the child at the National Hospital for the Deformed, 234, Great Portland Street, W. Apply personally on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, or Friday at 2 p.m., or else write to the secretary, Mr. Herbert Canning.

INGLESIDE AND MAY.—We have often said in these columns that old stamps are of no value at all, and the fact of their being old Australian stamps does not alter this rule. Little girls in England very generally wear their hair in one plait down the back, tied with a ribbon.

"VOGELENZANG" (Holland).—The value of the four highest stamps in England for postage is 2s. 6d., 5s., 10s., and 20s. Postage stamps are now used instead of adhesive inland revenue stamps of the value respectively of 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d., 9d., 1s., 2s. 6d., to denote the duties on receipts, agreements, voting papers, etc. The list is too long for us to give.

"ETIENNES FRIEND."—When it is noon at Adelaide, it is 2hr. 45min. 36sec. a.m. at Greenwich. Of course it would depend on the hours you selected for comparison, but guided by these, you will soon be able to reckon the time at Adelaide for yourself.

JUNBO.—You should not have too heavy dumb-bells at your age, for you need exercise, not fatigue. We should think a pound each heavy enough. The elastic "chest expanders" are also most useful, and untiring to use. You should exercise during ten minutes each morning, while dressing yourself.

"THANKFUL FOR A REPLY."—There is a hospital for epileptic patients at Portland Terrace, Regent's Park, near St. John's Wood Station, London, N.W., where both paying and free patients are received. Apply to H. Howgrave Graham, Esq., the secretary.

NORTH COTSWOLD.—Gordon House, 8, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W., is to be recommended as a home for girls in business, governesses, and others; but if you were to apply to the hon. director, John Shrimpton, Esq., 38, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., he would be able to suggest perhaps a home nearer to the post office where your daughter may be employed.

LOVE—SERVE

(Shaftesbury Motto).

A FEW RECOLLECTIONS SUGGESTED BY THE NAME OF MARY COWDEN-CLARKE.

PART I.

THE PARENTS AND THE HOME.

THERE are many ways of loving and serving. Milton in one of his grandest sonnets says, "They also serve who only stand and wait." It may also be said that they also greatly serve who use the opportunities of a retired home life to such purpose as the beloved lady whose name heads this little paper, and of whom and of whose works I am asked to write—one who has done so much, and so well, that her example may inspire some of our girls to emulate her in a radiant life of love and steadfastness within the home, even if their vocation does not include a career of brilliant usefulness in more public ways.

Some years since we were at Genoa, in her home, and would fain help you, young readers, to imagine that superb amphitheatre of palaces and churches, climbing higher and higher, rock on rock, the blue sea below and the sky of Italy above, and around and far away the glittering bay of waters, spanned by the Lanterna—that friend to mariners at night, whose light flashes below when the stars shine above to warn and guide the travellers on the ocean.

On one of those ledges of rock, where as the country people say, "Look up and you see a garden, look down and you see a church," has arisen of late years one of those palace villas, Italian in their stateliness and English in their home comfort, where we gathered roses for the breakfast circle in January sunshine, and where the Christmas dinner included, in defiance of all precedent, lamb and sweet peas. In this place of glorious sunsets and fragrant sea-breezes, of gorgeous churches and pictures, and such loving kindness and sympathy as does one good to remember, two young English students were revived amidst the anxious toil of a London career, and introduced to the home life of a family who have made their name a household word wherever music and Shakespeare are loved and honoured—the family of Novello.

The lady of whom we write, Mary Victoria Novello, was the eldest daughter of Vincent and Mary Novello, and began her beloved home life here, in London, far from Italy and its sunshine; here at 240, Oxford Street, then called Oxford Road. Others, perhaps, like herself, eldest daughters of large families, families possibly engaged as hers was in the battle of professional life with limited means—and, parents may add from the depths of their experience, unlimited needs—may like to know how, even under these trying conditions, a quiet and unpretending home may be made a brilliant centre of useful and happy work, helpful to others, blessed in themselves.

Her parents, Vincent Novello and Mary Isabel Novello, were remarkable people, not only gifted with great talents, "but endowed with a zeal of self-devotion to their children, which turned every means they possessed to the utmost advantage, and created others.* By frugal self-denial on their own parts, by liberal expenditure on the part of their offspring, by sedulous study of the different individual capacities and special tendencies of each child—boy or girl—did Vincent and Mary Novello foster and develop such talents as their children were endowed with by nature. Books in abundance, selected with care, and always read previously by both parents—good masters (for school instruction was held less eligible than home teaching), frank companionship and intercourse with their elders, encouragement to ask questions and derive information through ever-prompt answers, judicious indulgence and affectionate equality in treatment, were unfailingly forthcoming, and made parents and children feel themselves reciprocal friends."

As Mary Victoria was the eldest, so Clara Anastasia Novello, who with so much dignity long sustained the position of our first and noblest English singer, was the fourth daughter of this family—marrying Count Gigliini, and retiring to an ancient illustrious Italian home; but never lost to the love and admiration of her many English friends. We have said both parents were remarkable persons.

It is scarcely necessary to recall to our readers how Vincent Novello, the father, had enriched the musical world with many valuable compositions of his own, which take classical rank, show his devotion to his art, never wearied in searching for and bringing to light the noblest works of the great masters, who were before his time buried in oblivion. Some only survived in unique copies in ecclesiastical libraries, and the ardour of this explorer, like that of the prince in "The Sleeping Beauty," woke to life and activity a whole world of art treasures long congealed and lost—especially when one of his sons, Alfred Novello, followed up invaluable discoveries by bringing these and other masterpieces within the reach of the humblest musicians.

In time the energy and ability of this son, united to his father's zeal for art, developed the "couple of parlour windows and a glass door" of 67, Frith Street into the great warehouses and printing houses of Berners Street and Dean Street.

The mother exactly fulfilled the duties of helpmeet to her husband. "As aider in his artistic aims, she enabled him to devote his whole mind and thought to them by her active superintendence of his household, his family, and his domestic affairs, while she made his professional efforts doubly and trebly available by the excellent economy with which she appropriated to their mutual benefit the income he earned.

"When immersed in the duties of her house and coming family, she was never too busy or too tired to make home cheerful and happy to him after a long day's teaching, by reading through a whole evening some favourite book of poet or poetical writer, while he, with his extraordinary power of industrious work, would copy music or correct proofs, &c."

In that quiet home, the great gifts of father and mother were employed with the most entire self-devotion to all that could ensure the happiness and welfare of its inmates. The mother's womanly arts adorned those rooms with elegant embroideries and beautiful colours, while her talents organised a cheerful and liberal hospitality. In this she resembled her great contemporary Mrs. Somerville, who, while she surpassed all other women by the splendour of her scientific achievements, displayed her feminine taste and refinement both by the grace and delicacy of her table and the beauty of her needlework.

Mrs. Novello possessed also a rare and kindly wit, which kept the home circle refreshingly alive, and a genial humour which played around every subject, illuminating, but never hurting those it touched most.

To this day her name is sounded with tender reverence, for with a loving genius she provided for the daily brightness and happiness, as well as for the goodness of all within her home—for the highest and best developments of those young natures so dependent on her influence; while the perfect union of the parents was the root of the family love and strength which has endured so firmly and achieved so much. "Perfectly did Mrs. Novello confirm the assertion that the most intellectual and cultivated women are frequently the most gentle, unassuming and proficient housewives; for few even of her intimate friends were aware that she was an authoress, so perpetually was she found occupied with her husband and children."*

The Prince Consort once remarked how the warm and genial air of sympathy and kindness was needful to bring every artistic excellence to perfection; and it was said of one noble lady, that to know her was a liberal education. With such influences and such friends did these parents surround their children, happy in that they had enough of struggle with a limited income to make them diligent, thoughtful, and self-denying, while they had as many of the beauties and comforts of life as were needed to give a glow of ease and pleasantness to the home. And in higher matters, the best of education which children of the lesser or larger growth can enjoy is the society and friendship of the best and most highly cultivated people of their time.

In the present day children's minds are too often supposed to be formed by lesson books and schoolfellows.

In that home, while the parents did devote their lives to their children, these also in their measure did what they could to share and lessen the burdens of government and the labours of housewifery, and to fill the home with interest for father and mother.

The home-evenings in that house were not to be dull and monotonous with school drudgery, but after the hard and energetic work of the day, they were kept bright with exquisite home music, and the best intellectual and artistic society in London. Thus the home was so happy and bright that the graces and virtues thrived in its warm atmosphere of love and gladness, and the hard-working energies of life were kept up to their best working power, and not allowed to be chilled and choked by the dull fog nowadays so often stifling home pleasures, which are as much needed indoors, as sunshine without, to ripen and strengthen life.

Charles Kingsley says in his "True Words for Brave Men"—"If young people have not sunshine enough, if they are kept down and crushed in youth by sorrow, by anxiety, by fear, by over hard work, by too much study. . . they become more or less stunted, unhealthy, unhappy, slavish, and mean people in after life, because they have not rejoiced in their youth as God intended them to do."

Now for a glance at these children's home—Mary Victoria Novello's home, in whose sunshine she became what we have known her.

I extract from "Life and Labours of Vincent Novello," by M. Cowden-Clarke. "Truly a pleasant sight was that same drawing-room at 240, Oxford Street, where poets, artists, and musicians, friends of the master of the house, met in friendly, lively converse. The walls, simply coloured of a delicate rose tint, and hung with a few choice water-colour drawings by Vorley, Copley-Fielding, Havell, and Cristall (who were also personally known to Vincent Novello); the floor covered with a plain grey drugget, bordered with a tastefully designed garland of vine leaves, drawn and embroidered by Mrs. Novello; towards the centre of the room, a sofa table strewn with books and prints, and at one end a fine-toned chamber organ, on which the host preluded and played to his listening friends when they would have him, 'such delights and spare to interpose them oft,' between the pauses of their animated conversation."

It may be imagined how naturally children brought up to, and accustomed to share in, the happy cheerfulness of such a circle, should have become what they proved to be in after years, for as a great author* says, "Every day's experience shows how much more actively the business of education goes on out of school than in it." And Shakespeare's wisdom praises that mirth and merriment which bars a thousand harms and lengthens life to make us regret that joyfulness should now be so often absent from the home evenings of our children. Would it were not so often true that, weary and worn with the day's schooling, the children study in the evening far from all pleasant rest and recreation, music or art, or society of any kind, to drone over to-morrow's "preparation" in dark rooms, with dull books, with the enlivening prospect of going to bed to dream of nightmare examinations and scholarships, unless, which is not impossible, they have become too tired to sleep at all.

We were driving, not long since, in a lovely country, and heard with sympathetic ears the old coachman discoursing of the beautiful little pony who was trotting brightly along, and was evidently well loved and cared for. "You see, ma'am, if you work anything too hard while it's young, it will have worked out all its strength before it comes to it." It seemed hard that our Welsh ponies should be more generously and wisely treated than our children.

Truly old-fashioned people do rejoice and sing when they remember the glorious music and pleasant society they enjoyed in their young days, society as refreshing to the elders in their sympathy with the keen enjoyments and loving earnestness of youth as to the young people in the wiser experience they gain and culture of manners they acquire. For despite new doctrines, manners still maketh man, and much more woman; and those bright evenings long ago, when parents, children, and friends used to enjoy together literature and art, the last news of the day, and the loving sympathy of the home circle, were much more likely to enlarge the young minds and cheer the young hearts than any amount of rivers in China, or even statics, conic sections, or dynamics.

One may realise the sort of society which the fortunate young people of this family enjoyed by a glance at the "Recollections of Writers," by C. C. Clarke and Mary Cowden-Clarke, which contain sketches of their friends Keats, Charles and Mary Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Douglas Jerrold, Charles Dickens, etc., in the department of literature, and of the most eminent artists of their time, whether musicians or painters. Amongst them John Cramer, Malibran, and Dr. Beriot, and Mendelssohn. "One can imagine the exquisite evenings of Mozartian operatic and chamber music at Vincent Novello's own house, where Leigh Hunt. . . . Keats, and the Lambs' set were invited guests. . . . The brilliant supper parties at the alternate dwellings of the Novellos, the Hunts and the Lambs, who had mutually agreed that bread and cheese, with celery, and Elia's immortalised Lutheran beer were to be the sole cates provided. . . . and the picnics enjoyed together by appointment in the fields which then lay spread in green breadth and luxuriance between the west end of Oxford Street and the western slope of Hampstead Hill, are things never to be forgotten.

"Other times, other customs. But those who love children and young people have many heartaches when they think how full of joy and freshness those young lives might be, and when they see and know too often what they are." To return to the beloved lady of these lines.

After learning in this bright and busy household to love all noble and helpful work, and to take the keenest interest in all that concerned the literature and art of her country, she married at nineteen, and became to her husband what she had ever been in her home—a right hand, and ever a warm and gentle one to help and sympathise—a true helpmeet and partner in all active and restful life.

Will a description of her wedding be interesting to you young people, who may sometimes, perhaps, dream of what a wedding may be? I am allowed to quote from the "Centennial Biographic Sketch of C. C. Clarke," by her whom he made his second son.

"As a striking contrast with the more elaborate weddings of the present day, it may be interesting to record the extreme simplicity of weddings then.

"Her father and mother were the only persons who went early one bright summer morning, 5th July, 1822, with their daughter to St. George's Church, Bloomsbury, where she married the man of her heart, whom they also entirely loved and esteemed. A couple of milkmaids were sole observers of the small wedding party that went up the flight of steps, whispering 'That's the bride,' as the young girl in a simple white satin cottage bonnet and a white muslin frock, both made by her own hands, passed near.

"On return home, her younger sisters had prepared the wedding breakfast, and on each plate there lay a little gift to each of her brothers and sisters, provided by the kind and thoughtful mother as a remembrance from the bride.

"Arm-in-arm the new-married pair quietly walked from the house, to which the Novello family had removed in Great Queen Street, to the Bell Inn, in Holborn, where they took the stage coach to Edmonton, the wedding dress having been exchanged for a less noticeable straw bonnet and a plainer white frock.

"During the walk, in his usual gay-hearted way, Charles laughingly told his new-made wife a story of a bridegroom whose first speech to his spouse after the ceremony was, 'Hitherto, madam, I have been your slave; now you are mine.' At Edmonton they left the coach, and took their way across the fields between there and Enfield, Charles making his native village the scene of their honeymoon.

"At a modest hostelry called the Greyhound, kept by an old man and his daughter, and boasting two pretty rooms, one of which looked out upon the fine old tree in the centre of Enfield Green, the other, a cottagey white-curtained chamber with a window screened by a green wire, the couple housed happily for some weeks, bringing upon themselves the affectionate, playful rebuke of Charles Lamb, in a letter he wrote to C. C. C., complaining that 'Twas stealing a march before one's face in earnest,' as, though living quite near, at Chase Side, Enfield, the writer and his sister had not a dream of your propinquity.' They lingered amongst the nooks most associated with John Keats, Charles showing her the row of oaks planted by his father and himself on the skirts of a certain beautiful meadow, rambling over the fields between Enfield and Southgate. . . . and strolling as far as White Webbs, Ponders End, Northaw, Cheshunt, with the huge immemorially old oak, Theobald's Rook, with its historic associations, or wandering over the equally historic Enfield Chase."

A sonnet written fifty-six years after is too beautiful a witness to the lasting glory of the happiness sealed by that simple wedding to be omitted here.

SONNET III. IN MEMORIAL SONNETS.

"How well that marriage-day prefigured all That followed! O'er our heads the clear blue sky,
Scarce flecked by lightest cloudlets—true July!
Beneath our feet, green turf and wild flowers small;
Beside us, hedgerows, oaks, and beeches tall;
Between us, happy looks of eye to eye;
Words that said much, though spoken sparingly,
Of gladness we could now each other call
Our own for ever. Saturday of yore Then nineteen years of age, now seventy-five,
I can look back to thee as bringing store
Of life-long perfect wedded love, and strive
To wait with patience for the time, I pray,
May prove one endless blissful marriage-day."

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XXII.

BESSIE BUYS A JAPANESE FAN.

her. The novels were stupid. She was tired of love tales—why could not people find something else to write about? She was sick of such namby-pamby sentimentality; and then they were so untrue to life. Stories in real life did not always end happily, or there would not be so many old maids in the world.

"Single women, Edna; I like that term ever so much better."

"No; old maids," persisted Edna, obstinately; "cross, cranky old maids."

"Old maids, as you call them (and you are very rude to a lot of good, nice women, Edna), are not necessarily cross and cranky; the unmarried women I know are all busy, cheery creatures, full of life and energy, and very useful in their generation. Father says he always enjoys a talk with an unmarried lady; so many of them keep their freshness and youth, even though they have wrinkles on their faces. I know some of them get soured and narrow, but perhaps they have had much to try them."

"Bessie, I do believe you will be an old maid yourself some day."

"Your prophecy does not frighten me in the least. If I am to be an old maid I mean to be a very happy one. You know, Edna, how often I have talked to you of my dear Mr. Robertson. Well, he said something on this subject in one of his sermons that pleased me very much. I remember dear Hatty liked it too. I cannot recollect the exact words, but it was to this effect: that much of our happiness depends on the way we look on life; that if we regard it as a complete and finished existence, then no doubt those who fail in their aims are disappointed and discontented. In this the unmarried and childless woman, and the widow who has lost her treasure, will be agreed; but if we regard our present existence as only a prelude to a better—as an education, a training for a high and happier sphere—then the disappointed may take heart, for they have only come to the beginning of their life, and may surely wait with some degree of patience until a future life expands their happiness. Grown-up people do not want their sugar-plums all at once as children do—don't you see it, Edna?"

"Oh yes, I know what you good people mean." But she spoke with a degree of pettishness. "But I have not climbed as high as you, and I shall be a shrivelled, cantankerous old maid."

"You will be nothing of the kind," replied Bessie, kissing her. "But luncheon is ready, and here comes your mother; pray don't say anything to her about not going to the Pavilion, or she will be so disappointed; she never enjoys anything without you." And to her great relief Edna acquiesced.

Mrs. Sefton talked a great deal about the bazaar during luncheon. The Tozers and Lady Hampton were going, and she had heard that Minnie Crawford's costume was perfect, and suited her admirably.

"I suppose I had better go and get ready," observed Edna, pushing back her chair, "or mamma will never survive the disappointment. The carriage will be here at half-past three." And she marched out of the room with rather a bored expression on her face.

"Nothing pleases her," complained Mrs. Sefton; "she seems tired of everything. I believe she is only going to the bazaar because she thinks it will give me pleasure; and the crowd and hot room will make her ill. Run after her, Bessie, and beg her not to go. You and I will do very well together, and we can choose something pretty for her off the Crawfords' stall. I would rather she did not go, I would indeed."

"It will do her good," pleaded Bessie; "the room will not be crowded just at first, and it will be such a pretty sight. She would be dull if we left her at home, and the drive will refresh her."

"Do you think so?" returned Mrs. Sefton, doubtfully. "But I am beginning to lose heart; nothing we can do seems to please her. I believe she is getting tired of Brighton; last night she said she wished she were at home; but Oatlands is far too quiet for her. I think I shall take rooms in town for the season, and afterwards we will go abroad. The Crawfords are going to the Engadine, and they are lively young people, and their society will be good for Edna. Perhaps," looking at Bessie wistfully, "your mother might be induced to spare you, and we could take you with us. You have never seen Switzerland, Bessie?"

"No, none of us have ever been abroad. Oh, it would be too delightful!" but as Bessie went off smiling to get ready for the drive, she told herself that any Swiss journey would be very dubious. "That is one of the things one has to long for all one's life," thought Bessie, "one of the denied good things that are to come presently."

Edna came down to the carriage looking quite bright and pretty; she was no longer in a misanthropic mood, the mere exertion of dressing to please her mother had done her a world of good. It was a brilliant afternoon, and already groups of well-dressed people were moving in the direction of the Pavilion.

"There are the Tozers, mamma," she exclaimed, beginning to look interested, "and there is Lady Hampton in that victoria; she has her old bonnet on; what a dear old dowdy she is! I tell you what, Bessie, I mean to dress well, even when I am a cranky old maid; there is a great support in clothes—and—no, it can't be—"

"Well, finish your sentence," observed Bessie. "Have you seen a ghost, Edna?" laughing rather nervously, for Edna had changed colour in a singular manner.

"No, only a likeness, but of course I was mistaken;" but all the same, Bessie knew that Edna had really seen Mr. Sinclair, however much she might doubt the evidence of her eyes. She had caught a glimpse of him too—he was on his way to the Pavilion with the other people.

Edna did not recover herself in a hurry; she looked white and shaken; the likeness must have been a strong one, and brought back the past too vividly. Bessie glanced at her anxiously. Certainly Edna's looks verified her words.

Mr. Sinclair would read the truth for himself.

They had arrived at the Pavilion now, and Mrs. Sefton and Edna were already exchanging greetings with their friends.

"Does it not look like a picture of Vanity Fair?" she whispered, when they at last made their way into the bazaar.

Well, it was a curious sight, certainly; a young man with powdered hair, in a blue velvet coat, offered them programmes of the entertainment; a little Moorish girl, with a necklace of gold coins, showed them her flower-basket; and a stately Queen Elizabeth smiled at Edna across the counter. A harlequin and a cavalier mounted guard over the post office, and a gipsy presided over a fish pond. Mary Stuart and a Greek lady were in charge of the refreshment stall. It was a relief when the band struck up one of Strauss's delicious waltzes, and drowned the din of voices; but as the sad, sweet strains of "Verliebt und Verloren" floated through the room, a pained expression crossed Edna's face.

A moment later Bessie felt her arm grasped, and Edna whispered excitedly—"Look, Bessie; is it my fancy—that gentleman standing by the flower stall—is it—"

"Yes, it is Mr. Sinclair," returned Bessie, calmly. "Oh, he sees us now, he is coming to speak to us. Dear Edna, please don't look so pale over it, you surely do not mind seeing him." But Edna was beyond answering; there was not an atom of colour in her face as Mr. Sinclair came up to them and lifted his hat.

It was very odd that just at that minute Bessie was seized with an uncontrollable longing to become the possessor of a Japanese fan. It was excessively dear and excessively ugly, and the young person in the Catherine de Medicis ruff, who was in charge of that part of the stall, was otherwise engaged; nevertheless Bessie would not give up her point. Mrs. Sefton was on the other side of the room, talking to Lady Hampton; and though it was clearly Bessie's duty to remain with Edna, she was perfectly blind to the fact; she did not even wait to greet Mr. Sinclair, but turned her back on him in the rudest manner, and kept her eyes on the gaudy specimen of Japanese art.

It was ten minutes before the coveted article was in her possession, and even then the stall seemed to fascinate her, and she was just making up her mind that a certain little blue vase would please Christine when Mrs. Sefton touched her arm.

"My dear child, why have you hidden yourself? and what has become of Edna?"

"Edna?" looking round; but there was clearly no vestige of her or of Mr. Sinclair either. It was easy to escape detection in that crowd. "She was here just now. Mr. Sinclair was with her, and —"

"Neville here!" in intense surprise.

"Yes; and Edna seemed rather upset at seeing him, and so I left them."

"You have taken my breath away," exclaimed Mrs. Sefton. "Oh, Bessie, do you think— Come and let me sit down somewhere; my sightseeing is over. What did he say to her? How did they meet? Did he speak first?"

"Don't ask me; I know nothing," replied Bessie, with an odd little laugh. "She pointed him out to me, and asked if it were her fancy; and then he saw us, and Edna looked very white, and he held out his hand and said something; and then there was that Japanese fan, and of course I heard nothing more."

"You left them. That was right; you were very sensible, my dear."

"Let me tell you everything," said Bessie, feeling burdened by her secret. "I have seen Mr. Sinclair before; I met him on the Parade, and it was I who told him to come here." And she related the purport of her conversation with him.

Mrs. Sefton seemed much moved. "It will come right," she said, in an agitated voice. "My poor child will be happy again. Bessie, I cannot tell you how grateful I am to you. I love Neville like a son. It is the wish of my heart to see Edna his wife. He has brilliant prospects. He is a rising man, and immensely clever; and Edna will never care for anyone else."

Bessie forgave this worldly speech on account of the motherly tone in which it was said.

"He must have taken her away; they are certainly not in this room," she said by-and-by. "Perhaps they are in the gardens; they will be quieter there."

"Never mind, we will not look for them. You must amuse yourself, Bessie, until they come of their own accord. Suppose we buy something at the Crawfords' stall. I want you to choose something pretty for each of your sisters. Throw that hideous fan away! it is not worth sixpence. Where did you pick up such an ugly thing?"

"It was the first handy article," replied Bessie. "Throw it away! No, indeed! I shall keep it for ever as a memento of this day." But Mrs. Sefton, in high good-humour, vowed that she should have a prettier remembrance of the day than that. A few minutes afterwards she put a lovely little workcase in Bessie's hands. It was fitted up very tastefully, and was really a most useful present; and then she proceeded to select workbags and pretty knick-knacks for the Lambert girls.

Bessie remonstrated in vain. Mrs. Sefton had come there to spend money, and she lavished one article after another on Bessie.

"This soft white shawl will just suit your mother," she said. "And oh! here is a pocket-book for Dr. Lambert. Your father will find that useful. Does your brother smoke? No? Well, we will buy that letter-case for him, and now I think we have finished."

But it was quite half an hour afterwards before the truants returned.

"Here they come!" exclaimed Bessie, as Mrs. Sefton began to get restless.

"Oh, mamma dear, I hope we have not kept you," said Edna, penitently; but she blushed very prettily as she spoke, and there was no mistaking the happy look in her eyes.

"You must blame me, Mrs. Sefton," interrupted Mr. Sinclair, who also looked radiant. "There was such a crowd that I took Edna into the gardens, and we have been sitting quietly under the trees. I hope we have not really inconvenienced you and Miss Lambert."

"Not a bit," replied Mrs. Sefton, cheerfully. "But we may as well go home now, as Bessie and I have made all our purchases. Will you see if the carriage be there, Neville?"

"Neville is coming back with us, mamma," observed Edna, in her old bright manner; and then Mrs. Sefton looked at her meaningly. Just then the band struck up with a military march, and Bessie lost Edna's low answer.

There was nothing particular said during the drive home. Mr. Sinclair observed he must go to his hotel to dress, and Edna questioned Bessie about her purchases. When they reached Glenyan Mansions, Edna shut herself up with her mother, and Bessie went off to her own room and inspected her treasures, and then she dressed herself and sat down to read. By-and-by there was a knock at the door, and Edna came in; she looked perfectly lovely with that soft look of happiness on her face.

"May I come in, Bessie? Mamma is talking to Neville in the drawing-room, and I can spare you a few minutes. Neville has told me everything. He says it is you who smoothed the way for our meeting and reconciliation. Bessie, darling, how am I to thank you?" and Edna wrapped her arms round her and kissed her fondly.

"It is all right then?"

"It was all right the moment I saw him; he just looked at me and said, 'I wonder if you are glad or sorry to see me, Edna?' and I managed to gasp out the word 'glad!' And then he took my hand and asked me to come out of the crowd, and let him talk to me quietly. It seemed to me we understood each other at once."

"Dear Edna, I congratulate you from my heart!"

"Yes, and it is all owing to you; we shall neither of us forget that. Bessie, you don't half know how good Neville is, how gentle and generous he has been. He would not let me humble myself, or ask for his forgiveness. But oh, he has been so unhappy! His mother has been nearly dying, poor fellow, and I never knew it; and even now her health is in a critical state. It is so sad for him, for he dotes on her, and they are everything to each other. He says, if it had happened, and he had not had me to comfort him, it would almost have broken his heart."

"But he will have you now."

"Yes, and it must be my one thought to make up to him for these wretched seven months. Do you know, Bessie, he seems more distressed about me than about himself. He says I am quite altered, so thin and pale. He said it so gravely that I asked him if I had grown too plain for his taste; but there—I don't mean to repeat his answer."

"He will soon find out that you are as vain as ever."

"I actually told him so, for he was so depressed at my changed appearance that I had to make one or two mischievous speeches just to rouse him, and that did him good; he punished me though by pointing out some of his grey hairs; but he has really grown handsomer, Bessie. Mamma said so too, though Neville was never really handsome. Poor mamma! she is so happy she has been crying for joy."

The dinner bell rang at that moment, and they were obliged to break off their talk. Mr. Sinclair had evidently found Edna's absence irksome, for he met her with a reproach at her delay, but she answered him so sweetly that he was mollified in a moment.

It was the happiest evening Bessie had had since Hatty's death; it was such a relief to see Edna's face bright with smiles, and to hear the satisfied tones of her voice, and to meet the quiet look of content on Mr. Sinclair's face. He was not a demonstrative man, and a stranger would hardly have thought his manner lover-like, but it was evident that he and Edna understood each other perfectly. After dinner he asked her to sing for him, and she went to the piano at once.

"This is your favourite song, Neville," she said, looking at him quietly, and a flush of pleasure crossed his face. If he had ever doubted the reality of her affection for him, he could not have doubted it to-night, when every moment her gentleness and soft appealing manner seemed to plead for forgetfulness of the past, and to hold out a safer promise for the future.

"I must come and see your mother," Bessie heard her say later on. "Mamma thinks of taking rooms for the season, and then I shall see her often; shall you like that, Neville?"

"There is only one thing I should like better," he replied, and there was a smile on his face as he got up and wished them good-night; and then he said something in a low voice to Edna.

"Very well," she answered, with a bend of her graceful head, and she rose from her seat and walked to the door.

Mrs. Sefton looked after them with an indulgent smile.

"He wants a word with her alone; Edna won't refuse him anything to-night. How happy they are, Bessie! Dear Neville is so satisfied; he told me that he was struck with the improvement in Edna; he thinks her so much more womanly and so gentle, but he is troubled about her delicacy; but she will get better now all this worry is at an end." And Bessie acquiesced in this.

When Edna came back, a little while afterwards, she went straight to her mother and knelt down by her chair.

"Mother, dear," she said, tenderly, "Neville has forgiven me, and you must forgive me too."

"I forgive you, my darling!" in a startled tone.

"Yes, for being such a bad daughter; but I will be good, indeed I will be good now," and worn out with the emotions of the day, Edna laid her head on her mother's lap and burst into tears. Bessie, touched to the heart by this little display of feeling, went softly out of the room, and left the mother and child together.

VARIETIES.

COMPENSATION FOR GOOD LOOKS.

A shrewd observer was once asked, "Where are pretty women as a rule less sensible and accomplished than plain ones?"

"The latter," he replied, "seek company which may instruct them, and the former show generally an aversion to such kind of society; so that those women who have no beauty receive from nature propensities that compensate to them for the want of personal charms."

THE REAL REWARD.

What men most covet—wealth, distinction, power—

Are baubles nothing worth, that only serve To rouse us up, as children in the schools Are roused up to exertion. The reward Is in the race we run, not in the prize.

HARD UP.—Horace Walpole tells that when the Countess of Suffolk married Mr. Howard they were both so poor that they resolved to go to Hanover before the death of Queen Anne, in order to pay their court to the future Royal family. Having some friends to dinner, and being disappointed of a remittance, she was forced to sell her hair to furnish the entertainment. Long wigs were then in fashion, and the countess's hair being fine, long, and fair, produced twenty pounds.

MUCH HE KNEW ABOUT IT.—A newly-married man was recently asked by his wife to order some yeast, and not having a very well-defined idea of the article, he told the baker to send up ten shillings' worth. At nine o'clock next morning three men might have been seen tugging a cask of yeast up the front steps of that man's house.

HOW A MAN OBEYED HIS WIFE.

During the reign of the feudal system amongst the Highlanders, the Laird of Grant had condemned one of his vassals to be hanged.

When Donald came to the gallows, accompanied by Janet, his faithful wife, he seemed very reluctant to mount the ladder, and stood a long time below the fatal tree shrugging his shoulders.

"Hoot awa', Donald," said Janet, clapping him on the back, "gang up like a man and please the laird!"

Donald could not resist such a powerful motive to obedience; he mounted, and was turned off in a minute.

WHAT IS TIME?—Someone asked St. Augustine "What is time?" "I know," he answered, "when you do not ask me."

POULTRY KEEPING :

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

PART VI.

AFTER the sitting hen has been once settled, she must be regularly fed every day. The best time to do this is in the morning, after the other hens have been fed. Her food must consist of hard corn, and plenty of water. Many people place food and water near the hen, and then leave her to her own devices, and never disturb her at all; but although with some hens this may be the best, yet as a rule it is not a good plan, especially where more than one hen is in the sitting-house.

Most hens rise up, after the first morning or so, when the feeder enters; otherwise each hen must be taken off separately and given as much hard corn as she will eat. Any of the grains will do, even Indian corn in small quantities.

A dust bath must be provided, as sitting hens suffer very much from vermin during the period of incubation; and if the hen be very restless this is often found to be the cause, and some flowers of sulphur may be put into the dust-bath and into the nest with advantage.

While the hen is feeding, a glance should always be given to the nest to see that all is right there, that no egg has rolled away, and that none are broken or missing. Always mark each egg right round with pencil, so that should the hen lay others they may be removed. All broken eggs must be taken away; and should the others be soiled with the broken egg, the whole of them must be removed, and gently sponged with warm water, of 105 degrees, taking care, however, that they do not get chilled, but are put under the hen again immediately. All dirty straw or hay must be replaced, and the hen's breast cleaned if necessary.

Sometimes eggs seem to disappear very mysteriously, in which case either the hen eats them or rats may be suspected.

If a hen will not eat, after a few days she must be tempted with some soft food.

Eggs take from eighteen to twenty-one days to hatch; usually the latter period, and they have been known to hatch out after a much longer time; so that it is advisable to give a generous allowance of time before giving up hope. At the end of seven days the eggs may be tested to see if they will contain chicks. This is done by going to a dark room, and holding the egg in an upright position in front of a candle, shielding the light from the eye all round as much as possible with the hand, the object being to look at the candle through the egg. If the egg appears to be quite clear like a new-laid one, it may be put aside as of no use except for hen food; but if towards the centre of the egg a dark shadow is visible, then all is going well. The fertility of eggs can be told by experts at a much earlier date, but for novices it is better to wait even as long as ten days before testing. Unfertilized eggs should always be removed, as it gives the others a better chance.

During winter weather the hen must not be away from her nest more than ten minutes, and even then the eggs must be covered with flannel during her absence. In fact, they cannot be kept too warm and dry, but as they need moisture towards the end of the period the eggs must be dipped in hot water of 105 degrees every day for the last few days, always putting them back immediately under the hen.

During warm weather a hen may be absent from twenty to forty minutes without doing serious harm, especially during the later stages, and in fact during hot summer weather eggs should never be given up, even though quite cold. Last Jubilee Day I forgot to put back a hen, and on returning five hours afterwards found the eggs (duck) quite cold; but the hen went back to them and several hatched. Moisture is very necessary during dry weather, and this must be supplied by pouring hot water round the nest, or by sprinkling a little on the eggs, always replacing the hen immediately afterwards. No definite rule can be given on this use of moisture, but each poultry keeper must be guided by her common sense, and the cold, warmth, or dryness of the atmosphere. During a mild, damp spring hardly any is required.

I remember soaking some eggs during a sharp frost, with the result that none hatched; while, on the other hand, I knew a man who lost his temper over a hen that would not allow him to take her off to sprinkle the eggs, so he threw the whole bucket of water over her and the nest and the eggs, and every one hatched; but then it was hot, dry weather.

If a hen is very furious and it is necessary to handle her, a cloth should be thrown over her head, and then she may be lifted in the manner described.

During the last day or two of incubation the hen usually refuses to leave her nest, and now she may be allowed to do as she likes, food and water being left near her. It is a very exciting time for the poultry keeper when the chicks are really due, and she must exercise all her self-control to keep from being too curious about the doings in the nest.

She must not molest the hen now, but must be content to listen outside the nest, when the faint "peep, peep," can usually be heard. If this be so, then last thing at night the nest may be examined and the hen lifted carefully off, as eggs are often secreted under her wings. All egg-shells must be removed.

A half-hatched nest is an interesting sight. The broken egg-shells neatly placed one into the other, the elder chicks struggling to get out of the nest, the younger helplessly scrambling over the rest of the eggs from which the little prisoners are calling loudly for release. The mother is now very excited, and if frightened will crush her little ones ruthlessly; so after seeing that all is right she must be left to herself.

If at the end of twenty-one days there are no signs of breaking shells, the eggs must be put into hot water of 105 degrees, and those that have live chicks in them will after a few minutes bob about in a very funny fashion, and the dead ones will sink to the bottom of the bowl. If, a few hours later still, no start has been made and loud chirps are heard, the shell may be gently cracked with a penknife round the middle until the little beak is found, when if put back under the mother the chick will do the rest.

Chickens can be helped out by keeping the egg in hot water and gently loosening the tough skin that is round them; but I greatly believe in leaving them alone, as, for one saved, many may be lost in inexperienced hands.

After the chicks are all hatched, the hen must have a thoroughly good meal, as she has probably been without one for some time. Apocryphos of this, let me tell you one little story. An inexperienced lady having set two hens together, wished to put all the chickens under one hen, so as soon as all were hatched she took one poor rejoicing mother away from her little ones, and shut her up all night in a barn without food or water, and when next she visited her she was surprised to find her quite dead, of hunger, thirst, and a broken heart.

Chickens do not need anything to eat for twenty-four hours after hatching, so if all be hatched before night, they may be safely left until next morning with the mother on the nest. After the hens are all fed then it is time to visit the brood, which will probably be found scrambling about as lively as possible. If the weather is bright and fine the mother and chicks may be cooped out at once, but should it be wet and damp, they must be kept in.

Damp is the great enemy to chickens. They can usually bear any amount of dry cold, but if they are wet and damp they will always suffer. The best way of ensuring dryness is to have a shed something like the illustration, under which the coops may be placed. In this the ground, if well covered with ashes, will be nice and dry for the chickens to run on; for coops should never have wooden bottoms, but should be put right on the ground. Chickens brought up on wood, tiles, or pavements are very subject to cramp, and do not grow up into such healthy birds. The coops, however, although placed under the shed in wet weather, must always be put outside on to the grass every fine day, so that the chicks may have plenty of sun and grass.

The coops must be made of tarred or painted match-boarding (boards with grooves that fit together), thirty inches long, by twenty-two broad, twenty-two inches high in front, sloping to fourteen inches behind. The front should be boarded up four inches at the top and bottom, with two and a half inch bars placed at intervals between. The middle bar should be movable, so that the hen may be let out when needful. This simple coop may be made very easily from old packing cases, etc., and it may be further improved by providing shutters, fastened with hinges from the top, which can be opened horizontally for a shelter during the day, or can be hung down perpendicularly at night. The coop may also be closed by means of a simple slide. There are very many forms of coops to be seen in catalogues, with all kinds of useful devices, which if well studied by the amateur will give good hints for the home-made article.

The chief things to remember are that the hen and chickens require ventilation (not draughts), warmth, dryness, shelter, and protection. In ordinary weather enough warmth is secured by a waterproof house. All artificial heating is bad, except in the depth of winter, and even then it must be used with the greatest care. A glass-covered, unwarmed run may be used for delicate breeds.

Besides the coop a run will be needed. The usual size of a run is about four feet long by the width of the coop to which it is fastened; but as chickens when they grow older require more room, the most economical way is to have a number of light wooden or thin bar-iron frames made three feet square, and covered with wire netting. These frames can then be easily fastened together to make a long or short run as required, and the advantage of having them three feet square is that then the entire coop can be placed inside the run, and thus be absolutely protected from the raids of cats or rats.

Do protect your chickens. The mortification and distress of finding your charges disappear night after night, or even during the daytime, is very great, especially as it can be so often prevented by taking precautions.

In some districts the cat pest makes it almost impossible to rear chickens, as after they are two months old they must be allowed more liberty than a coop affords, and cats will attack quite big chickens. It makes a great difference as to whether the cats in the neighbourhood are used to chickens or not. I have lost dozens of chickens, while my sister, who allows hers to run about without the slightest protection in a district where cats are about on every wall and tree, has not lost one.

But to go back to our hen brood. Let us suppose that it is a bright sunny April morning, and that the coop is out on the grass with the wire run in front of it. The hen must be shut into the coop so that the chicks get more shelter, and she has not the chance of gobbling up all the delicate food. The coop and run must be moved every day into fresh grass, and should it be impossible to provide a shed in wet weather, the top and two sides of the run must be covered. Chickens should be fed for the first two days on hard boiled egg, chopped up small and mixed with breadcrumbs moistened with a little milk, and after the first day they will eat chopped groats quite readily.

The egg may be allowed for one week, mixed with coarse oatmeal; rice pudding, with groats at night. Food must be given every hour from early in the morning to late at night, for candle-light feeding is very essential for early broods, and in the summer time, when the chicks are up so early, some groats should be left in the run over night, so that they may not have to endure such a long fast before they are attended to.

After a fortnight old the food must be given every two hours, until about six weeks or two months old, when four good meals daily with some early morning corn will be plenty. The food after the first fortnight must consist of any meal mixture; plain oatmeal is very good if it can be afforded.

The soft food, like that of the hens, should be mixed hot and dry. The chickens should be allowed to eat as much as ever they will at one meal, but none must be left about afterwards. The groats may be changed for any grain after the first fortnight, Indian corn excepted; buckwheat and dari being specially good. A spoonful of bone meal put into the soft food helps them very much, as also a little sulphur in bright weather when the feathers are growing.

When there are chickens, all the dainty house-scrap should be kept for them, such as porridge, rice pudding, potatoes, scraps of underdone meat, suet pudding, etc. These things will be eagerly devoured, and will help on considerably.

Remember to give plenty of clean water in a flat flowerpot-saucer; skimmed milk may be used with great advantage up to two months old. Sometimes the chicks seem to mope about, not eating and being troubled with diarrhoea; this will probably be because they are short of grit. Grit is very necessary, and must be provided in the form of sharp sand, etc., from the very earliest day, or death and disease will be the result.

Where there is no fear of marauders, in the way of cats, rats, foxes, etc., the hen may be allowed to roam about with the chicks at large after the first fortnight. She will find grit and insects in abundance, and more than that will give her little ones their first lesson in cleanliness, for hen and chicks must have a dust bath every day or they will be devoured with small vermin of different kinds; and the hen knows this so well that should she and her brood be left in the tidiest garden imaginable, she will be found ere long to have scratched a terrible grave, in which the whole family will be found happily buried. So even during the first fortnight a dry dust bath must be provided, even though the poultry keeper has to watch over the brood all the time.

When the chickens are from six to eight weeks old the hen will want to leave them, and this is rather a critical time. A new house must be provided, though of the simplest kind. Some people allow their chickens to roost in an open shed, and find that answers very well, or any simple house made after the pattern of a coop, only larger, is good. The houses must not be too large, unless they can be divided into compartments, as chickens thrive best where there are not too many together.

There is no need for perches until the chicks are at least four and a half months old, as early perching makes crooked breasts. When the chickens are from ten to twelve weeks old the cockerels and pullets must be separated. This shows the necessity of having a few small houses rather than one big one. The cockerels can be told from the pullets by their combs, which are larger, and by their tall growth and pointed tails. The pullets are shorter and more compact, and have squarer tails. Some cockerels crow at a very early age, and then there is no mistaking them.

A cockerel's first attempt at crowing is a sound never to be forgotten! When chickens are merely reared to replenish the home stock, all the cockerels may be put into a house and run of their own, and fed up and killed as fast as possible, for an early cockerel will fetch nearly as much at four or five months before his first moult as he will at seven. At any rate it pays better to kill him off young. Of course if cockerels are kept for breeding or for prize birds the case is different, and room must be given them accordingly. But as a rule it is the pullets that need most attention and room, as they must be brought forward so as to begin laying as soon as possible.

They want plenty of grass, good shelter, and liberty; then they will mature steadily and healthily without unnatural forcing. When a number of chickens are reared, an ideal arrangement, no doubt, would be to have one long, low house, divided into compartments, each having its own run; or a number of small houses, each with a gravel run and shelter arranged round a large piece of grass, into which each set of big pullets, small pullets, cockerels, etc., could be allowed in turn. The grass in this case must be kept well grown during the summer, or it will run to seed and lose its value.

Where there is an unlimited grass range, movable chicken-houses on wheels are most convenient, as they can be moved about from one part of the field to another, in order that the chickens may find plenty of fresh grass, and so that no one particular part of the grass may become spoiled for other live stock. They are often made raised from the ground about two feet, the space underneath being boarded up round three sides, and thus forming a most successful shelter. The floor of the house will in this case be made of wood, so should be well covered with ashes or peat-moss, and be kept very clean. When the chicks are old enough, perches can be put in the house, and a board placed underneath, as in the hen-house, for cleaning purposes. Feed the growing up chickens very regularly, especially as they grow older. So often they get neglected when they reach the uninteresting stage, when neither pretty chicks nor laying hens.

Cockerels, if fed regularly and sufficiently up to about sixteen weeks old, ought to require no special feeding before killing for the home table, and unless for market purposes it is very unwise to coop them up, as they lose flesh in inexperienced hands. Girls who live near London or other large towns will have a ready market for a well-fed young cockerel, and will find the price obtained thoroughly pays for the trouble expended.

June and July hatched chickens are seldom worth hatching; they thrive well, but the prices obtained for early ones are so much better, while there is always a ready market for March hatched pullets in autumn. July birds, that only begin laying in February, thus missing the dear season, are comparatively useless. About the only birds worth hatching late are Leghorns or Houdan-Leghorns, as these are very precocious, and if hatched in early July will sometimes lay by Christmas.

The principle to go upon in order to make poultry pay is never to keep a bird a single day longer than is necessary before it yields a return; and as food is the same price all the year round, it stands to reason that a pullet which lays at six months old pays better than one that waits eight months, before beginning; and unless pullets are well forward in the autumn, and begin laying before the very cold weather commences, they often wait right through winter before giving a single egg. The autumn, therefore, is the time for looking over the stock, killing the old birds before they begin moulting, and deciding what pullets to keep. These latter may be removed to the hen-house as soon as they show signs of wanting to lay. This can be told by the "reddening up," which begins with the wattles and spreads over the face and comb, until the little pullet becomes flaming red, and rejoices the heart of her owner by leaving her a small egg one fine morning.

"COME UNTO ME."

By Mrs. G. LINNÆUS BANKS, Author of "Ripples and Breakers."

SOLEMN, sublime, and grand, the anthem swells
To the groined roof, and down the pillared aisle,
As sweet and clear as chime of silver bells;
And flying seraphs from the sacred pile
Waft the young echoes over land and sea,
"Come, oh, ye weary, come for rest to Me."

Open the windows wide; sing, sisters, sing:
Still let the anthem peal o'er cliff and plain
Its gracious message from our Lord, the King,
To all who labour, sick with grief or pain;
Your song may solace hearts ye cannot see—
"Come, oh, ye weary, come for rest to Me."

Bid ivory keys release imprisoned sound;
Let the whole choir, as with one vocal throat,
Waken with trumpet-blast the sleepers round;
But sing with softest, most melodious note
The loving call of Christ to bond and free,
"Come, oh, ye weary, come for rest to Me."

A stricken exile, sorrowful and worn,
Closing the gate on her lost childhood's home,
Lingers, and listening, cries, no more forlorn,
"Why seek I rest beyond the salt sea's foam?
Rest for the weary, only is with Him
Before whose glory stars and suns grow dim."

One soul has heard, one soul has chosen rest
Under the shadow of the shelt'ring Rock.
Some other soul may hear, and join the blest,
If ninety-nine are deaf—or, hearing, mock,
Rejoice o'er one, and hymn out, far and free,
"Come, oh, ye weary, come for rest to Me."

PART II.

A START FOR LONDON.

FRED was popular and had many kind friends. A man who can sing a good song and sing it well is always a welcome guest at parties, and his voice took him where he certainly would never have gone without it. He had besides pleasant manners and was good-looking; so all these gifts combined were as great temptations to him as remarkable beauty is to a woman; temptations and a snare, as Scripture puts it. In Fred's case his acquirements, or talents, as people were pleased to call them, led him much into society, and induced the ambition which was overmastering his reason. His so-called friends and companions fostered this spurious ambition, and when they found that he had resolved to rush into a new career, determined to help him. Kind-hearted people often put their hands in their pockets when, perhaps, they would be as well kept out of them, and thoughtlessly give money where judicious and restraining advice would be best. Not that advice would have availed with Fred; it seldom does with headstrong, conceited youth. Friends, as we have said, were kind to him according to their lights. They clubbed together and collected a sum of money that would defray the expenses of his journey and maintain him for a time in London. We need scarcely say that Mr. Gripson declined to contribute to this fund. But it was a proud day for Fred and his mother when he brought home a purse containing twenty-five golden sovereigns, presented by the admirers of his vocal and other gifts.

Lucy sighed, and wondered whether a Divine hand was leading her brother. She feared because it seemed to her to be self-will on his part, just as it had been self-will that had been the ruin of William Gripson. However, it was useless for her to remonstrate, for the die was cast, and Fred resigned his clerkship, and wrote to his friend to fix the day for his arrival in town. Of course all the work fell on Lucy. She had to make and mend his clothes, to pack his portmanteau, and to arrange his plans, for your geniuses are generally impractical.

On the eve of his departure his fellow-clerks and other companions gave a sort of banquet in his honour, which greatly annoyed his mother.

"They might have arranged it for another day," she said to Lucy, as they sat working at his wardrobe. "But I'm glad Martin went. It would have been very disrespectful if he had refused."

"I wonder how long twenty-five pounds will last in London," mused Lucy. "It would keep us nearly three months in the country, and we are three, while Fred is only one. Arithmetically, it ought to maintain him six months at least."

"My dear child, he will soon be earning his fifty pounds a night. I wish you were more hopeful. But you are just like your father, who would neither speculate nor venture, and so we are as poor as need be."

"We live in our very own house," said Lucy, "and he bought it with his savings, and everybody respected him. I would rather be his than the daughter of a millionaire who had gained his riches by fraud or speculation."

"Of course, my dear, I understand you perfectly; but money is—money, after all."

The brothers came home in the midst of this conversation, and soon cheered Mrs. Oliver by their account of the evening. Even Martin seemed to think that Fred was a very popular individual, and must make a fortune if the prognostics of his friends were good for anything.

Martin was a quiet, steady fellow, who, though the youngest of the family, had more common sense than most people. He was neither specially handsome nor particularly accomplished, but he employed his time systematically, in a way that his brother called dull. He belonged to the branch of the Young Men's Christian Association established at Merriton, and when his shop work was done, studied modern languages, and tried to carry on the education he had received at the grammar school. He found scope for his ambition in his native town, and desired no greater honour than the "Well done" promised to those who serve God and help their fellow-creatures.

Mrs. Oliver had waited for her sons for the family prayers that always closed their day. Fred was often an absentee, but this night he felt solemnised by the words of Holy Scripture read by his mother, and the supplications offered for the temporal and spiritual good, not only of their own little circle, but the wider circle of the world, of which, as yet, he did not know much experimentally. He had never before felt, as he mentally expressed it, so religious, and had never embraced his mother and sister so fervently as on that eve of his departure for the great world which he had been paxing to enter. At the moment, and for the first time, he wondered if he were wise to throw up a certainty for an uncertainty, and if he were showing filial love to leave a widowed mother, and deprive her of such help as his small earnings afforded her. But this mood did not last long.

During breakfast the next morning old Gripson appeared.

"I'll see to the shop," he said to Martin, "while you go and start the family genius. Now, Fred, I want a word with you. When you're at the lowest ebb of what you call fortune, and want a berth, you can come back to Merriton, and I'll give you a start behind the counter. I said the same to Will; but he hasn't arrived at that point yet. I owe your mother compensation for the loss of Ruth, whose only fault was having a husband who didn't know when he was well off. Three gone and only two left. But we're sure of Martin and Lucy, eh, Mrs. Oliver? They won't leave us."

Mrs. Oliver shook her head mournfully, for she, woman-like, was already thinking of possible matrimonial complications. Fred, however, bristled a little, as he always did under Mr. Gripson's attacks.

"Thank you, sir; you're very considerate," he said. "I hope to have made a good start elsewhere when I see you next."

"Hope won't put guineas into anybody's pocket," returned Gripson. "'Tis work that does that. 'In the sweat of your brow' was the curse, but the blessing follows. If you want to be happy and respectable, work."

"That's just what I mean to do, Mr. Gripson."

"Call your pro-fes-sion work!" began Gripson. But Lucy stayed the impending storm, by rising and beginning to clear the table.

Simultaneously there was a knock at the door, and she answered it. A truck stood there, brought by one of Fred's wharfside boatmen for his luggage. The little party was soon in the passage, and while the young men were bringing down the modest port-manteau and box, Lucy brought the man a cup of tea and a good slice of bread and butter, which he consumed, sitting on the edge of his barrow.

"I told Measter Fred I'd come, miss. Why should he be gwine off to Lunnon? Better a' stayed at whoom."

"I wish he had," sighed Lucy.

"Lucy, I want you," shouted Fred from the back of the stairs.

She found him counting his sovereigns on the sill of the passage window.

"You must take the odd five, Lucy," he said. "They are for mother, you know. I'll send a lot more soon. Fifty pounds a night will keep her in clover."

He thrust the sum he named into his sister's hand, and, after a brief reflection, she took it. She thought that she would keep it for him, in case of need. They stood a moment, side by side, gazing silently out of the window. It was open, and the sound of bells floated across the broad meadows that stretched between the bottom of their hilly garden and a village two miles off. The church tower was visible in the morning sunlight, and fields and river gleamed with a golden glow.

"There must have been a wedding," cried volatile Fred, putting his arm round his sister's waist. "Perhaps yours will be the next."

"And what would become of mother?" asked Lucy.

"I'll support her. Fifty pounds a night! Only think of that!"

"Fred! Lucy!" sounded from the bottom of the stairs, and the brother and sister hurried down.

The family party were soon on the way to the station, Mrs. Oliver leaning on Fred's arm, and both eagerly discussing his brilliant future. Neither had the least doubt of his success. He had only to be heard, and to begin the fortune sure to follow. The others, less sanguine, walked on in silence.

When they reached the station they were greeted by a number of Fred's friends and admirers, who had come to see him off. He was the hero of the hour, and Mrs. Oliver was overwhelmed with congratulations on the future of her son. Everyone was sure that his magnificent tenor voice had only to be heard in order to be appreciated, and everybody knew that a tenor was wanted at the moment. And so, amid the hearty good wishes of friends and fellow-townsmen, and followed by the tears and prayers of his mother and Lucy, Fred steamed off for the great Babel called London: one more aspirant for the empty honours vainly sought by tens of thousands of people, discontented with their lot in life.

Lucy did not return home. Her mother and brother left her at the door of a handsome house in the centre of the town, where dwelt Lawyer Sempold and his family. Here she was engaged to teach and manage as best she could four riotous children, whom she found awaiting her in the hall. She was rather late, and they had taken advantage of this, according to the time-honoured custom of youngsters. She was greeted by a vociferous cry of "Is he gone? Did you see him off, Miss Oliver?" And she had some difficulty in quelling the tumult, and chasing her pupils into their schoolroom at the back of the house. No sooner were they there than Mrs. Sempold came to hear the news, and to inquire if Fred were actually started. She was a kindly woman, but not superior to country-town gossip, and Fred's prospects had been much discussed by all classes, for the Olivers were greatly respected in their native place. Seeing Lucy's tearful eyes, she sought to reassure her.

"He is certain to get engagements, Lucy," she said. "When I was in London a few years back I went to several concerts, and I declare I heard no one with so fine a voice as Fred's. The great tenor is losing his, and we all expect that your brother will take his place."

"I hope he will get on, Mrs. Sempold. Everybody has been so kind that—" Here Lucy paused and burst into tears.

Upon this the children swarmed round her, climbed up on her lap, put their arms about her, and almost cried for company.

"How foolish I am! But we were never parted before," she said, embracing all the children at once, while Mrs. Sempold rushed off to get her a cup of hot coffee, muttering, "Poor girl! I daresay she has had no breakfast."

There were very kind hearts in Merriton, where everybody knew everybody, and where there were not too many inhabitants for the rich to have a care for the poor. District visiting there was a much easier matter than it is in the great cities, where, instead of a family tenantry a tidy cottage, one close room must suffice to hold them, be they few or many. It is marvellous infatuation and love of change that induce the dwellers in country districts to throng to the big towns. Still, migrate they will, and preaching is vain.

Kind Mrs. Sempold proposed to give Lucy a half-holiday, saying she was sure her mother would want her, upon which the children, contrary to custom, declared their intention of being quite good, and their desire that she should remain. She dried her eyes, thanked Mrs. Sempold, and did remain, seeing that the children had frequent half-holidays, and feeling that she had displayed more weakness than was necessary. She taught them energetically, dined and walked with them, and went home to tea as usual.

She found her mother in good spirits, and the evening passed quickly in work and talk about Fred. Sanguine Mrs. Oliver was as sure as Fred himself of his ultimate success, and less hopeful Lucy would not damp her spirits by the typical wet blanket.

Fred announced his arrival in London by a hasty post-card. His mother knew that writing letters was distasteful to him, and did not expect sheets of well-covered paper; but during the course of the week a letter arrived which gladdened her heart, though it slightly saddened Lucy's. Fred's musical friend had introduced him to the celebrated master he had named, who had tried his voice, and expressed himself well satisfied with it. He did not, however, apparently promise him at once the anticipated fifty pounds a night, for Fred did not name the subject of money. The voice was all that could be desired, and everything was most promising, so he said. It evolved, however, in a subsequent letter, that certain hard study was necessary to educate the said voice for the public, and Fred had placed himself under the tuition of Herr Franz, to whom he had been introduced. Meanwhile he intended to sing at private assemblies and parties, and even at amateur concerts, to make himself known. "A name is everything," he said, "and I shall soon make that. I can get a guinea a night, and Herr Franz thinks me a most promising pupil."

"How will he live?" asked Lucy of Martin. "The collection won't last long, and we can't supply him."

"What's become of the fifty pounds a night?" queried old Gripson, grimly. "He hasn't appeared in the papers yet as 'The new and magnificent tenor.'"

"He must have time. He is sure to get on," responded poor Mrs. Oliver.

Time went on, however, and her hopes were not fulfilled as literally as she expected. He sent flourishing accounts of his public appearances, which were not chronicled in the papers, and when Lucy ran them to ground, she found that they must have occurred in inferior places of amusement, where he must have sung for bare subsistence. She wrote and wrote to him, but his letters became fewer, and before the year was out nearly ceased. His mother and brother also wrote, but when he replied it was irritably, and to the effect that they must have patience with a fellow. He was getting on. Rome wasn't built in a day. He was to sing shortly at the Crystal Palace and the Albert Hall; but it was no good hurrying people in London.

His patrons and friends at Merriton were as much disappointed as his family at his long probation, but none of them quite understood the labour and anxiety of a public career.

BITS ABOUT ANIMALS.

By RUTH LAMB.

LORD RANDOLPH AND TIM.

"So you have adopted a new pet. I am surprised at your taste. I hate pugs; they are such thorough shams. They look fierce and bulldog-like, but ugliness is the only thing the two kinds have in common. The pug has neither the courage nor the sense of his probable kinsman. He is hopelessly stupid."

Thus ran on a lively girl friend as she surveyed our latest pet, "Lord Randolph," otherwise Randy, surely the most perfect of pugs—not a point wanting, and a great pet of our family and of the cats!

I bristled up instantly, and sternly answered—"There is no such animal as a stupid dog, unless he has been condemned to live with stupid people. Constant companionship with such may have a debasing influence on four-legged intelligence represented by a dog. It is the fault of his surroundings if he become stupid, not of his nature."

I glance at our pug aforementioned, and note an expression of satisfaction on his sooty muzzle. He understands the situation, that my friend is no friend of his, but knows that his cause is in safe hands.

He came to us a dejected youngster, but the most beautiful of six months old pugs, with the word "Punch" attached to his collar. But he never would answer to that name. He might have been stone deaf for any notice he took of the plebeian appellation. The instant he was addressed as "Lord Randolph" he frisked cheerfully forward, and has since condescended to "Randy" for shortness.

When the dog arrived after a long railway journey in a dingy box over the engine wheel, and after parting with all his friends, he was naturally out of spirits, and human attentions failed to console him, so "Tim" took him in hand.

Tim was a beautiful young cat, just Randy's age, and a perfect pet. He looked pityingly at the new arrival, and constituted himself his guide and guardian. He coaxed him to go up and down the house—in fact, showed him all the ins and outs; capered about him, and invited him to a game of romps; and though Randy was at first slow to respond, the cheerful little cat conquered his shyness and dulness, and they became fast friends. If Randy and I were strolling up and down the drive, Tim was sure to accompany us, and the gambols of this curious pair of companions amused many a looker-on, especially as Tim's mother often made a third in the game.

One evening I was going out with Randy, and Tim, as usual, went with us, until we neared the main road. We were twenty minutes absent, and rain was falling heavily as we turned into the drive. Behind a stump near the entrance, Tim had waited for us, heedless of rain, and as Randy approached he darted out to startle him, just as a child often does with a companion. Then the two frolicked away together like a couple of children. But Tim always exercised a certain authority over Randy. One morning a thaw had set in, and the ground was sloppy with half-melted snow. Randy was paddling about in it, and, though often called, declined to come in. Tim was waiting for him in the hall doorway, and at length, waxing impatient, the cat marched towards the offender, lifted his right paw and gave him a cuff on one side of the head, then with the left paw bestowed a second, and literally drove him into the house, to the amusement of three lookers-on.

was not. I saw a paragraph then-abouts, stating that there was a great demand for fine cat-skins, and that an unusually large number had been sent to market. Tim's was the finest, silkiest fur I ever saw, and that paragraph suggested a dread which I cannot bear to put into words!

Randy missed Tim. Everybody missed him, and we talk of our lost pet with lasting regret. Our doggie has proved that he is no stupid pug. He has plenty of funny ways. For instance, when his water-bowl is empty, he first does his best to attract attention thereto by charms and blandishments. These failing, he seizes the bowl between his paws and trundles it up and down the passage leading to the kitchen, until it is refilled by somebody.

He plays a game at "hide and seek" with my daughter, his real mistress; comes to have his eyes covered, then prances off in search of her, and goes in turn to every place she has ever used for purpose of concealment. When he has found her, he comes again to have his face-covered whilst she hides a second time, and he will continue the game till she is tired.

When giving out articles from the store-room one day, I bestowed a pinch of raw sugar on Randy. Since then he has demanded a dollop daily. If I forget, Randy does not, but plants himself at the door and scratches at it until his request for sugar is complied with.

The same at the butcher's. The doggie had a scrap of raw meat bestowed on him the first time he called there with me when I paid the weekly bill. He subsequently called many times, and could only be dragged out of the shop if the master forgot to repeat his gift. Randy was sure of his scrap in the long run, for the fuss he made served as a reminder, and the bit of lean meat rewarded the pertinacious beggar.

Randy is by no means the only beggar at that shop. On one occasion the master told me there was quite a commotion opposite his door. It was caused by a large black retriever, which belonged to a blind man. The latter was on his way to his daily post, but his dog could not be got past the butcher's door. Dragging, coaxing, even blows failed to stir him, for he was a powerful animal, and showed two rows of gleaming teeth when meddled with.

"I was not in the shop at first," said the butcher, "but when I came I remembered that on the previous morning I had given the animal a bit of meat. I did the same again, and he went cheerfully on his way; but ever since then he has stopped for his portion. Do not begin to give to a dog unless you mean to go on. He will never forget."

Randy is kind to all cats. His doubly curled tail is always the kitten's first plaything, and when the mother is absent, the survivor of each litter finds a warm resting-place cuddled up between the doggie's paws. They sleep on the same rug, and if any animal is put upon, Randy is the one. Flossie, our present mother-cat, sometimes acts like a boy of whom I have heard, and who, as his brother complained, always took his half of the bed in the middle, and compelled the junior to take his moiety out of both sides.

Flossie did this until we enlarged the accommodation, and rendered it impossible for Randy, patient beast, to be served in a like manner.

Randy has musical tastes, too. He will listen to singing, or the piano, for any length of time. But run up a chromatic scale or indulge in discords, and he howls himself hoarse to such an accompaniment; though he will not leave the piano.

A pug has been well described as a nursery dog. He makes himself such a safe playmate for children, and he will stand any amount of infantile mauling without resentment.

I know of a fine house, in the drawing-room of which is a stuffed pug. It is so lifelike that strangers take it for a living animal, whilst the mistress sometimes half apologises for its presence by saying: "It was the friend of my little ones for years."

My Randy is as sympathetic as any human friend if anybody whom he loves is in trouble. He does everything but speak, and—well, the exception at such times is an advantage!

SNOW.

I made Snow's acquaintance one day whilst waiting for his mistress. He is a beautiful Pomeranian, and spotless as his name. His present owners met with him during a summer outing, and with difficulty purchased him from a poor but dog-loving master, who did not sell him for the money's sake, but to secure his pet a better home than he could give him.

Snow's comfort is considered now in such a manner, that one cannot see him without wishing that all children were as fortunate. He gets his meals—proper food—to the minute. His bath, his daily walks, his times of going to bed and getting up, are all arranged with the greatest precision. He has his own chair—chintz-covered and cushioned—placed near the window, so that he can note what is passing, and be free from the temptation to invade the satin damask on the other furniture.

His mistress, finding that I was a great observer of animal character, told me some stories about Snow, amongst which was the following:—

The day after he first came to the house the servants assembled as usual for family prayers. Snow had not been used to such an arrangement, and he pranced and frisked about to the disturbance of everybody. Of course, he was turned out, and for the rest of the time lay quietly on the door-mat.

He required no second warning, but when prayer-time came again, and the books were placed before the master, Snow marched out of the room and located himself on the mat till the reappearance of the servants showed that the reading was over. This habit he continued ever after, the sight of the books being the invariable signal for his departure from the room.

Both young and old might learn something from Snow. Few of us are cured of a fault by a single lesson.

PENSIONER CATS.

In a large town people are sure to be haunted by homeless animals, and dog and cat lovers are stirred to pity and relieve them, or to put a merciful end to sufferings which they cannot remedy.

One of my pensioners was a black and white tom cat of immense size and extremely tame. He was affectionate and grateful, but, like most animals, very jealous. He often joined me when I was out with my indoor pets in the garden and elsewhere, frolicked and played with them, and insisted on having from me a full share of notice. He was the best of friends with Randy, so long as I did not pet him, but let me say a few kind words to the pug, or caress him, and Tom immediately flew at the dog, and gave him a revengeful claw as if to equalise matters.

FOR THE KING'S SAKE.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

By LADY MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Bessie's Sacrifice."

CHAPTER II.

SIR MICHAEL NEWPORT had scarcely left the room before Mistress Betty had rushed to her niece's side. She found her leaning back, her eyes closed, her hands pressed together, half fainting.

The poor lady looked at her wistfully, with a great longing to know what had passed, but a dread of breaking that trance of pain. A few minutes passed, during which Eleanor did not seem to be aware of her presence, and then she opened her eyes. As they fell on the frightened, anxious face of her aunt, she smiled gently, and held out her hand.

"Do not look so frightened, Aunt Betty," she said. "It is all right; it is to be as you wish."

"Oh, Nell!"

"Yes; I will marry him. He is a good man, and a very generous one."

"You will not always be unhappy, Nell," said Mistress Betty, her weak face quivering. "Promise me you will not."

"I should like to tell you what he said to me," said Eleanor, speaking slowly, almost dreamily. "Whatever the future may bring forth of sorrow and weary care, I shall always feel for him the most warm and tender gratitude."

"That is not a bad beginning," said Mistress Betty, eagerly.

Betty," she said, "you are far more impetuous than I am; be content. I am satisfied of his most generous, most perfect consideration. He offered me the gift as another man might offer a lover's gift of rich jewels. Well, well; think no more of it. I could not accept; I must pay the price, and I am pledged to be his wife."

"I do not know," exclaimed Mistress Betty. "Had we not better reconsider it? It changes my opinion that he should have thus presumed. Does he look down upon us, this mushroom Squire, whose ancestors owned no foot of soil in Bartonshire?"

Eleanor laid her hand on the agitated fingers. "Be satisfied," she said. "I told you that you might see that he is greater than we thought him; do not think of it again. But I cannot help grieving when I think how marred and jangled both our lives must be. I can give him nothing for what he gives to me; he is worthy of so good a wife. I cannot make him happy, lacking love, and his gifts to me are living pain."

"I will strive to forget it," said Mistress Betty. A sudden recollection flashed across her of the importance of the position. This marriage was life or death to the family; should she risk it

"He told me that having seen my disinclination to be his wife, he loved me well enough to take no advantage of my self-sacrifice; and, Aunt Betty, what will you say? He offered me a gift of all the mortgage deeds, to clear the estate, and set my father free."

Mistress Betty drew herself up, the colour flushed crimson into her face, her fingers trembled nervously.

"I thought he had been a gentleman," she said.

"It was most courteously, most delicately done," said Eleanor. "Of course it was impossible."

"How did he dare thus to presume?"

A gentle, pathetic smile stole over Eleanor's pale lips. "Dear Aunt by betraying how bitterly her pride had been hurt?

"Yes, you will soon forget it," said Eleanor, wearily. "Shall we tell my father now?"

"Wait for a moment yet, Nelly. I—I should like to talk to you. It is then quite settled?"

"Quite settled."

"We women are made for self-sacrifice, and we have this faculty—we can learn to fit the burden to our shoulders. Nell, dear."

"Yes, Aunt Betty."

"Have you sometimes thought sorrowfully that I was more to your father than yourself?"

"It was natural," said Eleanor, in a stifled voice. It had indeed been a constant trial to her. Her mother had died in her early childhood, and Mistress Betty had ever since ruled the house; that she should do so would have been nothing to Eleanor had she allowed her the proper share of her father's love and confidence, but, like all weak natures, Betty was of a very jealous disposition; she monopolised her brother, and treated her niece as a child and intruder long after years and discretion warranted her admission to the full privileges of the family circle. Eleanor found all her consolation, all her happiness, in her passionate devotion to her twin-brother; in his love, and in the absorbing interest of his adventurous life, she contrived to hide from herself her own anomalous position in her father's home.

Now emotion was working in Mistress Betty's heart which elevated it above its usual frivolity; she spoke with tears in her eyes—

"I have been selfish perhaps, Nell," she said; "but you have never complained. Once Robbie said something about it, but it was no affair of his, and I would not listen; but now that you are going to leave us, I should like to tell you something."

"Sit down, Aunt Betty," said Eleanor. The fidgety, restless figure flitting from side to side jarred on her nerves.

"No, no; I like to stand. I always have been used to standing. I must go back to the time when I was younger than yourself, much younger; almost a child. People said I was very handsome; your father thought so, and Lord Langley thought so also. It was a quarrel we had, a very silly quarrel. Never give way to temper, Nell; remember that! He broke off his engagement, and went away. I cannot think that I was in the wrong now," she added, with a sudden drawing up of her head.

Eleanor was listening with a look of new comprehension on her face.

"Lord Langley?" she said. "Do I not remember him?"

"Yes; he came back at last. I had other suitors; more than you have had, or can have with our broken fortunes, but——” She paused, and laughed a little affectedly. “Tell me, Nell, is this patch well placed?—here on my cheek, or should it be a trifle higher?”

She went to the mirror, and stood before it adjusting the patch, and continued speaking from thence with her back to her niece.

“Somehow no one but my Lord Langley would have suited me. I could afford to be capricious then, which you cannot. He came back at last—your father always said he would come back—things were changed. Your mother had been long dead; you were growing tall (people thought you were my younger sister), and the troubles had begun. You know how it was; how all the money went—mine went first, it was more easily laid hands upon; and the Restoration, to which we all looked forward with confidence, seemed further off than ever.

Your father got into trouble, and we had to fly the country. Do you remember, Nell? I had but one gown, and you scarce that. It is all over now. Lord Langley came back when we were on the eve of departure.”

“Dear Aunt Betty!” said Eleanor, rising and putting her arm round the shaking figure.

“I tell you, Nell, women are only born for self-sacrifice; the money was all gone, your father had lost his health as well, so we agreed that it was useless to think of it. He behaved like the true gentleman he was. He kissed my hand—nobody kissed a hand with such grace as he—and we said good-bye, and we crossed the sea. It was his doing that my brother obtained leave to return, and escaped confiscation of this estate. That sort of service a lady may accept, no other.”

“And then?” said Eleanor, gently.

“He married one of the Fleetwoods of Gilbert Hall; their mother was a Murray. I hear they have several children, all very plain indeed. Mistress Mary Fleetwood was a very ugly woman, so it might have been expected. I have a cold in my eyes, Nell; the wind to-day has been very trying; I will go and bathe them with rosewater. Nay, do not kiss me, and do not cry; it spoils the complexion, and—and——”

Poor Mistress Betty broke into tears in spite of all her efforts.

Eleanor knew her aunt well; she knew that it was the actual relief from the most wearing anxiety that had unsealed her lips, and made her tell her little story; and she grieved not to have known it before, thinking that the knowledge might have made her more tender to this aunt, who was at once so frivolous and so brave.

WHY PERSONAL REMARKS ARE TO BE AVOIDED.

THE fact that we can all of us recall innumerable instances where personal remarks may be made without any breach of the laws of courtesy, and without entailing any results that are undesirable, by no means entitle us to question the value of the various considerations which issue in the injunction—never to make a personal remark.

When, for instance, in one of George Eliot's novels, the Radical hero breaks a long silence by suddenly saying to Esther Lyon, “You are very beautiful!” the remark is certainly a personal one, but it is raised out of the sphere of the ordinary personal remark by the relations between Esther and Felix, and by the train of thought in the latter's mind.

For, the next moment, Felix Holt falls to wondering whether the subtle measuring of forces will ever come to measuring “the force there would be in one beautiful woman, whose mind was as noble as her face was beautiful—who made a man's passion run in one current with all the great aims of his life.”

The intention at the back of the personal remark here justifies it, for Felix does not wish to flatter, or ingratiate himself with Esther, he only wants to keep her from being one of those women “who hinder men's lives from having any nobleness in them.”

Clearly the condemnation of personal remarks does not extend to such cases as these; but then, we must remember, such cases are exceptional. Those which most frequently present themselves are of the kind where the provocation to the remark has its root in some trivial impulse or petty interest. Now directions for our guidance in social matters have to be more or less generalised—that is to say, they have to overlook the many occasions when the directions can safely be disregarded. Rules of conduct, in short, have to be laid down on the lines of universality, and the necessary modifications have to be made as one's experience widens, just in the same way as in enlightened methods of teaching languages, rules have to be taught first, and the exceptions have to be left to be gleaned later on by the intelligence of the student acting on what comes before him.

Why personal remarks must for the most part be deprecated, we can very easily see. Personal remarks of the objectionable kind fall into three classes:

1. The Offensive, or those which unduly disparage the person addressed. Ignorance of all that constitutes individual merit, and petty envy and spite are generally at the bottom of this kind of remark.

2. The Fulsome, or those which unduly flatter the person addressed. Desire to stand well with one's fellows, no matter at what cost, and a general lack of conscientiousness in social intercourse engender these.

3. The Embarrassing, or those which cause a feeling of awkwardness to spring up in the assembled company, as when, by complimenting one lady on the exquisite clearness of her complexion, attention gets painfully, albeit unwittingly, drawn to the sallowness of the lady sitting next her. Obtuse sensibilities are clearly responsible for these.

On the other hand, the qualities which issue in the acceptable kind of personal remarks—in those we may exhaustively classify as the Kindly Appreciative, the Instructively Critical, and the Pleasantly Introductory—such qualities plainly are high in character and rare in occurrence.

Criticism and appreciation demand generosity and insight, as well as a kindly interest in humanity; while it is tact alone which will enable one to make such judicious personal remarks as shall put people at their ease under circumstances of difficulty. It is obvious, then, that personal remarks which are the outcome of such qualities as these—qualities not possessed by the majority of men and women—will much less frequently be heard than that other kind, which springs out of prevalent petty failings.

Hence, in order to guard against this last sort, it becomes expedient, in the first instance, to lay an embargo on all personal remarks whatsoever.

Thoughtless egotists who, thinking only of the gratification of being popular, pay exaggerated compliments to every person with whom they come in contact, do much more harm than they ever realise. More especially do they inflict a serious injury on young and impressionable girls. To these, in their youthful inexperience, the false coin of current flattery must always seem to ring true. Assure the average young girl that she has a lovely voice, that she looks charming, and that her conversational inanities are flavoured with wit and seasoned with vivacity, she unhesitatingly accepts what she takes to be an involuntary tribute to her perfections, and straightway tends to become self-sufficient and arrogant. The inevitable result then is not long in showing itself. Supremely satisfied with herself and her small achievements, she relaxes all further efforts towards self-improvement, and so loses every chance of ultimately becoming what her flatterers have assured her she already is.

It is not that praise itself is harmful—the harm arises out of the reckless, unthinking way in which the praise is administered. People who say glibly to a young girl, radiant in all the freshness of sixteen years and a summer toilette, “How nice you look!” do not pause to inquire if hers is a temperament which will derive benefit from such remarks as these. If she be of a shy and retiring disposition, apt to take an unduly low estimate of her personal attractions, and so, to be brusque and curt in society, the stimulating effect of these complimentary words may be entirely good. She may be induced by them to lay aside that excessive diffidence which so often is scarcely distinguishable from stiffness and an unamiable temper, and may exert herself to be genial and pleasant to those around her. On the other hand, let her be a girl with a weak and foolish nature, and this very same remark may send her to study airs and graces in front of the looking-glass, and may make her imagine that her share in this world's work is to be limited to displaying her pretty face to the utmost advantage.

But to both these most opposite contingencies the person who makes the personal remark is thoroughly indifferent. She says what she does, either because it is the first thing that comes into her head, or worse still, because she likes to be liked, and is careless what means she adopts to ensure being so.

She makes the complimentary speeches for her own ends, and not with any view to the pleasure or welfare of those to whom she speaks. Hence she works evil both to herself and others, lowering her own character and injuriously affecting theirs.

But it must not be supposed that an almost equal measure of harm is not done by the personal remarks issuing from that very large class of persons who "like to speak their minds," and who deem an offensive rudeness justified the instant they can aver "It's perfectly true."

Toute vérité n'est pas bonne à dire, and obvious as it may be, for instance, that a young woman of thirty is no longer a girl, she will scarcely enjoy being told, when some plan is under discussion, that "she is quite old enough to be able to decide for herself," or being assured that she need not trouble about her bonnet being shabby, as "no one is likely to notice her."

The harm involved in personal remarks of this kind is just the harm of causing pain, a result we have no right to produce, unless we can plead specific good aimed at as our excuse.

And I venture to think, fewer outspoken speeches of this unkind character would be heard in daily life if people only realised a little more fully that "a small unkindness is a great offence," and if, in their professed reverence for truth, they took care to appreciate the vital truth contained in Hannah More's homely couplet:

"To spread large bounties, though we seek in vain, Yet all may shun the guilt of giving pain."

ADA HEATHER-BIGG.

THE SERVICE OF BEAUTY.

BEAUTY VERSUS UGLINESS.

In the old fairy tales there is such a fund of true poetic insight, and their strange guesses at truth, so much which our latest knowledge cannot contradict, that we seem never to outgrow the charm they had for us as children. Their suggestiveness grows with our understanding, and to the end we may find in these life-parables a mysterious undercurrent of meaning.

~Such a fairy tale is "Beauty and the Beast." Besides its mythological meaning, besides the literal acceptance of it as it sank into our childish minds, receptive and unquestioning, we may trace in the dear old story a deep, significant truth. Beauty does not reach her completion while she remains absorbed in herself. Not until she foregoes all else to give herself away in pure devotion, does she gain supreme happiness. Beauty gives herself to redeem her father's promise to the Beast, and then again, by her self-surrender to him, transforms the Beast into a higher nature. And this old, old story is still being played at, if we have eyes to see it. We have preached beauty in all her excellence, as worthy of our service; but we must not close without pointing out how that excellence is best attained. We must not persuade our readers to dwell in the House Beautiful, without warning them of the danger of remaining there wrapped in lonely contemplation. It must be used as a point of vantage whence we may sally to attack ugliness, in the war which is the chief service beauty imposes on us. We have, indeed, no right to stay in our soul's quiet retreat of loveliness, until we have redeemed our Father's promise to that beast of want and ignorance and disease, which is still in our midst; a living contradiction to all we hold dear in the world of imagination, to all the beauty that should be "in man and the earth he dwells on." We are no true lovers of beauty if we selfishly stay behind, shutting our eyes to all necessity of action, while this beast in vain demands our self-surrender. Our devotion alone can transform him. The poor Beast in the story was under an evil spell, and his coarse exterior hid a noble nature. Let us have faith in our wretched fellow-creatures, and we shall find how to break the spell of degradation by the enthusiasm of our love.

If our natures were rightly tuned, it should indeed be impossible for us to find any harmony of beauty in the midst of the terrible discords about us. But we are all imperfect instruments; we lack imagination. If our susceptibilities were as keen really as we sometimes imagine, there would be no rest, no comfort for us, while such hideous degradation and dreary ugliness were spread around, even to the very doors of our homes. It is to be feared that many are content with a fool's paradise, and willingly guard their tender susceptibilities from the rude truths of reality. But, however we may fence these off, we cannot cheat that law of our nature by which indifference to the claims of others affects our sensibility throughout. We can never open our eyes fully to the sweet teachings of the book of nature while our hearts are dead to the needs of our fellows, who lie as it were in dungeons far from her sunshine and purity. We shall never enjoy to perfection our pictures and our poems, till we have tasted the pleasure of awakening in another soul a kindred joy of appreciation. We shall never be truly thankful for the peace and grace and harmony of our homes, until we have watched the effect they have wrought on those to whom tumult and disgrace and discord have been like a natural element. We shall never take proper pride in our own dress and manners till we have brought at least decency into those of our poor sisters.

No doubt the finer our perception of beauty, the more exquisite will be our pain in coming into contact with these manifestations of the "Beast," but the pain is soon lost in the pure pleasure of winning, of even striving to win, something over to the evidence of God's beauty and truth in the world.

Many men and women, thank God, are waking to recognise this imperative call, and feeling the cheering reward of acting up to it, in spite of all the discouragements and disappointments which attend such efforts. Noble examples need not long be sought: there are enough to inspire us all of those who have found this "spell to make life beautiful, of loftiest thought to lowliest service bowed."

Mary Carpenter, Octavia Hill, Sister Dora, and a host of others have furnished us with fine ideals of a womanhood which can countercharm the "Beast." It is not given to us all to set on foot great movements, or to work far-reaching social reforms, or to devote our whole lives to the care of the sick, the sad or the sinful. But something we can all do, and it is at our peril we leave it undone. We can each have at least one friend among those to whom life wears an aspect hard and dreary compared to our own, and we can brighten and comfort that sadder lot with many a quiet but effectual touch.

It would not indeed be well for young girls to set about reforming or directing those older and often far wiser in the practical side of life than themselves, simply because they are richer and better educated. Ruskin in his "Letter to Young Girls," which I wish they would all learn by heart, says:—"Serve the poor, but, for your lives, you little monkeys, don't preach to them! They are probably, without in the least knowing it, fifty times better Christians than you, and if anybody is to preach, let them. Make friends of them when they are nice, as you do of nice rich people; feel with them, work with them, and if you are not at last sure that it is a pleasure to you both to see each other, keep out of their way. For material charity, let older and wiser people see to it; and be content, like Athenian maids in the procession of their Name-goddess, with the honour of carrying the basket."

That is wise advice: to leave the material part of charity to older-heads to organise. But mark how Ruskin makes the essential part of a girl's service of the poor, sympathy-feeling with them, weeping with those that weep, and rejoicing with them that do rejoice—through her imagination, putting herself in another's place. Now there is in a sweet girlish nature such tact or keen "touch-faculty" in approaching other natures, and in youth altogether such plasticity, as eminently fit a young girl for this kind of service. If such a girl is endowed also with a true perception of beauty and sensitive taste, by this sympathy her poor friend's ugly and dreary and dirty life will become simply intolerable to her, and she will never rest until she has brought into it some sense of order, some ray of beauty, some touch of grace. It has been said that he is a benefactor of mankind who makes two blades of grass to grow where one grew before. What shall we say of her who quickens the little seed of beauty, which lies dormant in every nature however hard and coarse, and causes it to bear fruit fair and sweet, in hearts and homes? It is just this sort of quiet, almost invisible work which a young girl can do without altering the even tenor of her life, or in any way making herself conspicuous—showing her pleasure in a room cleaned out of deference to her presence, bringing window-gardening into fashion by her influence, teaching and helping to make suitable and pretty clothing, using her sweet voice for singing or reading, to bring within reach of the dull and dreary, songs and stories and poems. There are a thousand and one ways by which each individually may seek and find her best service.

I wonder how many of my young readers have heard of the Kyrle Society and the noble work it is doing. Its object is "to bring beauty home to the people," and its motto: "To the utmost of our power." Its chief agencies are the decoration of clubs, hospitals, meeting-rooms, or any such places used by the poor in London; the securing and planting of open spaces, and the distribution of plants and flowers among the poor; the organizing of free performances of the oratorios in districts where good music could hardly otherwise be heard; and the distribution of literature to hospitals, clubs, libraries, etc. All this work is purely voluntary, professionals as well as amateurs often contributing their help in the artistic and musical branches. I wish every girl would see the benefit to others, and the privilege to herself, of helping in some one of the many ways here pointed out "to bring beauty home to the people." Everyone has something to offer if she will.

There is no lack of choice in the methods which have been tried and proved useful by good and true leaders, if we wish to find the one best suited to us, and to enroll ourselves under beauty's banner, in the crusade against ugliness. Any possession, any talent, any grace, may be utilised, especially those graces and talents which adorn our English girlhood.

If my readers love beauty, as I believe all good girls instinctively do, I would beseech them to love it wisely and well; to drink in all they can of it from nature, to bathe their spirits in its pure perfection in art and literature; to show their allegiance to it in the appearance of their homes and themselves; but not to rest content in this; to remember that as we eat to live, not live to eat, so our minds and spirits do not possess the power of absorbing beauty for their own gratification, but that they may assimilate it to live it out in sweet influences around them. If this consecration of our service be wanting, we may be persons of fine taste, and capable of such enjoyment as is open to the selfish, but we shall never penetrate to the inner sanctuary and see the invisible glories and hear the silent harmony of the beautiful, the true, and the good.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SISTER.—We should think that black, dark red, and dark shades of green would suit your complexion and take off the sallow look.

A BATH READER.—We can only suggest that the cage has been hung in a draughty place, and that the bird has got a chill.

CLARENCE.—We should think your general symptoms point to failure in your health, and we advise you to consult a doctor. You should not drink hot drinks, nor walk directly after eating. Both mind and body should be rested for at least a quarter of an hour.

LOVER OF "G.O.P."—Lucius Junius Brutus, the father and founder of the Roman Republic, was created consul, B.C. 505, on the fall of the House of Tarquin and the regal power. He fell in battle with the Tarquins, B.C. 509. Marcus Junius Brutus, born B.C. 85, served under Pompey, B.C. 49; pardoned and favoured by Caesar, B.C. 48. He was his chief assassin, March 15, B.C. 44; raised an army, and assumed the title of "Imperator," B.C. 43; defeated at the second battle of Philippi, and killed himself, October, B.C. 42. Marc Antony was nephew of Julius Caesar, born B.C. 83—was present at Caesar's murder—created a triumvir—gained the battle of Philippi—married Octavia—fell in love with Cleopatra—divorced Octavia, and Octavius made war on him in consequence—defeated at Actium—committed suicide by poison, B.C. 30.

W. LEWIS WILLIAMS.—There is a kind of loosely-shaped dress called a "tea gown," drawing in slightly with a ribbon or long cord, which may be worn at any time, in the house, before late dinner. But you are perfectly right in saying that it is not correct to appear in any sitting-room in the "ordinary dressing-gown" employed in a bedroom. The dressing of the hair takes place when wearing this garment, and for obvious reasons it is not desirable to wear it in the breakfast-room.

PORTIA.—The quotation is from Romeo and Juliet, Act II.

"What's in a name? That which we call a rose,

By any other name would smell as sweet."

The lines you send are only very stiff prose, they are not blank verse, although they have no rhymes. The lines of blank verse are in length "heroic," but the breaks must be diversified, and fall in special places, not to speak of the grand, original, and beautiful ideas and similes with which it should abound.

Q. V. X. will find all she desires to know respecting the flowering broom, or planta genista, in the new series of articles now in course of publication in our magazine, entitled "Historical Flowers."

MARJORIE M.—The verse obliterated in your copy of Horace Smith's "Address to the Mummy in Belzoni's Exhibition" is as follows:—

"Why should this worthless tegument endure,

If its undying guest be lost for ever?

Oh, yet we keep the soul embalmed and pure
In living virtue, that when but must sever,
Although corruption may our frame consume,
The immortal spirit in the skies may bloom."

We sympathise much with you in reference to your eyes. You should avoid using them at night.

A PATIENT.—You express yourself very strangely. We never heard of "flesh meat repeating on any one." But if you find meat difficult of digestion, dine early, masticate more effectually, and eat less of it, taking care to make up for any loss by substituting very nutritive things.

"ESSIE MONTROSIE."—Of course, anyone may wear mittens as an economy at an evening entertainment, but gloves are more usually seen.

HESTER GRAHAM.—You should apply to the secretary of the Girls' Friendly Society, 3, Victoria Mansions, Westminster, S.W., which has homes and clubs. There is also the Girls' Club Union, 59, Greek Street, Soho Square, W.; secretary, the Hon. Maud Stanley, 40, Dover Street, W.

E. C. CHUBB.—Miss Maxfield is the hon. secretary of an Early Rising Association, 82, Edith Grove, West Brompton, W. The hours for rising are: 7 during two of the terms, and 7.30 during the others. Enclose a stamped envelope for the rules.

"THE BELLE OF BELLE."—The final "s" is mute in the French phrase à propos (used to signify "to the purpose," with reference to the point in question"), and mal à propos means "ill-timed." The words ma chère are likewise French, and should be pronounced as if spelt (in English) "share." The word fiancé is masculine and fiancée feminine. Apply the ink to the hat first of all, and then the gum as a varnish.

LALLAH.—The surnames of the aristocracy, titled and untitled, were originally acquired from their lands, for the most part. In all European countries it was so, and this is demonstrated by the prefix von in the Austrian and German empires, and the de in France, answering to the English "of," which has not been (at least in later times) considered a necessary adjunct. Their names were also descriptive epithets in certain instances. The rest of the world, people well-to-do and respectable in position, though not of the highest classes of the nobility (for it was not necessary to have a title to be of that highest class), were without any surnames until long afterwards, and then their names usually indicated their trade or other occupation, or were taken by choice from the animal, vegetable, and mineral worlds, from articles, attributes, colours, etc. The surnames of the aristocracy did not become regularly settled and hereditary much before the Conquest.

DOLLIE says she is "suffering most horribly with swollen faces." How many has she got? Whoever may be the possessor of such a "Dollie" is fortunate in its having more than one face, as they soon suffer from an eye out, and a flattened nose, not to say a "swollen face." The latter should be covered and kept warm, and the teeth should be examined, as the cause may be found amongst them. As to the "faces" being "too fat," Dollie need not feel alarmed, as it is a good fault, if such at all. She may get thin, lose the roundness of youth, and so age in her looks only too soon. Do not take anything to reduce your cheeks, or you will grow to look like a wizened apple, creased and wrinkled in the skin.

PATIENCE.—The disposal of "fancy work" is not any easy undertaking. To do it satisfactorily it ought to be on a business basis; that is, you should engage to work "to order" for some firm. There are shops in Oxford and Regent Streets, where you should take specimens of your work, and obtain orders. You might perhaps effect a sale of what you have done, either direct to the firm, or by giving them a commission on the sale and leaving them on view at the shop for that purpose.

MRS. EMILY MACLAINE (Tasmania).—We thank you for your very gratifying as well as interesting letter, and the pretty seed specimens. We are also obliged to you for your kind offer of sending us shells and shell necklaces. We regret that we are unable to enter into a plan for negotiations with a firm for millinery and dressmaking on your account. The little feathered seeds enclosed in your letter are very pretty. We agree with you that a poor lady might do well in going out to Clarke Island, Bass's Straits, Tasmania; and more especially if, with her vocation as an instructress to gentlemen settlers' children, she could work as an artist and dispose of her paintings. If you required such a person, you should advertise.

CHRYSANTHEMUM.—Our indexes will show you that we have many times given directions for cleaning ivory. Rub it with slightly moistened whiteness. Oatmeal in water is "good for the skin," because it softens the water.

POLLY.—You should refer to "Whitaker's Almanack" for each year successively for all information respecting the hoods distinguishing graduates, and all holders of higher degrees in the several universities.

OUR BESSIE.—We have answered your question so very often, that we cannot inflict a lengthy repetition on other readers, but refer you to our Lord's own explanation: see St. Mark iii. 30. There were some who attributed the miracles wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost to that of devils, with which they accused our blessed Lord with being possessed. You do not believe that: therefore you are not guilty of that blasphemy.

"JOHN."—Your verses have some merit, but we doubt their proving of any value to you as saleable. You write a very good hand, and we regret that we cannot encourage the hopes you have formed.

ERICA.—The term "genius" denotes original intuitive perceptions and creative powers of mind, whereas great "talent" may be exhibited in comprehending and then adapting such discoveries and such creations of greater and more original intellects for personal use. Talent may build a splendid structure on the foundation laid by genius, without which such a structure could not have been raised. The man who composes an opera, for instance, shows genius (more or less great), while the man who assists in "rendering it" may show much talent, as, likewise, the painter of a fine historical picture may show the faculty of genius, while the copyist may exhibit great talent in its reproduction.

IN DIX MALO.—We do not believe that all "Marriages are made in heaven," as many of those who believe in Christian doctrines are "unequally yoked together with unbelievers," contrary to the Divine Will.

LILY.—We have already given directions for preserving the colour of pressed flowers. See vol. ix., page 799.

"NERVOUS GIRL." is thanked for her letter and little paper on the subject of the love of God. It is a subject on which we cannot reflect too much, and one of which, when trials come, we are apt to lose sight.

STUDENT OF DEAF MUTE HISTORY.—We think you would do well to extend your studies to that of Dr. Richardson's "Diseases of Modern Life," which demonstrates that notwithstanding the necessity for close intermarriages and its frequently experienced ill effects, "The average duration of the life of the Jew is 48 years and nine months, and of the Christian 36 years and eleven months." You had better read from pages 19 to 25 inclusive. We regret to hear that so many cases of deafness exist amongst them.

L. L. D.—The lines you send for criticism are not poetry; they are neither "blank verse" nor metrical rhymed verses. It is a sad case when the occupants or visitors of "a drawing-room" are not "women of education;" when educated they are, nevertheless, fitted for any place or position.

TULIP.—The injunction given by St. James can be followed in the obvious sense of it, without always doing so to the letter. We must never speak positively in reference to the future, for the present moment alone is ours. You may say "We hope to do so and so," or "God willing," ever bearing in mind that our heavenly Father's good providence must order all the events of our lives, however trifling they may seem, and we must let others see that we do so.

FIDDLER.—The catgut harpstrings we have always kept well oiled, and shut up in a tin box made for the purpose. They should not be kept in a very hot, dry place. We advise you to consult a violin-maker as to the care of your own, and of the strings.

SENTIMENTAL SEVENTEEN.—We have ceased to give any further advice respecting the complexion, or any matters connected with the toilet. See the articles by "Medicus" on these questions. Spots on the face are results arising from respectively different causes, viz., indigestion, poor blood, improper diet, indulgence in many sweet things producing acidity. Consult your own doctor; no stranger who had never seen you could prescribe for you, nor pronounce an opinion on your case.

A GIRL AND AN ORCHARD The Four Seasons.

'Twas morn & Spring time when I stood
And gazed upon an Orchard fair,
A girl ran through the blossom'd wood
Ran laughing, & without a care;
All lovely, and as white and red.
As the sweet blossoms overhead.

The years like days have dawned, died.
One summer noon I lay at rest Within that orchard's shade, beside
A woman whose sweet care had blest
And comforted a wounded life;
My tender, patient, loving wife.

Time passeth. In mine orchard, graced
With comely fruit its boughs upon,
One autumn afternoon there paced
A mother counselling her son;
With finger raised she taught the lad
And all in sober garments clad.

But hush! 'Tis wintry evening now
And loving years have laid their snows
Upon that woman's peaceful brow.
Through the white orchard, see, she goes;
She hears a cry of welcome "Come!"
Where is she going? Going home.

O girls, who grow to women! learn
A lesson from my orchard trees,
The blossoms into fruits must turn,
Love, Duty, tender patience these.
Then shall your winter snows show fair
As the white blossoms now ye wear.

PART III.

FRUIT OF DISCONTENT.

LUCY was wondering how she should spend her Christmas holidays—how best utilise them for the good of her mother and the poor—when a sharp knock at the door announced the postman. There were only two deliveries of letters at Merriton, one at 8 a.m. and the other at 8 p.m., and this was the evening post. She answered the imperative summons, and "A letter for you, miss," greeted her from the postman, whom she knew well. With a "Thank you, Burford," she carried the letter to the sitting-room, where her mother sat expectant, hoping for news of her boy.

"Is it from Fred?" she exclaimed, breathless.

"No, mother. I don't know the hand; but it is from London," replied Lucy.

She opened the envelope and glanced through the short letter it contained. It was from a stranger, and dated from a London hospital. It ran as follows:—

"Your brother is dangerously ill. He is in this hospital, and wishes to see you. Come at once if possible. I am one of the medical staff.

"Yours truly,

"JAMES PEARSON."

Lucy tried to conceal this from her mother for a few moments, but Mrs. Oliver, seeing that she turned pale, snatched the letter from her hand.

"My poor Fred! My darling boy!" cried the mother, with a sudden movement of terror. "Perhaps he is dying!"

"The doctor only says 'dangerously ill,' mother," returned Lucy, restraining her own agitation. "I will go by the first train to-morrow morning. There is none to-night. You must try to keep up, dear mother. God has never yet forsaken us, and He never will."

Mrs. Oliver had seen too much sorrow in her time to give way, and nerved herself to send Lucy off at once for Martin. He was just closing the shop, and came at once, followed soon after by old Gripson. There was grief and consternation amongst them, but no uncertainty. Lucy must go. Martin wished to accompany her, but she negatived this. There was no money to spare, and although Gripson offered to help, the independent spirit of the Olivers rejected his liberality.

All rights reserved.

"HAIL, SLEET, WIND, RAIN WERE SWEEPING THE STREETS."

"Thank you a thousand times, Mr. Gripson," said Lucy. "When poor Fred went away he put five pounds into my hands for mother. I kept them for him, feeling that the time would come when he would want them. It has come, and I will use the gift for travelling expenses, and perhaps for bringing him home."

"You'll want more than five pounds, Lucy," said old Gripson.

"Then I'll write and ask you, Mr. Gripson. Martin must stop at home with mother. I'll summon him if necessary."

"You've never been in London in your life, child," said old Gripson.

"But I always longed to go," returned Lucy, forcing a smile.

"We must pack up at once," said Mrs. Oliver, rising: she was always equal to an emergency.

"I mean to go with her," said old Gripson, decidedly. "I must look after the spring fashions, though 'tis rather early, and I have business to transact. We don't want to lose another child, and send good money after bad, and we won't if I can help it. Good-night; I'll be ready for the train."

This astonishing proposal overcame the family trio, who scarcely knew what to think of it. Lucy doubted whether Mr. Gripson's company would be either pleasant or advantageous, but her mother and Martin were thankful that she should have a protector. They had no time to discuss it, for the preparations for the journey had to be made.

"The carpet bag will hold all I shall want," said Lucy. "I shall not need two dresses, and I can carry most of my wardrobe on my back."

Very fervent were the prayers offered for Fred that night, and there was little sleep in the small house on the hill.

Gripson did not change his mind, but met Lucy at the station the following morning. It was a frosty day, and under better circumstances Lucy would greatly have rejoiced in a trip to London. But as it was, she thought the journey would never come to an end. Her companion was very kind, and did his best to enliven her; but old Gripson was rather caustic than amusing, and she was disinclined for his accustomed criticisms on the world and its inhabitants. She was unhappy and very cold when they reached Paddington about three o'clock, and had soon reason to be thankful that she had a protector. What could she have done, she thought, amid that bewildering crowd of people and cabs that filled platform and outer space? She had scarcely time to wonder at the huge glass dome surmounting the station, before Gripson hurried her into a cab, and took her to a lodging and boarding house at some distance, where he was accustomed to stay when he visited London.

"Let me go at once to the hospital," was all she could say, but he insisted on her "eating and getting warm first." She did her best to please him, and then, at her earnest entreaty, he walked with her to the hospital, which was in the West-end, and not very far from the lodging.

She was awestruck at the out-patients in waiting in the large hall, and overwhelmed when told that it was after hours and not visiting day, and that she could not see her brother. Old Gripson asked for Dr. Pearson, and showed his letter to the secretary. He despatched a messenger, and bade them be seated. At any other time sympathetic Lucy would have been sadly pained by the women and children, biding their turn, in the hall; but at the moment she could think of nothing but Fred. The interval before the messenger returned seemed to her interminable, but in something less than half an hour she noticed a gentleman speaking to the secretary, who pointed at her and Gripson. It was Dr. Pearson. He went to Lucy and asked if she were Miss Oliver. On receiving her answer he said he would take her at once to her brother.

"Don't mention me, Lucy. Take a cab and come straight back to the lodging. You have the address," said Gripson.

Lucy followed Dr. Pearson up several flights of stone stairs to a long ward full of beds, tenanted by male patients. He answered her breathless inquiries as they mounted, and preceding her to one of the beds, said in a whisper to the patient, "Here she is," and left her at the side of her brother.

Was this Fred? Could it be the young man from whom she parted about nine months ago, and who was then in the plenitude of health, spirits, and hope? He was so wan and thin that she almost failed to recognise him.

"Lucy! dear Lucy!" he murmured, and burst into tears.

She restrained herself with difficulty, bent over him, kissed him tenderly, and then sat down and took his hand.

"The doctor says you are better, and will get well—if—if—you can forget the last few months. You will, now I am here, dear. Mother sends her love, and so does Martin, and everybody," she breathed.

"I will try, but it is all a—a—failure," he said, hoarsely.

"Never mind. What does it matter, since you are better, and will soon be well, please God?" she returned, as cheerfully as she could.

Would he, could he get better? she asked herself as she held his emaciated hand, and looked at his hollow face. The doctor had told her not to excite him, and to say everything that was hopeful in as short a space as possible, since she must not remain long.

"I may come again to-morrow and stay some time," she said, as a nurse brought a cup of beef tea, which he drank.

"That is well!" ejaculated the nurse. "He has not swallowed so much at a time before, and nourishment is what he most needs now."

He smiled faintly and muttered the words, "Lucy—hope."

Lucy had indeed brought hope with her. He had lost that angel visitant in an attack of brain fever, consequent on disappointment and distress, and he was about to grasp her again. The doctor had timed Lucy's stay, and the short half-hour was over all too soon. She perceived that he could not bear conversation, and that he closed his eyes as if about to sleep, but the slight pressure of his hand assured her that he was conscious of her presence. When, at a sign from the nurse, she rose to go, he entreated her to stay, and the look of intense pain that followed her when she left him haunted her all that night.

Outside the ward she gave vent to her restrained feelings, and began to sob.

A hand was laid on her arm, and a kind voice asked what was the matter. She turned and saw a sweet face, and met the gentle eyes of a lady who was about to enter the ward she had left.

"My brother, my poor brother!" she sobbed.

"What is his name?" asked the lady.

"Fred Oliver. I think he is dying," she replied.

"I know him. The worst is over. I have a friend in the ward, and while visiting him have spoken to your brother," said the lady, hurrying on.

Lucy descended the stairs, comforted by this encounter, and on her way was met by Dr. Pearson, who told her to come again on the morrow. Seeing her sad and perplexed look, he accompanied her to the hall, hailed a cab for her, and told the man where to drive her. Shaking hands kindly with her, he bade her be of good cheer, since he hoped for the best.

She found Mr. Gripson anxiously awaiting her. He had engaged a small private sitting-room, and had ordered tea and "something hot," as he expressed it.

"I daresay this illness will bring Fred to his senses," he said. "Nothing like a sick bed to think over one's sins. I've had a turn or two, and speak from experience."

He was not a comforting companion, and poor Lucy was glad to go to bed and think over the rapid events of the day.

The following morning she was punctual to the moment at the hospital. Fred had had a relapse during the night, and was very weak, and his mind wandering when she went to him. He did not recognise her at first, and when he did he became much excited. She succeeded in calming him, and he poured forth a strange medley of questions and self-reproaches, which she knew not how to stem. The one concerned his friends at Merriton, the other his life in London. She gathered from the latter that he had not been much more persevering in his efforts after a livelihood in town than he had been in the country, and had soon intermitted the labours needed to cultivate his voice, because he got no immediate return. He had managed to exist by singing at music-halls and inferior places, not believing that a long probation is needed for public success, whatever the goal to be reached.

When Lucy left the hospital a storm was raging without. Hail, sleet, wind, rain were sweeping the streets. It had been fine when she left the lodging, and she brought no umbrella. Half blinded, she managed to reach the lamp-stand in the centre of the cross streets, and not knowing what else to do, resolved to turn back and remain in the hospital till the violence of the storm was over. She turned back in effect, and saw a lady struggling with the tempest much as she was. It was the same, she believed, that had spoken to her on the hospital stairs. Both of them made for the door; Lucy reached the pavement first, and encountered a woman who was struggling along beneath an umbrella. She was insufficiently clad, and looked so feeble that, despite the sleet and the wind, Lucy instinctively paused as if to assist her. She was, in short, almost blown away, and the old umbrella in danger of being turned inside out. Lucy helped her to right it, and in doing so the poor, feeble soul laid her hand on Lucy's arm for support. The girl looked more narrowly at the stranger, and the glance was returned. Fresh, rosy, healthy Lucy was a great contrast to the pale, thin, ill-clad woman; but they were suddenly attracted to one another so forcibly that neither wind nor hail sufficed to unbind the sudden spell.

"Is it—is it—Lucy?" at length stammered the woman, and sank exhausted near the hospital door.

"Ruth!" almost shrieked Lucy, as she tried to raise her.

A third woman came up. It was the lady whom Lucy had seen struggling with the storm. They managed to get the fainting form within the hospital; then aid was instantaneous.

"Is it—is it Lucy?" stammered the seeming stranger, when she came to herself, on a couch in a neighbouring room.

"Are you my sister Ruth?" asked Lucy, kneeling at her side.

"I am," was the reply, and a scene ensued which melted the heart of the lady and the attendants who stood by.

Surely God was in that tempest. But for it and the forced return of Lucy to the hospital, the sisters had not met. "Man's necessity is God's opportunity."

"You must come with me, Ruth; it is not far," said Lucy.

"Let me drive you. My carriage is close by," said the lady, and without waiting for permission, faced the storm again, and hailed a coachman well enveloped in a warm rug.

Ruth made no opposition, and in a few minutes the sisters were side by side in a roomy brougham, their benefactress opposite them. She explained that she was one of the hospital visitors, and on the ladies' committee. They were at the lodging in less than a quarter of an hour. Lucy thanked the lady, whose name was Everard, very gratefully, and took Ruth to her wee parlour. Mr. Gripson was out, but Lucy ministered to her sister.

"Why did you not write home, Ruth?"

she asked, when that sister revived somewhat.

"William would not let me, because we were so unfortunate. We have not been long in England, and he is looking for employment. He said I should write home as soon as he gets something to do. He could not face his father after what had passed, until he was earning something. Mr. Gripson is so severe, and was so angry at his leaving home."

The sitting-room door had opened during this conversation, and Mr. Gripson had entered unperceived.

"That is how you talk of me behind my back," he said in an aggrieved tone, for the voices of the sisters were alike, and he thought Lucy was speaking.

"Mr. Gripson, I have found Ruth," she said, going to meet him.

"Ruth! Then where is William?" cried the old man, staggering towards his daughter-in-law.

"He and the children are in London," said Ruth, timidly.

"Then why didn't you let me know?" he exclaimed, his voice trembling and his hands shaking, as he kissed her, and sank down on the couch at her side. "Let us go to him at once. No time to lose. Is he as starved as you? Are the children famished? Come along, both of you. We haven't come to London in vain, Lucy."

He hurried downstairs, went for a cab, and they were soon braving the storm again.

(To be concluded.)

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

VIRGIN ENTHRONED WITH INFANT AND SAINTS,
A.D. 1461.

THE NEW ROOMS—FLORENTINE SCHOOL.

OUT of the bustle of omnibuses and cabs, out of the glare of shops, and the pressure of the crowds of busy people who push past as if every one of them was hurrying to catch the last train for somewhere; out of all this noise, and bustle, and confusion, we ascend the steps in Trafalgar Square, and turn into the building which now indeed deserves the name of the English National Gallery.

The new rooms were completed and thrown open to the public about a year ago. The entrance is all newly arranged, and is simple and imposing. As the doors close behind us we ascend the handsome central staircase between marble columns, the lovely faint green, known as cipollino, alternating with the full rich red of the African marble. The floor under our feet is a delicate mosaic tessellated pavement.

On our right hand, and on our left, we pass the ascent to the English school, the Early on the one side, and the contemporaneous on the other. But we turn not to the right hand or the left, for those rooms we know of old.

Over the central doorway which now faces us, and which leads into the ancient Italian schools, are mottoes and bronze medallion portraits of the "Majores" (the "Great Ones") who have gone before; Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael and Correggio on the outer side; Rubens, Titian, and Rembrandt within.

We enter through this central door, and find ourselves at once in the first of the five new rooms. Out of the busy life of this nineteenth century of to-day we have plunged into the life of Florence of the fifteenth century. The feeling at the first moment is as if we had entered a church. The contrast between the perfect silence after the roar of sound without, and the company of saints and angels that surround us on all sides within; the solemn colours, the grave and devotional expression on the pictured faces, you involuntarily catch your breath, and say, "Where am I?" feeling like the old monk Lippo Lippi, in Browning's poem, as if you were caught up unexpectedly in your everyday clothes into a higher region, "into a pure company, a celestial presence."

The pictures are now carefully arranged into schools and centuries, but from the centre of the first of the new rooms you can give a glance at the "progress of the ages," and standing in the centre of the first room, the room that represents the zenith of the great Florentine school, you can see facing you, in the far distance, that lovely altarpiece painted in Florence by the young Raphael, the one known as the "Ansidei Madonna"; you can see also, through the vista of rooms on your right, the latest development of art, that of portraiture, represented by the noble portrait of Charles I. on horseback, painted by Vandyke; while on your left, the quaint and curious figures that meet your gaze represent the stiff Early Italian schools, the cradle out of which arose the Renaissance, or re-birth, of art in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Thus, in each room as you enter it, you find a central picture which may be said to give the keynote to the room.

"Two London Bachelors" in these very pages not long ago, when on their travels in Northern Italy, made the apt observation that it really is a question whether "a picture gallery is not altogether an artistic monstrosity," and a thing which had no existence when art was in its most healthy condition.

This strikes one here as most true. A picture gallery, where these sacred subjects predominate, is from a moral point of view evidently "an artistic monstrosity." The pictures do not owe their existence to love of art, but primarily to religion, and only secondarily to art.

Early Italian art as here represented consists of small pictures, painted for the most part in tempera, not oil colours, and intended either as altarpieces or at least to decorate some part of a church. They are always devotional, always intended for churches or for private chapels; if for the central altar of an important church, necessarily representing some chief article of faith; if for a private chapel, some legend, with various favourite patron saints added; and often some member of the donor's family is honoured by being included in the celestial company.

No. 727. Here, on our left as we enter, is a grand piece of solemn colour—the first picture that arrests our attention, "A Trinità," by Francesco di Pesello, a Florentine, his date 1422 to 1457; a very text to preach from, and to explain visibly to the most ignorant of worshippers the doctrine of the Trinity. It represents God the Father as a grand and dignified old man, magnificently robed in black and crimson, the pope's tiara on His head; He is seated on clouds in mid air, a stern, nay severe, expression on His features; He represents the stern Judge rather than the loving Father of mankind. He supports the crucified Saviour on His cross for the world's adoration. Rays of golden light appear to emanate from the head of the Almighty Father, while the Dove of the Holy Spirit hovers over the crucified Son. Cherubim and seraphim surround the throne, winged heads, painted, some entirely red, some entirely black. The cherubim—the angels who love—are red; the seraphim—the angels of knowledge—are black. Presumably they were blue when originally painted, for blue is the typical colour of knowledge, as red is of love; and the blue may have changed with time into black. The base of the crucifix rests firmly on the gloomy, dark brown earth. The picture was evidently intended for a high altar, and doors must have closed over it, the doors doubtless painted with some subject of inferior importance of an illustrative kind.

This picture is most grand and impressive. How many worshippers in those early days it may have strengthened in faith and confirmed in doctrine! Yet were such a subject to be attempted in our own time by a modern artist, we should surely deem it a profane attempt to paint the unpaintable. It is a curious fact that, in the revival of art in Italy in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, no subject was considered too grand, or too solemn, for representation on the walls of the churches. The horrors of hell, the awful terrors of the Last Judgment were constantly depicted, presumably in the hope of terrifying sinners into repentance and the paths of righteousness.

Passing a "Virgin and Child" (No. 593), by Lorenzo de Credi, and "The Procession to Calvary" (No. 1143), by Ghirlandajo, a later painter, we turn on the left into the small side room devoted to the infant efforts of the Early Florentine and its cotemporary, the Early Sieneſe ſchool.

ROOM II.—EARLY FLORENTINE AND SIENESE SCHOOLS.

The firſt thing that ſtrikes us in this room is the very dazzling appearance produced by the gold backgrounds which predominate. While the ſecond is, how painfully crude and ugly are moſt of the forms painted on the gold. The gold background is always a mark of very early art, as it was the firſt and ſimpleſt way of obtaining effect.

This is not the earlieſt room in point of date in the Gallery. The very earlieſt—that one containing the Margheritone and Cimabue and others of the thirteenth century—is not one of the new rooms; we will therefore willingly content ourſelves with beginning at the ſecond ſtage of the revival of painting, inſtead of the firſt.*

Duccio of Buoninſegna, of Sienna (born 1260), was of about the ſame date as Cimabue (born 1240) of Florence, called by Vaſari, “the father of modern painting.” Duccio was to the ſchool of Sienna what Cimabue was to the ſchool of Florence. Like him, Duccio painted a picture which was carried in public proceſſion with muſic and rejoicing to its deſtination. There, in the cathedral of Sienna, it is ſtill preſerved with other of his works.

Like Cimabue’s picture, it represents that moſt popular of all ſubjects, the Virgin and Child. On it is a devout inſcription in Latin, a prayer for “reſt for Siena” and “life for Duccio” himſelf.

There are two ſpecimens of his powers in this room, beſides one in the earlier room, where we can compare the two maſters. In juſtice to Duccio, I muſt mention that the unpleasant green hue in the fleſh is not the colour that the artiſt left, but the reſult of over cleaning, which has deſtroyed the final glazings.

It is a pity that catalogues of galleries of early maſters do not tell us the name of the church or chapel where the picture originally hung, to what ſaint it was dedicated, and to what monaſtic order the church belonged; for there was always ſome ſpecial meaning attached to the arrangement of the various figures; a ſaint might occupy the principal poſition in one picture, and take a ſecondary one in another. A whole hiſtory would be implied in the ſelection of the different ſaints, and the poſition they relatively occupied. Fra Lippo Lippi—in a poem by Robert Browning, which well illuſtrates my meaning—is ſuppoſed thus to deſcribe a picture he intends painting for the nuns of the Convent St. Ambroſe. The painter is made to ſay:—

“I ſhall paint
God in the miſt, Madonna and her Babe, Ringed by a bowery,
flowery angel-brood,
Lilies and veſtments and white faces. . . .
And then in front, of courſe, a ſaint or two—Saint John, becauſe he ſaves the Florentines;
Saint Ambroſe, who puts down in black and white

The convent’s friends and gives them a long day;

And Job, I muſt have him there paſt miſtake,

The man of Uz (and Us without the z, Painters, who need his patience).”

No. 283. We give a ſmall copy of a picture very much in this ſtyle by Benozzo Gozzoli, quite a typical ſpecimen. It is one of the very few in this room of early painters in which the background is not entirely gilt. As, however, not only the Virgin and Child, but all the angels and ſaints by whom ſhe is ſurrounded, have large gilt aureoles behind their heads, the picture has a very bright and gay appearance. St. John the Baptist ſtands next to the Virgin on her right, therefore we ſhould conclude that the picture muſt be for ſome church in Florence—even if we did not know the fact—as St. John the Baptist is the patron ſaint of Florence, an honour which St. Zenobius, who ſtands beſide him, ſhares. We infer that the church belonged to the Franciſcan monks from the poſition of St. Francis himſelf in the foreground, (his name is inſcribed on his aureole); ſome birds near him refer to his ſermons and loving addreſſes to “his fellow-creatures, the birds.” St. Jerome occupies the other place of honour in the foreground. He is identified by the cardinal’s hat, which lies on the ground beſide him.* St. Francis and St. Jerome are aſſociated together as being the two chief patron ſaints of penitents.

St. Peter holds the Gospels, and ſupports the Virgin on her left, as the Baptist does on her right; while St. Dominic, who invented the roſary in honour of the Virgin, is the companion figure to St. Zenobius on the ſecond plane of importance. The angels ſtand in pairs behind the Virgin and Child. Even the trees in the landscape, behind, ſtand in two pairs behind the two angels.

The contract for this picture is ſtill in exiſtence—dated October 23rd, 1461. It ſtipulates, among other things, that the Virgin ſhall be made ſimilarly in mode, form, and ornaments to the Virgin in Fra Angelico’s picture of the Virgin, enthroned over the high altar of San Mark, Florence.

* The cardinal’s hat is one of the conventional attributes by which we recognise St. Jerome in pictures. As cardinal prieſts were not ordained for three centuries after the death of St. Jerome (in 420), this is a diſtinct anachroniſm.

All this tends to ſhow how completely the artiſt was at this date working in fetters, and that a picture was looked upon by the church, not as a work of art, but ſimply as a means of inſtruction in doctrine and tradition for the unlearned populace, for whom pictures in thoſe days took the place of books. Immediately below is a picture of the Reſurrection, by that ſaintly and loving man, Fra Angelico, as an artiſt, perhaps, ſomewhat over-eſtimated.

No. 663. “Chriſt ſurrounded by angels in the miſt of the bleſſed. The patriarchs, the prophets, the ſaints, and the martyrs, etc.” Upwards of two hundred and fifty ſmall figures, all finiſhed like the moſt exquisite miniatures. This work was painted for an altarpiece for the Church of St. Dominic at Fieſole. We know at once by the prominence given to the black and white dreſs of the Dominican monks that the church for which it was deſtined belonged to that order. Indeed, there are apparently no other monks in Angelico’s heaven excepting Dominicans. Fra Angelico had entered that order himſelf in the year 1407, at the age of twenty, full of religious enthuſiaſm. His pictures are deeply imbued with that ſpirit; but it muſt be confeſſed that in power of drawing and artiſtic arrangement he was nearly a generation behind his time.

No. 1,155. A picture by another early Sieneſe artiſt, Matteo di Giovanni, “The Aſſumption of the Virgin,” tells its own ſtory to anyone who has ever heard the legend. The painting is dry and hard, but the figures of the angels who dance and ſing are full of delightful movement. “At the lower part of the picture is represented St. Thomas by the empty tomb of the Virgin. According to the legend, Chriſt removed to heaven the body of His Mother, and Thomas alone of the apoſtles reſuſed to believe. In pity for his want of faith the Virgin let fall her girdle as ſhe aſcended into heaven. This legend was a frequent ſubject with the old painters.”

No. 909. The Gallery contains a fine example by a diſtinguiſhed fellow-townſman of the latter, namely, Benvenuto of Siena. In the compartments on either ſide are figures of St. Peter and St. Nicholas of Bari. The latter ſeems to have been an extremely popular ſaint in this part of Italy.

* See ante, “National Gallery,” vol. v., p. 557.

I think, in order to really enjoy these early pictures, one of two things is necessary: either an especial interest in the progress and development of the art of painting, or else a familiarity with the legends and histories of the saints and martyrs of the early Christian Church.

At the time that these pictures were painted these stories were made really popular by the monks, and thus people, both high and low, were thoroughly familiar with them. But with most of us now it is not so. Consequently many of the pictures require long elaborate explanations, to be either interesting or even intelligible. They are to us like words in a dictionary instead of the familiar ideas of everyday life. But how different is our feeling from that of the spectators in any churches where they were originally placed! Let us fancy ourselves standing before this very picture, and questioning a peasant of Siena of the fifteenth century about it.

"Yes," he would say, "there is our Lord and His blessed Mother in glory. There is St. Peter, with the keys that unlock the gates of heaven and hell on their right."

And the bishop on their left, who is he? "St. Nicholas of Bari," we ask as we read his name. And the peasant would exclaim at our ignorance—"What, not know St. Nicholas of Bari? The good bishop who protects our sailors at sea, who helps all peaceable citizens and poor, hard-working men." "Not know kind St. Nicholas!" would echo all the little children; "why, it is he who fills our caps and stockings full of nice things on his day, if we be good, and learn our lessons well." "Not know our good St. Nicholas!" the girls would add; "why, it is he who helps to find us husbands! See, there are the three golden balls with which he dowered the three poor destitute maidens! They are embroidered on his robe and repeated at the top of his crozier, and other decorations tell also of his various charitable actions."

Great as is the contrast between the busy life of commerce outside the National Gallery and the subdued religious aspect of these pictures of sacred subjects inside, the noise without, and the quiet as of another world within, it is as nothing compared to the contrast presented to the citizens between these pictures, in their original sacred shrines, and the scenes of riot and bloodshed so often witnessed in the streets or their cities.

"The prevailing note of Siena and the Sienese," says Professor Symonds,* "seems to be a soft and tranquil grace; yet this people had one of the stormiest and maddest of Italian histories. They were passionate in love and hate, vehement in their popular amusements, almost frantic in their political conduct of affairs. The luxury for which Dante blamed them, the levity De Comines noticed in their government, found counterpoise in more than usual piety and fervour. St. Bernardino, the great preacher and peacemaker of the Middle Ages; St. Catherine, the worthiest of all women to be canonised; the blessed Colombini, who founded the order of the Brothers of the Poor in Christ; the blessed Bernardo, who founded that of Monte Oliveto—were all Sienese. Few cities have given four such saints to modern Christendom." Accordingly we find that the Sienese generally introduce one or other of these their national saints (so to speak) into their pictures.

We leave the Sienese Room and cross over to the corresponding room on the opposite side.

ROOM III.

Here we come upon the unexpected sight of a spirited battlepiece. It is the earliest picture in the Gallery not of a religious subject, and, of course, not intended to be placed in a church. No. 583. "The Battle of Sant' Egidio," 1416, by Paul Uccello (born 1396).

For a moment we get a glimpse of the life of the Italian cities outside of the religious life. The incessant fighting that went on—fighting in the streets, fighting in the gardens; fighting between one city and another; fighting between the nobles and the people, fighting for supremacy between one family of nobles with another, till many a one had bitter cause to say with Mercutio, in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet—

"A plague on both your houses!"

The catalogue informs us that at this battle "Carlo Malatesta, Lord of Rimini, and his nephew, Galeazzo, were taken prisoners by Braccio di Montone, Lord of Perugia." We learn also from Vasari, that "in Gualfonda, on a terrace of the garden which formerly belonged to the Bartolini family, are four battlepieces (painted) on wood by Uccello's hand. The horses and armed men in splendid vestments of the fashion of that day are very beautiful, and among the figures are portraits of Carlo Malatesta, Lord of Rimini," and many others, all great captains of those times.

A doubt has been thrown by a French critic as to whether the picture represents that particular battle, from the fact that the banner is not that of the Malatesta family. Anyhow we have before us the representation of such a fight as constantly went on in Siena, or Perugia, or any of the towns of North and Central Italy in those feverish and excitable times.

The scene is laid in a garden or shrubbery, with rose trees and pomegranates in the background. The nobles fight on horseback, their vizors down; their followers—in the distance—fight on foot. Of those on horseback, only two faces are uncovered. One is that of a stalwart man in middle life, wearing a gorgeous turban on his head; the other belongs to a fair and comely lad, with a shock of yellow hair, of perhaps fourteen years of age. Both are evidently portraits of persons belonging to some distinguished family. One point of interest to be noted in this picture is the introduction of horses; the first time that such a thing was attempted in Italian art, and in very spirited action too. Another is the endeavour, then new to art also, to represent figures and objects in perspective. Staves and weapons lie about on the ground, and even the figure of a dead knight is violently foreshortened into the picture, with his heels towards us.

It is all rather odd, but we are bound to consider that this Paul Uccello must have been a man of great originality and daring to have attacked so many difficulties that no artist had even thought of attempting before; nay, even to have represented a kind of subject until now considered not suitable for painting.

No. 916. Another picture not painted for church requirements hangs immediately above Uccello's battlepiece. It is by Sandro Botticelli (circa 1446 to 1510), "Venus pelted with roses by Cupids"; also probably a first and daring attempt to carry art into another field. But this artist lived fifty years later than Uccello. A very stiff and pudding-faced lady, with frigid little corkscrew curls, and a tight, white muslin dress, which seems to stick to her thin, lank person, does not appear to us to realise "Italian Aphrodite, beautiful, Fresh as the foam, new bathed in Paphian wells."

But stiffness and ugliness had not been hitherto counted as drawbacks in painting the saints, whether male or female. And this subject, old in classic art, was a quite new subject to Christian artists. They had yet to learn something from the old Greeks, for as

Mr. Ruskin wisely puts it, "The one studied the spirit, the other the flesh, and the best art must study both." Those great patrons of culture—the Medici of Florence—had done much for the progress of art, not only by the splendid collections they had made of ancient statues and works of art, but also by throwing them freely open to public inspection. "Lorenzo de' Medici had even appropriated the gardens of his palace to the establishment of a school or academy for the study of the antique, and furnished the different buildings and avenues with statues, busts, and other pieces of ancient workmanship."*

Leonardo da Vinci, Torregiano, Michael Angelo, and a host of later men owe their artistic education to this garden of the Medici, and to the sight of these treasures Botticelli must have owed the idea of conceiving such a subject as that to which I have just referred, as well as that other more celebrated picture of his, "The Birth of Venus," in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence.

The so-called "Venus de' Medici" he could not have seen, for that noted statue was not yet recovered from the dust under which it had lain buried so many centuries.†

No. 1126. Another picture by Botticelli demands our attention, for to it attaches a most curious history. It has been called "The Heretic Picture," a name it scarcely deserves, as it was painted to illustrate a poem rather than to teach a doctrine. The subject is the "Assumption of the Virgin." Heaven is open before us, the Saviour sits enthroned above. He receives the risen soul of the Madonna who kneels before Him, while He raises His hand in benediction. The redeemed are gathered round the throne in three circles.

"In orbs

Of circuit inexpressible they stood,

Orb within orb."

There are the blessed spirits—denizens of heaven—the great multitude whom no man can number, forming the mystic "Rose of Dawn" which Dante saw in his vision revolving in radiant rings round the throne of God.

"Vidi nostra Citto quanto la gira."

"In that white-robed company angels bear a leading part—angels with fair human faces and tender human love in their eyes—who mingle with the rescued souls and tune their golden lyres, or look up to God in the rapture of heavenly beatitude." These three circles fill the upper, the celestial, part of the picture. In the first circle below the throne are angels, saints, and martyrs, secure of their heavenly crown, while in the lowest circle, mingled with the angels, are many who seem rather to be anxious candidates for their place above.

Below, on earth, the twelve Apostles look into the deserted grave to find—with astonishment—that it is filled with white, sweet-scented lilies. The town of Florence and the hills of Fiesole, as they looked when Botticelli saw them, appear in the distance, and the donor of the picture and his wife kneel on either side in reverent contemplation of the scene.

I think I ought to tell the story of how this picture came to be painted. A certain Professor Palmieri, a scholar and an official of high rank in Florence, desired his friend, Sandro Botticelli, the artist, to illustrate a poem which he had written (in emulation of Dante) called "La Citta di Vita"—the City of Life—in other words, Heaven. Palmieri destined this picture for the altarpiece of his family chapel.

Thus runs the story: "While Palmieri was living at Pescia, as governor of the Val di Nievole, in the year of grace 1451, on the 1st of August he dreamed a dream. His dead friend, Cipriano Rucellai, appeared to him and invited him to the yearly festival celebrated on that day in a monastery called Il Paradiso, near Florence. In his dream, Cipriano conversed with him about the state of spirits after death, where they dwell, and how they are permitted to revisit their living friends. Cipriano, moreover, in this dream, revealed to him weighty matters concerning the human soul. He told him how God first made angels in innumerable hosts. These angels separated into three companies: the one band followed Lucifer when he rebelled; the second held with Michael, and abode firm in their allegiance; the third decided neither for God nor for the devil. After Lucifer's defeat those angels of the third class were relegated to the Elysian fields, which extend to all points over the extreme periphery of the highest sphere, and God, wishing to give them a final chance of determining for good or evil, ordained that they should, one by one, be sent to dwell in human bodies. There, attended by a good and a bad spirit, they had the choice of lives, and after their death in the body, were to be drafted into the trains of Lucifer or Michael, according to their conduct."

Having communicated this extraordinary doctrine, Cipriano vanished from his friend's sight with these words upon his lips:—

"Misero ad noi quanto mal segno

Rizaron quelli che si fer ribelli,

Per porre in aquilon loco piu degno."

This quaint old Italian rhyme apparently intends to denounce "woe on those who, when with better opportunity but badly led, again rank themselves with the rebels."

Following the example of Dante, who chose Virgil for his guide upon the beginning of his visionary journey, Palmieri took the Sibyl on his, and in other ways followed generally the manner and the plan of Dante's great work, the "Divina Commedia."

The picture, as a painting, is a splendid piece of colour, with the brown landscape at base, the rich garments, purple, and green, and scarlet, of the lower rank of aspirants for heaven, and the golden, star-spangled firmament in which the heavenly host is placed. "The varied attitudes and movement about the picture were the admiration of all

Florence. Palmieri, too, was pleased, since as we see he caused his own portrait and that of his wife, Niccolosia di Agnola di Serragli, to be introduced into the foreground, kneeling and worshipping in the far corners on either side of the tomb. Nor did anyone in Florence dare to utter a word against the altarpiece when it was placed in the chapel for which destined, in the Church of St. Pietro Maggiore.

"But a few years after the death of Palmieri, this idea of his that the neutral angels should have become mortal, and been allowed to inhabit the souls of men, was considered heretical. The defence of Palmieri's friends that this was a poetic dream, and in no wise intended for theological instruction or dogma, was disallowed. The picture was condemned, and a veil was hung over it, so that it should not lead men's minds astray.

"It was finally removed from its position as an altarpiece and sold to foreigners, to whom, as a gallery picture, its curious story adds to its already great value as a fine work of art, full of noble colour, fine drawing, and varied and tender expression."

THE HUSBAND'S REVENGE.

A countryman and his wife, having had some words, the man protested he would be revenged.

"Why, what will you do?" said his wife.

"Do!" replied he; "why, I'll go into the orchard and drown myself in the pond."

"And a good riddance," cried his wife. "I'll go with you to see it done."

They both went, and the man ran to the pond as though he would jump in, but stopped when he came to the side of it. His wife upbraided him, called him coward, rogue, and villain, and said she knew he had not the courage to do it. The man took another run, and stopped short as before, and his wife continued to abuse him.

At length he told her he really could not summon up courage to drown himself, but that if she would tie his hands behind him, which would prevent his saving his life by swimming, and push him in, she might, for he was weary of her ill temper.

"I'll do that readily enough," said she.

So she tied his hands behind him and he went to the side of the pond.

"Now," said the man, take a long run and push me a good way into the water, that I may be the sooner out of my misery."

"Never fear, you rogue," replied his wife, "I'll push you far enough in, I warrant you."

The man stood close by the pond with his back towards her, and she went to some distance from him and then came running towards him, that she might push him in with the more violence. But just as she came to him he stepped aside, and she fell flounce into the water.

"Help me out! Help me out!" she cried.

"I can't help you out," said he, "for you have tied my hands."

And so that scolding wife was drowned.

A NEAT SPEECH.

"You forget that I am an old woman," said a lady, in reply to the compliments of a gentleman who had known her in the loveliness of her youth.

"Madam," he said, "when our eyes are dazzled by a diamond it never occurs to us to ask a mineralogist for its history."

NOT SO BAD AS IT LOOKS.—As I approach the fog it seems at some little distance to be almost solid gloom, such as would shut out every glimpse of light and totally imprison me in obscurity. But when I enter it I find myself agreeably mistaken, and the mist much thinner than it appeared. Such is the case respecting the sufferings of life; they are not when experienced so dreadful as a timorous imagination surmised.—Hervey.

A NOBLE REPLY.—When Henry IV. of France was importuned to allow the prosecution of a person who had written a libel on him, he magnanimously replied, "I cannot in conscience do any harm to a man who tells truth, although it may be unpalatable."

DO IT WELL.—Whatever you do, do it well. The slighting of a task because it is apparently unimportant leads to habitual neglect, so that men and women degenerate insensibly into bad workers.

They were waiting for the minister. Said the groom to the bride:—

"No, George," said the bride; "you stay right where you are."

THE DUTCH SERVANT MAID.—The Dutch keep their houses exceedingly neat and clean. Speaking of this, Sir William Temple tells the following anecdote. A magistrate going to visit the mistress of a house in Amsterdam, knocked at the door, and a strapping North Holland lass came and opened it. He asked whether her mistress was at home; she said "yes," and with that he offered to go in. The young woman, however, noticing that his shoes were not very clean, took him by both arms, threw him upon her back, carried him across two rooms, set him down at the bottom of the stairs, pulled off his shoes, put him on a pair of slippers that stood there—all without uttering a word—and when she had done, she told him that he might go to her mistress who was in a room above.

FOR THE KING'S SAKE

FOUNDED ON FACT.

By LADY MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Bessie's Sacrifice."

CHAPTER III.

THE days of betrothal passed swiftly away, all too swiftly to Eleanor. She lived in a kind of feverish dream, her one heart's cry ever, "What will Robbie say? what will he think? How shall I tell him? how will he bear it?"

She could not communicate with her brother; his exile made it too difficult; sometimes he was with his royal master, sometimes away from him, whereabouts she seldom knew. In those days her cheeks grew white and thin, and her eyes yet larger and more wistful.

When her betrothed came daily, as was his wont, to pace with her up and down the formal paths of the old garden, he found her always just the same, listening gently to all he had to say, answering with quiet monosyllables, but never eager, never enthusiastic. It seemed as if she cared for nothing that he told her; that his interests, the pursuits of his life, were alike indifferent to her. Deeply disappointed, he would even go to Mistress Betty for consolation. Skilled in superficial forms of comfort, she generally succeeded in encouraging him, and leading him into belief in her platitudes, her assurances that a modest maiden was unwilling to betray interest or feeling before her marriage—that bashfulness, youth, and inexperience all were in his way.

Once Mistress Betty could not help an impatient movement after he had left her; she stamped her foot and exclaimed—them! Can he not see that her heart is breaking before his eyes, and cease to hope for aught else! Tut, tut! if it is the modesty of youth I preach to him, and that he thus deplures; if it please him not, why not have proposed to me? It would have done as well, and saved that look in poor Nell's great eyes. Alas! youth—she will lose all the bloom of youth with this fretting. I look almost as young as she does, I protest!"

Once did Eleanor rouse up to keen interest. Sir Michael, thinking to entertain the old Squire, for whom he had always much tender consideration, brought over from his home some letters that he had received from Yorkshire, telling the story of a bold highway robbery which had just taken place there. He was reading the letter aloud, when he suddenly perceived the change in the face of his betrothed; it was glowing, transformed; her eyes sparkled, her lips parted.

"The story interests you," he said, turning towards her smilingly.

"Indifferently well," she answered. "We, that is Robbie and I, have always taken a romantic interest in the gentlemen of the road."

"Perhaps even at some time you have been acquainted with someone among them?" said Sir Michael, smiling. "Though but few of the heroes who took purses and cut throats in the name of an old cause are alive now."

"Few left," said the old Squire, with a long low sigh. "The leaves rot and fall from the trees, no sap, no hope, and the Blackbird has ceased to sing."

"Father," said Eleanor, soothingly, "winter and summer pass, spring comes at last."

"But the Blackbird——" he paused in confusion.

Sir Michael did not know the secret names by which the Stuart king was known among his adherents; but he saw the crimson flush rise in Eleanor's pale face, and turned aside his head.

"The birds migrate till the bad season is over and gone," he said, kindly.

The old Squire looked at him wistfully. "Aye, aye," he said; "and when the summer comes the King will have his own again."

"Whisht, whisht, brother!" cried Mistress Betty, "let us hear what good Sir Michael has to tell us about the robbery in the North. Pray, was it successful?"

"I will read."

Sir Michael resumed his reading.

"You will doubtless have heard of our adventures here. The country lies in panic. Stories are afloat which grow in dimensions daily. Now we hear of a gigantic leader with a gun that never misses, and an arm of iron, mounted on a horse fleet as the wind and as untiring; now we hear that he has a hundred men at his back; now but one, and he a hunchback, three-eyed, and seven-toed! Our gentleman can make himself invisible as Perseus, and some may well doubt whether it be not that redoubtable hero in propria persona, seeing that it must be presumed that he carries a head of Medusa with him to account for the fact that all are petrified who behold him, and those that survive are scarce able to stammer out the story. It is difficult indeed to winnow the grain from the chaff, but such as it is I offer you the tale. Know then that this popular hero is neither more nor less than Captain Bob, famous for having robbed the King's mail on the Dover road last year, and rescued the two gentlemen who were about to expiate their sin on Tyburn Hill as spies of him that is over the water."

"I remember, I remember," cried the old Squire; "it was a gallant thing; a boat was in readiness; they reached France in safety. A mightily well-planned rescue. So Captain Bob is back again?"

"He must be a brave fellow," said Sir Michael, "Would that his bravery could be transferred to more legitimate channels. His Majesty—I should rather say, our country—can ill spare such gallant fellows."

Eleanor was looking at him now with strange eyes, a gleam of gratitude in them for his kindly words.

He read on.

"I and my wife, Lady Dulcibella, have felt considerable interest in this same Captain Bob, and his mysterious summons to stand and deliver in the King's name. You know, my friend, that I am as staunch a Whig as yourself, but my Lady hath leanings, kindly yearnings, towards the side of misfortune that you may perceive in many gentle dames."

"Yes, yes," said Mistress Betty, and Sir Michael smiled. Those few words in an old friend's letter seemed to lessen the distance between himself and his betrothed. Might he not also regard her opinions with a like indulgence as testifying to the amiable weakness of her sex? knowing not that there was an unfathomable gulf between the sentiment of a kind-hearted woman of fashion, and the passion of a life whose loyalty was planted in blood and fed on self-sacrifice.

"Lady Dulcibella is an accomplished and most charming woman," he said. "I hope some day, Eleanor, she will be your friend."

"That will not be difficult," said Eleanor softly.

He resumed

"And so her leanings carried her into making a very hero of Captain Bob. He is a most gentle highwayman, courteous, handsome, and so romantic, that the ladies whom he robbed of all their jewels and all their gold on Thursday last, he has robbed also of their hearts—a more serious misdemeanour, I take it. The last carriage that he stopped was my Lord Marston's travelling coach, containing Lady Marston, Lady Jane her sister, and pretty Mistress Grant, who carried with her jewels worth eight thousand pounds. Lady Marston makes but small moan over hers, which (in a whisper be it said) are suspected of having come from Paris, not Golconda; but Mistress Grant lamented in such wise that the coach rang with her cries, till the gallant Captain with his hand on the valise said the few magical words which accompany his every deed of violence—"In the King's name." Lady Marston curtly demanded, "Which king?" and Lord Marston could only sit still and devour his rage, bound, knotted, and gagged as he was. Captain Bob bowed low and answered, "There is but one king, God bless him!" Mistress Grant stopped her shrieks, as she expressed it afterwards, "seeing that here was no common robbery, but an affair of political complexion." To cut a long story short, Captain Bob has again evaded justice; every effort has been made. This robbery was of more importance than others; valuable papers have fallen into his hands. Poor Captain Bob! The ladies tell of his tall figure, slender as if he were yet very young, of his wonderful strength and activity, of a glimpse from under a black mask of large brown eyes, fierce with excitement, but softening into pathos and beauty. Probably all this is imaginary, but still one is childish enough to murmur, "'Tis a pity." It is a dangerous game, and I for one shall heave a sigh when the rope is safely round his neck. There is but one end to such things."

"You look pale, my Eleanor," exclaimed Sir Michael. "This tale has startled you."

"Only the last words," she answered. "The very thought of Tyburn is a terror to me;" and she shuddered.

Sir Michael gave a sigh of deep compassion for her; he would so fain have sheltered her from all the pain and sorrow of this world, and the helplessness of human love and care smote him.

He folded up the letter. "I am glad this reckless fellow escaped," he said. "Would that he would retire to France and stay there, and cease to tempt Providence. Here it is every honest man's bounden duty to pursue him. To be at war with the world of law and order is a forlorn hope."

Sir Michael lingered on, talking to the old Squire, and Eleanor slipped away with haggard eyes and clasped hands to her own room.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK DRESSES VEAL, LAMB, AND PORK.

VEAL is consumed more in France than in England; it can be cooked in so very many ways that most cooks like it. The following recipes for braising and stewing veal are equally applicable to the fillet, loin, neck, or oyster.

Braised Fillet of Veal.—Cover the bottom of a braising-pan with pieces of bacon, onions, carrots, sweet herbs, and parsley; put the veal on these, add a little broth; put more bacon on the top of the veal with pepper, salt, and a little nutmeg; let the broth reduce until it is glaze, then add more broth until half the meat is in it; put the lid on the pan, and cook slowly for two hours and a half, basting occasionally with the gravy. When done remove the bacon from the top of the veal and glaze it, or brown it by putting fresh hot cinders in the lid, drain, and put on a dish. Strain and skim the gravy, add one or two tablespoonfuls of white wine; serve part of the gravy with the meat, and reserve the remainder to mix with the garniture.

Braised veal can be served with a garniture of stewed endive, green peas, spinach, sorrel, cucumbers, young carrots, small onions, mushrooms, or à la financière.

Fricandeau de Veau à l'Oseille (fricandeau of veal with sorrel).—The fricandeau is a national dish throughout France; it is cut from the side of the fillet to which the fat is attached; but as the calf is cut up differently, we often have to substitute some other part. Very good fricandeaus can be made from the best end of the neck or loin. The meat is taken carefully from the top of the bones, laid on a board, and the skin removed with one cut of a sharp knife so as to leave the meat evenly cut underneath; then beat it well so as to make it somewhat flat; lard it neatly all over the top where the skin has been removed. Put into a braising-pan some chopped carrots, onions, sweet herbs, parsley, peppercorns, two cloves, trimmings of bacon and the veal bones; place the fricandeau on these, with the larding uppermost, sprinkle with salt, add half a pint of broth, pour a tablespoonful of oiled butter over the veal; cover the stewpan, put it over the fire, and let the broth reduce to glaze; then add good broth nearly to the top of the meat, boil up quickly for five minutes, put a piece of buttered paper over the top of the meat; put the cover on (with hot cinders in the lid), and let the fricandeau cook very slowly for an hour and a half, basting it from time to time with the gravy. When done remove the paper, and let the meat brown at the top; drain it, and place it on a dish. Strain and skim the gravy, and pour part of it on the dish with the veal. Prepare a purée of sorrel or spinach with some of the gravy, and send to table at the same time, but in a separate dish. Sometimes the fricandeau is laid on the purée, or a purée of tomatoes and a little flour is added to the gravy that is served round the veal, and it is then served as "fricandeau sauce tomate."

Roast Veal.—Take a piece of the fillet or best end of the neck of veal, lard it, then put it in a marinade of oil, vinegar, herbs, parsley, spices, a few slices of onion, and salt; leave it four or five hours, turning it now and then; next drain it, and cover it with buttered paper, and roast, basting it often with the marinade and butter. When just done remove the paper, let the meat brown; take the gravy out of the dripping-pan, strain it, add a little flour to it, boil for five minutes; skim if too fat, and add a little lemon-juice or some capers and serve over the meat, or serve the veal with tomato sauce.

Roast Veal à l'Estragon (with tarragon).—Run branches of tarragon into a neck of veal with a larding needle, and proceed as above.

Veau à la Provençale.—Put two or three ounces of olive oil in a stewpan, according to the size of the piece of veal to be cooked; add to it sweet herbs, parsley, pepper, salt, and a few slices of onion; put in the veal (a piece of the loin or neck cooks very well this way); cook very slowly, turning now and then. When done serve on "sauce Italienne."

Poitrine de Veau Farcie (stuffed breast of veal).—Take a breast of veal, chop off the ends of the bones, raise the skin and put in any forcemeat that is liked; sew the edge to keep in the stuffing, braise the veal, and serve it with stewed vegetables or roots.

Poitrine de Veau Glacée.—Take a breast of veal, raise the skin; make a forcemeat with sweetbreads, button mushrooms, the white meat from poultry or remains of game, finely chopped bacon, parsley, shallots, salt, pepper, nutmeg, and yolks of two raw eggs; fill the opening with this, sew up the skin, and put the veal in a stewpan with a slice of bacon, about a pint of good broth, and half a bottle of white wine; stew gently for about two hours. When done take out the meat and brush it over with glaze; garnish it with stewed lambs' sweetbreads, button mushrooms, or vegetables. Reduce the gravy a little, skim, and serve with the meat.

Poitrine de Veau Farcie aux Fines Herbes.—Prepare as above. Chop finely spinach, sorrel, asparagus, artichoke bottoms, a few sweet herbs, and a little pickled pork; season moderately; soak some crumb of bread in milk, mix with the other ingredients; put into the veal, sew up and cook in the stockpot. When done serve with white or mushroom sauce over it.

Poitrine de Veau à l'Etuée.—Cut two pounds of breast of veal in square pieces; put them in a stewpan with a little butter, cook the meat a few minutes without browning it; season with pepper and salt; skin and add twenty small onions; scrape twenty small carrots, and put them in, also sweet herbs, parsley, a clove of garlic with the skin on, and four good-sized tomatoes cut in pieces; leave over the fire one minute, then put the lid on, and let all cook very slowly at the side of the stove for an hour and a half or two hours, without adding any broth or water, the moisture from the tomatoes being sufficient. When done remove the garlic and herbs. Arrange the meat and vegetables on a dish, and serve.

Poitrine de Veau aux Petits Pois (breast of veal with green peas).—Cut a breast of veal in pieces; scald it: drain it, then put it in a stewpan with a piece of butter; sift in a tablespoonful of flour, turn it about for a few minutes; add a bunch of sweet herbs, parsley, and a few green onions; moisten with broth or water, season, and stew gently for an hour; remove the herbs; add some green peas and a tablespoonful of white sugar; cover closely, and let the whole simmer gently three-quarters of an hour; skim the fat off. Mix three yolks of eggs with a little cream or milk, add to the stew, stir, and let it thicken, but not boil; serve immediately. The recipes for breast of veal serve equally well for other parts.

Epaule de Veau à la Bourgeoise (shoulder of veal à la bourgeoise).—Put the veal in a stewpan with one or two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, salt, pepper, herbs, parsley, clove of garlic, cut carrots, and onions; add some broth and a little white sugar; cook three hours; skim and strain the gravy; serve the meat surrounded with the vegetables and gravy.

Epaule en Galantine (galantine of shoulder of veal).—Bone and trim a shoulder of veal. Chop very finely a pound of bacon with a pound of lean veal, spread this over the underside of the shoulder—which should be previously flattened as much as possible on a board with the underside uppermost—put on the chopped meat some strips of bacon and of pickled tongue, make a thin omelet, with seasoning and spinach juice in it, spread this over the forcemeat, add more strips of bacon, some sliced truffles, pistachio kernels and seasoning; then roll up the veal carefully lengthways, sew it firmly in a piece of fine linen, and braise it with bacon rinds, the bones out of the meat, a calf's foot, salt, pepper, sweet herbs, parsley, bay-leaf, onions, carrots, cloves, a lump of sugar, glass of white wine and sufficient water; keep it cooking for three hours, take the meat out, let it get cold in the cloth. Skim, strain, and then clarify the gravy with whites of eggs. When cold remove the cloth and garnish the galantine with the jelly.

Veal à la Gelée.—Take a piece of fillet of veal, lard it, and put it in a stewpan with carrots, onions, herbs, parsley, salt, pepper, and a knuckle of veal bone; add some broth or water and a little white sugar, simmer until the veal is tender, then take it out, skim, and strain the gravy, clarify it with whites of eggs, let it get cold. Serve the veal garnished with the jelly.

Salade de Veau.—Take some cold veal, remove the brown edges and cut it into slices, then into squares, all the same size; pour oil and vinegar over them, and leave for two hours; then arrange on a dish. Put in a bowl one tablespoonful of mustard and six anchovies boned and pounded, moisten with oil and vinegar, add parsley, capers, chopped gherkins, and salt if required; put over the veal, and serve. May be garnished with raw tomatoes, hard-boiled eggs or quarters of cabbage lettuces.

Blanquette de Veau.—Cut some cold veal in thin slices, put them in a stewpan with a little butter, put the lid on, and let them get warm at the side of the stove. Boil some button mushrooms, five or six small onions, and some sweet herbs in a little broth or water, with sufficient salt. When they are done sift some flour in with the veal, add the liquor from the mushrooms, etc., put over the fire for a few minutes, but do not let it boil, then take out the slices of meat, arrange them on a dish and keep them hot. Let the broth boil fast for a minute, then draw from the fire and add the yolks of two eggs; let the sauce thicken but not boil, add the mushrooms and small onions, pour over the veal, and serve.

Veau à la Marengo.—Take two pounds of veal cutlet, cut it in moderate-sized square pieces, put them in a stewpan with oil or butter, let them remain until they are pale coloured; season, add sweet herbs and parsley; take a quarter of a pound of pickled pork, scald it, cut it in pieces, and put it in with the veal. Have ready twenty or thirty small onions that have been baked a pale brown, put them in, cover the stewpan, and finish cooking the meat by a slow fire without adding any broth or water. When done take out the meat and arrange it on a dish, remove the herbs, skim half the fat off the gravy, and add three or four tablespoonfuls of tomato sauce and a little cayenne pepper, boil up, and serve at once with the veal.

Tête de Veau au Naturel (boiled calf's head).—Take a calf's head that has been properly prepared and cleaned, put it into a saucepan of boiling water, and cook it half an hour; then take it out and put it in cold water, remove the jawbones and the frontal bone, and replace the meat in its proper position, rub the skin of the head all over with a cut lemon, then sew it up in a white cloth. Mix a handful of flour into a saucepanful of water, add onions, sweet herbs, bay-leaf, parsley, parsnip, a little butter or slice of bacon fat, salt, and whole peppers; put the head into this, taking care that the water covers it entirely. As soon as it simmers skim it; when the head is cooked enough (it takes from three hours to three hours and a half) take it out, remove the cloth, and serve with sauce in a tureen. It is served with vinaigrette, maître d'hôtel, or other sauce. With the head cooked in this way one prepares Tête à la financière, à la tortue, à la poulette, à la Sainte-Menche, en matelotte, etc.

Tête de Veau Farcie.—Bone the head, take out the brains and the tongue, add to them a piece of lean veal, some beef suet, sweet herbs, parsley, and seasoning; chop the whole, then pound in a mortar; add sufficient yolks of eggs to bind the forcemeat; put into the head and make it assume its old form as nearly as possible; sew it where necessary; fasten it in a cloth and put it in a saucepan with sufficient broth to cover it; a little white wine, two carrots, two onions, two parsnips, herbs, parsley, bay-leaf, clove, salt, pepper, a lemon cut in two and the pips removed; let it boil three hours; remove the cloth, put the head on a dish, and keep it hot. Skim and put a portion of the contents of the saucepan through a sieve; add six chopped anchovies and some mushrooms; boil fast for a few minutes to reduce it a little; before serving add the juice of a lemon and some chopped gherkins. Sometimes a ragout of boned partridges, pigeons, quails, or ortolans is used with the forcemeat. The ragout is not chopped, but laid in with the stuffing. An old fowl chopped and pounded with some ham or bacon and some suet also makes a good forcemeat, and can be used instead of the veal.

Tête de Veau en Tortue.—Put in a stewpan half stock and half sauce espagnole; boil with a glass of Madeira or Marsala (or a good brown gravy and the wine); add a small quantity of cayenne pepper, some sweetbreads and brains, which have been first boiled, then cut in pieces and cooked in butter, mushrooms, sliced truffles, the cooked calf's head cut in pieces, some quenelles poached, olives that have been stoned by passing a knife round like a screw so as to leave them entire, and some gherkins cut into balls, let the whole get quite hot, but not boil, then serve, dishing up carefully so as not to break the quenelles; add some yolks of hard-boiled eggs, pour the gravy over them. Calf's tongue can be cooked by the same recipes as ox tongue.

Roast Liver.—Take a calf's liver, lard it all over, roll it in pepper and salt, and roast it in the oven with a buttered paper over it; baste it often while it is cooking with piquante sauce. It takes about an hour to cook; when done skim and strain the sauce and serve the liver on it. The liver is sometimes laid in a marinade of oil, herbs, etc., for two hours before it is cooked.

Foie à l'Estouffade.—Lard and roast in the same way, but when done add a poivrade to the gravy from the liver.

Foie Sauté.—Cut the liver in slices, beat it and fry it in butter over a quick fire; pepper and salt it; fry also some thin slices of bread; place the slices of liver and of bread alternately on the dish, then put some "sauce Italienne" and a little white wine in the frying-pan; with a wooden spoon detach the brown from the bottom of the pan and make the sauce hot, take from the fire and stir in a small piece of fresh butter; pour over the liver, and serve.

Foie à l'Echalote.—Cut the liver in slices, beat it slightly, flour and season it. Melt some butter in a stewpan and sprinkle in some chopped shallots; put the pieces of liver on the shallots, and cook over a quick fire for about eight minutes, turning them as they cook. Then put on a dish; add the juice of a lemon and some chopped parsley to the butter in the stewpan; stir, pour over the liver, and serve.

LAMB.

Lambs are eaten younger in France than we use them in England, so if a joint is required for a number—three quarters of a lamb, that is to say, the saddle and two legs—are often cooked without being divided, but a quarter is the more usual joint.

Quartier d'Agneau Rôti et Pané.—Take a fore-quarter of lamb, because that is the most delicate, lard it with finely-cut pieces of bacon on the skin side; brush the underside over with oiled butter, then cover it with bread-crumbs, envelope the meat in buttered paper, and roast. When nearly done take off the paper, sprinkle with salt, and put more bread-crumbs over the under side, with a little chopped parsley. Then put the meat to a good fire again; brown. Serve with the juice of a lemon or a few drops of vinegar over it.

Or Roast Quarter of Lamb.—Cover the lamb from the shoulder to the edge of the ribs with pieces of bacon; roast before the fire; when done, put it on a dish, separate the shoulder, and put under it on the breast a large lump of maître d'hôtel butter.

Lamb à la Périgord.—Trim a loin of lamb; put it in a stewpan with some olive oil, parsley, scallion, pepper and salt, and some chopped mushrooms; cook for about five minutes, then take the meat out and cover the bottom of the stewpan with slices of bacon; on these put one or two pieces of roast veal and some slices of truffles, then the lamb and some more bacon, with slices of lemon over; cover and leave to cook for a quarter of an hour, then add a little broth, and cook slowly until the meat is done. Serve with the bacon and truffles round. Put a little good stock into the stewpan; after you have taken out the lamb, bacon, and truffles, boil up, skim and strain. Serve as sauce for the meat.

Epaule d'Agneau en Ballon.—Bone a shoulder of lamb, and roll it up as nearly into a ball as you can, and tie it together; scald it, then lard it all over with fine strips of bacon; roast it at a brisk fire; when done remove the skin, drain and glaze it. Serve on a purée or with a sauce.

Epaule aux Truffes.—Bone a shoulder of lamb, lard it on the outside with bacon and inside with truffles; braise it slowly, and serve with its own gravy reduced, skimmed, and strained.

Galantine d'Epaule d'Agneau (galantine of shoulder of lamb).—Bone a shoulder of lamb, cut the meat from the under side of the bone and some towards the knuckle (to leave it rather thin), chop this meat with double its weight of sausage meat, then pound it in a mortar with pepper and salt; mix with it a little cooked lean ham cut in dice and some small pieces of truffles; put this in the shoulder, roll it up to make it a long shape, sew it in a piece of linen, and tie securely; then stew in broth for an hour and a half, or braise; when done put under a weight. When cold remove the cloth and string, and serve with savoury jelly.

Lamb and Peas.—Cut some lamb in pieces, fry it in a stewpan in butter, with half a dozen young onions; when it is a nice colour add a pint (or more, according to the quantity of meat) of young peas, a little salt, and a bunch of parsley. Cover the stewpan, and cook gently, shake the stewpan now and then, and add one or two tablespoonfuls of hot water. Before serving remove the parsley and add a little butter and flour mixed together; season if necessary, let the flour cook a few minutes, and serve.

Poitrines d'Agneau aux Asperges (breast of lamb and asparagus).—Take two breasts of lamb, boil them in the stock-pot, remove the bones; put the meat on a dish with another over it, with weights on it, let it get cold, then cut the breasts across into pieces, pointed at one end and round at the other; season them, egg and breadcrumb, and brown on both sides in butter in a stewpan; arrange them on a dish like a crown, and put in the centre asparagus points that have been blanched and cooked in butter, and then had white sauce mixed with them. The pieces of breast may also be dipped in oil and breadcrumbs, then broiled and served with piquante sauce or vegetable garnish.

Ragoût d'Agneau au Riz (stewed lamb with rice).—Cut a neck of lamb in pieces, put it in a stewpan with butter, chopped onions, sweet herbs and parsley; brown slightly, season with salt and pepper, add broth or water enough to cover it, and cook twenty-five minutes; then for one quart of broth or water add a quarter of a pint of rice and four tablespoonfuls of tomato purée or sauce, keep the lid on, and stew; the rice and meat should be done at the same time.

Many people make a "store sauce" of tomatoes with a little garlic, vinegar, and a good many shallots in it. This sauce is not so suitable for this dish as a plain sauce or purée, such as is used for tomato soup.

PORK.

Fresh Pork Roasted.—Put the pork into a marinade of oil, salt, pepper, parsley, onions, bay-leaf and cloves; leave it a day, then roast it, basting it with the marinade.

Pork Rôti à la Sauge.—Prepare as above; then make cuts in the fat, and slip a sprig of fresh sage into each cut; put paper over and roast, basting with the marinade.

Longe de Porc à la Provençale (loin of pork à la provençale).—Chine a loin of pork, then make small notches between the bones, so that the meat may not draw up in cooking, sprinkle salt over it, and leave it for two hours. Wipe it, make some small incisions in the fat, and slip in strips of raw truffles and little pieces of garlic; cover with buttered paper, and roast. Skim and serve the gravy out of the dripping-pan with it.

Emincé de Porc aux Oignons.—Cut some cold pork in thin slices; chop four onions, fry them a light gold colour over a very slow fire, moisten with two or three tablespoonfuls of vinegar; let it nearly all evaporate, then add the slices of meat, season with salt and pepper, cook all together slowly for about ten minutes. Pour four tablespoonfuls of tomato sauce over them, and serve.

Paté de Porc (pork pie).—Take seven or eight thin pork chops, bone and beat them, season with pepper and salt. Sprinkle the bottom of a pie-dish with chopped onion and shallots, then put a layer of raw potatoes cut in slices, season, arrange the chops on the potatoes, sprinkle again with chopped onion and shallots, put another layer of sliced potatoes and more seasoning, then pour in a quarter of a pint of cold broth or gravy, cover the whole with piecrust, egg over, and bake in a moderate oven for an hour.

Pork Chops or Cutlets, trimmed, beaten, dipped in egg and breadcrumbs, with sweet herbs, pepper, salt, and a little spice, then grilled, are served with sauce Robert or gherkin sauce.

Blanquette de Porc is prepared in the same way as "Blanquette de Veau," only it must be more highly seasoned, and have a little sage added to it.

Pigs' Kidneys.—Cut them up and put them in a stewpan with butter, pepper, salt, and chopped parsley, shallots and mushrooms; cook five minutes, sift in some flour, stir for a minute or two, then add some white wine, and cook the kidneys slowly without letting them boil.

Sauissons de Ménage.—Take one pound of chopped pork, half cook it, and mix with it four pounds of potatoes that have been cooked (to be as dry as possible, then beaten to a paste), add salt and pepper, and knead well together; fill the skins with this in the usual way, wrap the sausages in a cloth for two or three days, then hang them in a current of air. They are boiled or broiled.

Pork Sausages.—Take two-thirds fat and one-third lean of fresh pork, chop it, but not too finely, add pepper, salt, and spice, put it into an earthenware stewpan, and let it stand on the stove for half an hour, then fill the skins in the usual way.

Boudins Blancs de Porc (white puddings).—Chop half a pound of lean and half a pound of fat pork, mix, then add pepper, salt, and a little spice, chop five minutes more, put in a basin, add one tablespoonful of finely-chopped onions, and two eggs, one after the other, and rather less than a quarter of a pint of cream or milk; put into sausage skins, tie up, and poach. Let them get cold, then broil over a clear fire, and serve.

Jambon à la Braise (braised ham).—Soak the ham from six to twelve hours, according to its age (if quite a new ham an hour or two is sufficient); put it into as small a stewpan as possible, with only just sufficient cold water (about three quarts or two quarts of water and one quart of white wine), a lump of sugar, an onion, sweet herbs, parsley, a little hay or clover, and a sprig of tarragon; let the water just boil, then draw to the side of the stove, and let it cook without boiling for from three to five hours, according to size; when the meat on the knuckle is soft it is done. When done, drain and remove the rind. Serve with good veal gravy and a dish of sorrel or spinach "au jus." If to be served cold only it should be left in the stewpan until nearly cold, then have the rind taken off. Cold it is served with jelly.

Roast Ham.—For this a ham must be new. Put it for twenty-four hours in a marinade of white wine, parsley, and sliced onions; roast it, basting often with the marinade; when it is three-quarters cooked remove the skin and cover the fat with fine breadcrumbs; finish roasting it. Have ready some good glaze, put it over the ham with a feather. Strain the marinade, and serve the ham on it.

Bayonne hams are so noted that I must give, for the benefit of those who have the convenience for preparing them, the recipe for pickling them.

Jambon de Bayonne.—Shorten the leg of pork as much as you can by fastening the knuckle with strong string to the thicker part, put a weight on it, or put it in a press for twenty-four hours, then rub it well all over with one part saltpetre and nine parts salt; put it under pressure again for three days. Put in a stewpan equal quantities of wine and water (sufficient to cover the ham in the pickling pan), add juniper-berries, bay-leaves, thyme, basil, sage, coriander seed, aniseed, pepper, and salt; boil until well flavoured, then pour off clear. Put the ham in a pan, pour the pickle over, sprinkle salt over the top and leave it eighteen or twenty days, then take it out, let it dry and smoke it with juniper-wood and aromatic plants; when smoked rub it over with wine lees, let it dry, then wrap it in paper and keep it in wood ashes.

OUR BESSIE.

CHAPTER XXIII.
MRS. SEFTON HAS ANOTHER VISITOR.

IT was impossible for Neville Sinclair to tear himself away from Brighton for another twenty-four hours, so he telegraphed to his mother, and made arrangements to take another day's holiday. He settled this before he slept that night, and presented himself at Glenyan Mansions long before the late breakfast was over. He and Bessie exchanged an amused glance as they shook hands, which was instantly detected by Edna, and she at once insisted on an explanation.

Mr. Sinclair laughed mischievously. "The fact is," he said, "Miss Lambert and I have met before this morning," which was the truth, for Bessie had encountered him coming out of his hotel, and they had spent a pleasant hour together talking about many things, and this conversation had raised Mr. Sinclair very much in Bessie's estimation, and her interest was warmly reciprocated.

"You have never had a friend I liked so well as I do Miss Lambert," he said, as he and Edna were walking together. "She is a genuine girl—absolutely true, and without any pretence or non-sense."

"Daisy is a dear little thing, and I am as fond of her as possible. I am so glad you like her, Neville," and Edna looked very pleased.

Mr. Sinclair left on the following morning, and in the afternoon Miss Shelton arrived. She was a pleasant-looking woman, with a tranquil face and silvery grey hair, and Bessie was prepossessed in her favour at once. She was evidently warmly attached to her old pupil, and the news of her reconciliation with her lover filled her with unbounded satisfaction, and her congratulations were very hearty.

"I have lived a great many years in the world," she said, "but I have never seen two better young men than Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Richard."

They were sitting round the fire in the twilight as Miss Shelton made this little speech; they had come in from their drive half an hour ago; the tea things had just been taken away, and Edna was sitting on the rug at Miss Shelton's feet.

"They are both admirable," she murmured, and this encomium on the absent Richard gratified Bessie.

"I don't think they are to be compared," observed Mrs. Sefton, rather superciliously. "My dear Miriam, Neville is infinitely superior. Richard has not got Neville's brains."

"Cleverness is not everything," replied Miss Shelton. "I respect Mr. Sinclair, and have the highest opinion of his abilities; but Mr. Richard has always been a favourite of mine. Very few people guess how much he has in him; but I found it out for myself a long time ago."

"You and Ritchie were always good friends, dear Miss Shelton. Hush! I hear someone in the corridor; it cannot be Neville come back," and Edna sprang up from her low seat with a heightened colour; but as the door opened her voice fell. "No, it is only Ritchie," in a disappointed tone.

"Whom were you expecting, Edna?" asked her brother, advancing towards the fireside circle. "Your tone does not sound very promising for me. Mother, you see I have taken you by surprise. Miss Shelton, I am delighted to see you again. How do you do, Miss Lambert?" with a swift glance in her direction.

Bessie greeted him quietly, and went back to her corner; the surprise was a very pleasant one for her. Richard looked well and more animated than usual.

"I thought we arranged that you were not to come until to-morrow week, Richard," observed Mrs. Sefton, in her usual cold manner; and it was evident that she was not pleased at her stepson's arrival. "I told you particularly Miss Shelton was coming this week."

"Oh yes, I knew Miss Shelton would be here; but Saturday week would not have suited me at all. I don't mean to put you out, mother. I have taken a room at the Grand Hotel; I can have my meals there too, if you like."

"Nonsense, Ritchie!" returned Edna, good-humouredly; "our dining-room is not so small as that. You may have your breakfast at your hotel, and then spend the rest of the day with us. Miss Shelton will be delighted to have you; she was singing your praises just now."

"I saw Neville in town this afternoon," observed Richard, with a significant glance at his sister. "'All's well that ends well,' eh, Edna? So the comedy of errors is played out."

"Come into the other room and I will tell you all about it," replied Edna, taking hold of his arm in a friendly fashion. "Mamma, I suppose there is enough dinner for Richard, but I don't mean to let him go away."

"Neither do I mean to go," added Richard, with a laugh, as he allowed himself to be led out of the room.

"How well he looks! older and nicer,

I think," observed Miss Shelton, as the young people left the room.

"Do you think so?" replied Mrs. Sefton, indifferently. "Richard is always terribly boorish in appearance; and as to his manners, nothing will polish them. But what can you expect, when he affects the company of farmers? Neville is worth a hundred of him," she continued, as she rose, with a discontented expression, to give some further orders.

Miss Shelton shook her head in a disapproving fashion.

"What a mistake," she said quietly, "always to undervalue that poor boy. I am glad to see Edna is improved in that respect. He is a great favourite of mine, Miss Lambert. I found out he had a kind heart when I was in trouble once. As Edna says, we are great friends."

"He is very nice," agreed Bessie, and then she went to her room to prepare for dinner. Yes, she was very glad he had come, though the sight of his familiar face had brought back the memory of that last sad day at The Grange. They had not met for seven months; how much had happened since then!

But when the evening was over, she was obliged to confess that it had somehow disappointed her. Richard had said very little to her. Miss Shelton had engrossed his conversation; he hardly looked in Bessie's direction. When dinner was over, and Edna went to the piano, he placed himself beside her; but he did not ask Bessie to sing. She sat at her work, and tried to think that she was enjoying herself, but she felt left out in the cold; she missed the old friendliness in Richard's manner; she wondered why he did not ask about her home. Could a few months have cooled his friendship? When she bade him good-night he hardly looked at her; he shook hands far more cordially with Miss Shelton.

Bessie felt chilled and depressed, for she was a faithful little soul, and was true to all her likes and dislikes; fickleness to her friends was not in her nature; if she liked a person, she liked him or her always.

"It is very strange, very disappointing. I think I would rather he had not come," she thought; "but perhaps he will be nicer to-morrow," and with this vague hope she fell asleep.

The next morning she was out at her usual time, and, as before, the crisp morning air seemed to dispel all uneasy thoughts; she felt brighter, more sanguine and cheerful than she had last night. Nature holds a store of comfort for those who love and seek her—she has all sorts of balmy messages to give them; a thousand mellow influences steal upon the jaded consciousness; hope is written legibly in the blue sky, the clear air, the sunshine; every flower, every leaf is a token of love; the birds sing.

and in spite of ourselves our hearts grow lighter.

"It must have been my fancy," thought Bessie; "I hope I am not growing self-conscious," and then she gave a little start of surprise, for surely she knew that brown tweed coat, and there was Richard coming to meet her; and it was with his old pleasant smile that he greeted her.

"What a lovely morning, Miss Lambert! I knew you would be out." He had expected her then. "Miss Shelton is an early riser too, but she never walks before breakfast. I wanted to find you alone, and to tell you that I was at Cliffe the day before yesterday."

"At Cliffe!" And Bessie raised her clear eyes to his with such intense surprise that Richard laughed a little nervously.

"I had some business there," he began awkwardly, "and I wanted to see your father. I saw them all," hesitating, "except your brother—he has gone back to Oxford; they were very well, and sent their love."

"And you saw mother?"

"Yes; what a nice woman she is! I liked her so much, and your father too; they were very kind, kinder than I expected. You are a little like your mother, at least I saw a sort of likeness. I never felt more at home anywhere."

"I am so glad," and Bessie did look glad. He was quite like himself this morning; she had got her friend back again. "Did father send me no other message?" she asked presently.

"No, I believe not; at least, I have no recollection of a message. Miss Lambert," and here Richard's manner was decidedly nervous, "don't you wonder what my business was at Cliffe?"

"Why, no," she said, so frankly and innocently that in spite of his nervousness Richard could not restrain a smile. "I suppose there was something you wanted."

"Yes, indeed," he replied promptly, for this remark helped him; "and I wanted it so much that I was obliged to apply to your father."

"Could father help you?" much astonished at this.

"He helped me a great deal. I should not be speaking to you now but for him. Miss Lambert—Bessie—can't you guess? It is so hard for me to bring it out. Can't you guess what it was I wanted from your father? I have never wanted anything so much in my life."

Richard's manner grew so earnest and imploring, that an idea of his meaning flashed across her with a suddenness that made her giddy, but she only said very gravely—

"I cannot understand unless you speak out."

"May I speak out then—may I tell you plainly what I want? It is yourself, Bessie," and in spite of his nervousness, Richard spoke a few forcible words, very eloquent from their intense earnestness. "I have cared for you all this time, but I would not obtrude myself on your trouble; I thought it better to wait."

"It was very kind, very thoughtful of you," replied Bessie in a low voice.

And then she added shyly, "This is all new to me. I never expected this, Mr. Sefton."

"I was afraid not, from your manner; but, Bessie, for my sake you will think of it now. We have been friends, and now you have grown necessary to my happiness. I have been very lonely all these years; I shall be lonelier than ever if you cannot bring yourself to love me."

His voice was so sad that the tears came to Bessie's eyes. She longed to comfort him; but how was she to be sure of her own mind?

"Will you give me a little time, a few hours, to think of it?" she said at last. "It will not be right to answer you now. Do my mother and father know about this?"

"Yes," he returned, eagerly, for her words filled him with hope; she had not repulsed him, and her manner, though confused, was as gentle as ever. "They quite approved. You see, I knew you so well that I would not have ventured to speak to you without their sanction."

"You were right," she said, softly; and then she looked at him in a beseeching way that made Richard say—

"You would like me to leave you alone for a little, would you not?"

"If you please—that is, if you do not mind."

"I will go then. But, Bessie, you will be here to-morrow morning?"

"Yes."

"I will be content with that promise then," and Richard lifted his hat and moved away, and Bessie went home.

Breakfast was ready when she arrived, and she took her place at once, and made an effort to talk as usual. Once Edna made a remark about Richard.

"I have promised to drive him over the downs," she said. "Bessie, Miss Shelton wants to do some shopping; do you mind taking charge of her for the morning?"

"Certainly not," replied Bessie, who would have given worlds to be quiet; but she could not refuse Edna. She was afraid, however, that Miss Shelton found her a stupid companion; every now and then her attention wandered; she was conscious that a grave decision, one that would affect her whole life, was hanging in the balance; she had promised Richard to think about it, but no such thought seemed possible.

"I am tiring you out, my dear," observed Miss Shelton at last, "and it must be nearly luncheon-time. I dare say Edna has returned from her drive."

Yes, Edna was standing in the window when they entered, but Richard was not with her.

"Ritchie said he would lunch at his hotel," she observed; "and he is going over to Lewes this afternoon, and may be late for dinner; and in that case he will have a chop somewhere, as he does not want us to wait for him."

"He will come in afterwards, I suppose," replied Miss Shelton; but Bessie said to herself that he would do no such thing. How thoughtful he was for her comfort! he was staying away purposely, that his presence might not confuse her; and Bessie felt grateful to him for the delicacy that shielded and spared her.

The afternoon was not much better than the morning. Edna carried off Miss Shelton to the Aquarium, and left Bessie to drive with her mother; and as Mrs. Sefton was very talkative and in excellent spirits, Bessie had to maintain her share of the conversation. They found visitors on their return, and Bessie had to pour out the tea, and help entertain them, as Edna was tired from her exertions. As she had predicted, Richard never made his appearance at all, although Miss Shelton and Edna both expected him, and indulged in wondering comments on his prolonged absence. Bessie found her position unbearable at last, and she made an excuse to retire early to her room. She gave a sigh of relief when she closed the door.

"At last I can think," she said to herself, as she drew her chair to the fire.

How was she to answer Richard to-morrow? But even as she asked herself the question, she knew she had her answer ready. True, he had taken her by surprise; she had never suspected that this was his meaning. Bessie's unconsciousness, her humble estimate of herself, had blinded her to the truth. She hardly knew herself how much he was to her, until his words had broken the spell; but now there was no room for doubt. She respected him; he had claimed her sympathy long ago, and now he had won her love.

"Oh, if only my Hatty knew!" were her last thoughts that night, after she had finished her thanksgiving for the new blessing that had come into her life; and though she was still tremulous and confused with happiness, she quieted herself with a few childlike prayers, and soon slept soundly.

Bessie felt a little nervous as she left the house the next morning, but she tried not to think of herself. Richard was waiting for her on the Parade. One glance at him banished her nervousness; he looked pale and anxious, as though he had not slept, but he made an effort to smile as he held out his hand.

"Is there any hope for me, Bessie?"

"Yes, Richard!" she said, simply, as she left her hand in his; and Richard needed no other answer.

It was a bright, peaceful hour that followed, as they walked side by side looking at the shining sea, and speaking of the dim future that lay before them.

"I was afraid you were too good for me, Bessie," Richard said, by-and-by, when he had exhausted his gratitude a little. "Sometimes I used to lose hope. 'She will never care for such a rough fellow,' I often said to myself."

"You must not speak against yourself now," returned Bessie, shyly.

"No, dear, for you have promised to take me just as I am, and that would make any fellow think more of himself. Bessie, you must not mind if my mother is not quite pleased at first; she is an ambitious woman, and her notions are very different from mine." Bessie did not answer for a moment, and her silence seemed to alarm Richard.

"She is only my stepmother; I am my own master, Bessie."

"Yes, I know," in a low voice. "I was thinking about that last night. I am afraid she will not like it, and it troubles me a little. We are not rich, and——"

"What does that matter?" with a touch of impatience. "I thought you were free from that sort of nonsense, Bessie."

"It does not matter to us," replied Bessie, with a slight emphasis on the "us" that was exquisite to Richard's ear. "I am only speaking of Mrs. Sefton; but she is not your own mother, and she has never made you happy, and she has no right to prevent you pleasing yourself."

"That is spoken like a sensible girl. I must thank you for that speech. Your father said much the same thing to me. 'You are your own master,' he remarked, 'and your stepmother has no right to control your choice; but, knowing her as I do, she will not be pleased.'"

"You will tell her as soon as possible, will you not—and Edna too?"

"I will tell them this morning. You must leave everything to me. You shall be subjected to no unpleasantness that I can prevent. And, Bessie, I am going to take you down to Cliffe. I have made my mind up to that."

"Very well," she said, with a smile. And it was a new thing for Richard to assert himself and meet with no contradiction; and as he looked at the girl beside him, and met her clear, candid glance, his heart swelled within him for very gratitude.

"It is getting late; we must go home now," observed Bessie, wondering a little at his sudden silence.

"Yes, we will go home," he replied, rousing himself. "I was just thinking, dear, what life will mean to me when I have you beside me."

A LANCE FOR THE LILY.

THE age of chivalry is dead. Far down in the dim past, looming ghostlike through the mist of centuries, moves the form of the great Lancelot—the flower of knighthood, and rank by rank the knights of later days have been swept away by the resistless onset of time, till the historic field is filled with heaps of the forgotten dead—pale lips that never again will sing their lady's praise, and powerless arms that never more will hold a lance in rest for the honour of stainless maidenhood.

The age of chivalry is dead, and men no longer maintain the cause of those they love by knightly skill in the lists or fair encounter on the open field, for the age of progress is upon us, and what was done by hard blows then is now accomplished more conveniently by smart practice and short weights.

The conditions of female life also are changed and changing; moreover it is undeniable that on the whole they are improved, but the assertion of this pleasing fact is in the highest degree superfluous, for the boasted age of progress is nothing if not self-complacent.

It is then unnecessary to add one feeble note to the chorus of mutual congratulation which this improvement in the position of English-women has called forth, or to join in the loud-voiced demand for further developments of the system of so-called female emancipation. The object of this short article is rather to deter the crowd of would-be reformers, lest their eager feet should trample down many a lovely meadow flower; lest the dim religious light of the years that are passed should be wholly forgotten in the electric glare of those which are to come; lest the music of purer ages should be altogether drowned in the wild shout of "forward, forward," and many beautiful things should be carelessly sacrificed to the bare notion of advance.

If woman's nature differs at all from man's, her education, her attainments and her aspirations should be different from his; yet the tendency of the present day is to force both sexes by similar means along the self-same groove.

Women vie with men in the higher branches of the exact sciences, and, as a matter of course, the victory is not always with the strong. But it is more than probable that these individual cases of success are achieved at a terribly disproportionate expense to the sex as a whole. A woman may indeed attain a high place in the mathematical tripos, but in the course of her three years of close and unremitting study, how many sweet visions of life's spring-time have been lost; in the pursuit of those mental gymnastics so appropriate to the male intellect, how many natural feminine faculties have been thwarted and crushed!

Where, indeed, the necessities of life demand that women should leave their natural sphere in order to share in the terrible struggle for existence, no word except of encouragement should be spoken, but that such a spectacle should be regarded as other than a deplorable evil, is mere sentimental optimism.

It is difficult to exaggerate the harm which has already resulted from the so-called higher education of women. The earnest sincerity which formerly characterised all good women is gradually being replaced by a light, easy infidelity of high and noble things. The drawing-room conversation of women who have suffered most from this educational scourge, is seldom more than a series of cynical criticisms and grotesque perversions, which may sometimes be witty, but are always more or less antagonistic to the cause of truth. Old principles are despised, old landmarks are swept away; much that was "good" in the old days is branded now with the name "respectable," to be treated with ridicule; and thus by many surface sophisms, right is merged in wrong, and vice becomes little distinguishable from virtue.

The effects of this forced intellectual culture are most painfully apparent in our large metropolitan schools and the ladies' colleges of Oxford and Cambridge. No one, at least of the male sex, can help but be struck by the rareness of physical beauty among school-girls in the higher forms, and personal experience has conclusively demonstrated that Newnham and Girton possess few dangerous attractions for the average undergraduate.

When, as is often the case, we meet a young girl living in the midst of an uncongenial society, surrounded by savants and college dons, her brow perpetually contracted by unnatural thought, a strained weary expression in the eyes which might otherwise have sparkled with careless happiness, it is but small comfort to be told that she is learned in Greek roots, and the knowledge so acquired seems a poor compensation for the loss of girlhood's brightness and beauty.

But however much we may deprecate the present scheme of higher education for females, no one would dare for a moment to suggest that women should not be highly educated at all. The sphere of reason may indeed belong pre-eminently to man, but woman reigns supreme in the realm of the emotions, and this difference should be recognised as fundamental in the education of the two sexes. Leave logic and arithmetic and chemical analysis to the male portion of the community, for notwithstanding a few notorious successes and the rhetorical compliments of interested school-governors, the majority of women will do no more than demonstrate their own inferiority by competing with men in this arena.

It seems to me (for I do not wish to clothe my individual opinion with the authoritative plural) that the first and foremost object of a woman's higher education should be the correct development of her emotional faculties.

Let our young girls, when they have attained an easy knowledge of common things, devote their time to the expansion of those attributes which constitute them sweetly feminine. Let them read good, pure books of human interest, let them sing the glad world song with the poets, and learn the divine mysteries of art and nature.

It is reserved for maidens who have been bold enough, or fortunate enough, to abandon for this training the system of education which has all the authority of fashion on its side, to shed the purest, holiest light on this dark world of ours.

Such a maiden have I known, living a sweet simple life in a home of love and beauty. The birds and the flowers were her companions, her fair face reflected the purity which dwelt around her and within; her graceful flowing dress was innocent alike of Parisian deformity and æsthetic eccentricity, her gentle nature was unstrained by effort and untainted by the world.

How vividly do I remember the termination of my first visit at her home. She was waiting in the garden to say good-bye to me. All the lawn on which she stood was chequered with sunshine and leafy shade. Sunny gleams fell too upon her white muslin dress and upon her hair; but on me the shadows fell, and when I drew near to her a feeling of my great unworthiness stifled the passion which might else have struggled to my lips. I dared not look into those deep calm eyes of hers—I took her hand in mine for a moment, and murmured the word "good-bye." And as we stood there on the lawn, to me longing for her love, burning with a wild desire for the great gift of her heart—she gave a flower.

A long half year passed by before I saw her again, but during those months of absence I never failed to feel the soft influence of her goodness and simple maidenhood; and when at last the time of our meeting came, I realised that the emotion with which she had at first inspired me had deepened into the passionate adoration of a lifetime.

In the charm of her presence the light-footed hours sped all too quickly, and too soon dawned the day of our parting. It had been a hard winter, the wild north wind chanted a shrill saga among the leafless, frost-bitten branches, the snow lay deep on the lawn where we had stood six months ago to say good-bye, the garden was desolate, and the roses of the summer were long ago faded and dead. But my dear love was still beside me, and now my arm was thrown around her, her sweet head nestled against my breast, the tears of emotion trembled in her eyes—she could give me no flower this bitter winter day, but she gave me her heart instead, and in mine, not untouched before by a cynic frost, she has created an eternal summer.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

MELROSE.—Could you not manage to get the school under your own roof, and thus save rent? and also get an assistant who could prepare pupils for exams., and teach advanced subjects? This would enable you to compete with the other schools.

"SILVER SCREES."—A "scree," in provincial English, is a small stone or pebble. Southey says, "Before I had got half way up the screes, which gave way, and rattled beneath me at every step." Mam Tor, the shivering mountain, is a hill on the peak of Derbyshire. It is so called because of the waste of its mass by "shivering," i.e., breaking away in "shivers" or small pieces. It is caused by the alternate layers of soft shale and hard gritstone; the former crumbles away, and then the latter breaks away from want of support.

JACK POINT.—We do not quite understand your query. The Lutherans are the followers of Luther. Lutheranism prevails in Germany, and is the State religion in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. The Lutheran "confession of faith" is contained in the three ancient creeds—the "Augsburg Confession," "Melancthon's Apology," the "Articles of Schmalkald," "Luther's Catechisms," the "Concordienformel" and the "Articles of Visitation" (1592). We hope we have given you the information you need on the subject, so far as we comprehend you.

A LILY would find her bad spelling certainly prove a bar to her passing the exam. for a clerkship in the Telegraph Department. Three mistakes in easy words, besides wrong words employed in an ill-expressed note; the writing very poor likewise.

ELLA.—As our correspondent "Telegraphist E. H." remarks, "the geography of the British Isles" has been included in the lists of the recent exams. The salary for female clerks rises from 12s. to £1 12s. a week in the Telegraph Department.

JANE learns anything "by ear," not "by hear."

"FAERY QUEEN."—The lines—

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small"— are by the Marquis of Montrose, 1650, from "My Dear and Only Love."

ELEANOR.—We are constantly warning our girls not to try to obtain situations on the Continent, unless the circumstances of the case be very well known indeed.

M. PEARL.—We know of no way to find out except by writing to the matron at the hospital. Perhaps you might be more fortunate if you tried St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington.

HOUSEKEEPING.

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER.—Meat, bread, milk, and groceries, as well as coals and washing, should be included in the allowance of £2 per week, but the servants' wages might not be easy to squeeze out. However, our answer must be vague, as you give so few particulars; and as to the amount of your income you are quite silent.

ICE CREAM.—Put the tin of sardines when opened inside the china box; do not empty them out. Apples can be peeled and dried in a very slow oven in the same manner as the pippins are dried.

ONE OF FORTUNE'S FAVOURITES.—Turpentine and beeswax, or the turpentine alone, is said to be good for furniture so infested. It should be well rubbed into the wood. 2. The 27th August, 1866, was a Monday.

COOKERY.

A YOUNG WIFE makes a mistake, we think, in stewing the meat for her beefsteak-pie first. She had better make the pie with the raw meat cut into long finger-like pieces, and add a little bullock's kidney. Flour, pepper, and salt the meat well, cut up the eggs and arrange all round an egg cup in the dish. Put in a tea-cupful of water, and cover with a good paste. Bake slowly, covering the paste with a paper to prevent it from scorching.

THE DIACAL.—In the North of England "parkin" is made for the 5th of November. Take two pounds of oatmeal and mix with $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. of ginger and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of sugar. Rub $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of butter into it, and add an ounce of candied peel. Add enough treacle well warmed to make the mixture into a stiff paste. Then put into a greased tin or tins, and bake in a very slow oven. They must be kept when made in a tin box, well covered.

M. W.—Whipped cream is best made the day before it is wanted. Put half a pint of double cream into a basin, sweeten and flavour with vanilla or lemon, and whisk until it froths on the surface. Skim off the froth and lay on a fine wire sieve, and go on until all the cream be whisked away. When the froth has stood some time it will be ready for use. Some people add the white of an egg beaten to a froth to the cream before beginning to whisk it.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CANADIENCES.—We hear that the custom of sitting on the steps of the house in the evening is universal in America, but both as regards that and your other question, your father and mother would certainly be safer guides than a stranger, who knows nothing of your circumstances.

DROOPING had far better consult a doctor about her troubles, and we think with improved health much of her mental distress will vanish. She should cultivate a cheerful spirit, and endeavour to find happiness in trifles.

FANNY PERCIVAL.—We never "answer next week." The composition is not very bad, the spelling is good, but the writing is very poor. The letters are badly formed, and the capitals out of all proportion to the rest of the letters.

G. A. M.—We think that girls of every age should use the dumb-bells which suit them, so long as they do not over-strain the muscles.

MATERFAMILIAS.—The letter about the institution should be addressed to Sir Henry Ponsonby, wherever Her Majesty is residing at the time.

2. The title of an archbishop is "His Grace."
LOVER OF MUSIC.—Any upholsterer or French polisher would tell you how to restore the wood of your piano.

A MORAVIAN is thanked for her kind letter, and her very simple prescription for the cure of chilblains, viz., to bathe them in the water in which a potato has been boiled in its skin. We never heard of the remedy before, and do not think that it is generally known.

A HELPLESS ONE.—To avoid the great annoyance of an intrusion of earwigs on your bed, you should take care that none of the clothes touch the wall, and the legs of the bed should stand in wooden or flower-pot saucers of water, to prevent their climbing up.

MERRAN FLAUS.—The lines—

"Be wise with speed,

A fool at forty is a fool indeed!"— are from Young's "Love of Fame," Satire i., line 282. There is a line beginning in much the same way in the "Night Thoughts," Night i., line 300. Perhaps you have made a mistake.

VIOLET is anxious to know whether "when it was customary for Eastern people to 'rend their garments,' when calamity or sorrow befel them, they mended the rent or wore the torn garment for a time, and then had new ones?" We should think, judging from the story of David's mourning, that the torn garments were worn for the period of mourning.

ROSE SALTERNE.—See account of "Clytie" at page 576, vol. ix.

A DEVONSHIRE DUMPLING.—J. M. W. Turner, the landscape painter, was born April, 1775; died December, 1851. Mendelssohn was born February, 1809; died November, 1847.

WHEN SPRING RETURNS.

WHEN spring returns with rosy feet,
And gone is winter's winding-sheet,
Each streamlet murmuring through the vale,
Each primrose tells the glorious tale;
'Mid leafy lanes the lambkins bleat.

The skylark from his grassy seat
Goes forth, the waking sun to greet,
No more to hear wild winter's wail,
When spring returns.

His gadsome song we would repeat,
And bless the Love with praises meet
Whose mindful mercies never fail
To children undeserving, frail;
Our cup He fills with blessings sweet,
When spring returns.

RING A RING O' ROSES.

O CHEEKS, as fair as any April bloom,
 O eyes as blue as any noontide sky,
 That see not mist, or shade, or cloud of gloom;
 O ye that sing with skylark's ecstasy,
 Trip, trip, upon the grass with flying feet,
 As bright as sunbeams, and as swallows fleet,
 Sing "ring o' roses"—posies gay and sweet.

Ye dream not of the toil, the care, the fret,
 Who drink the sparkling brook, Life's stream of joy,
 And never sighs the wind with vain regret,
 The buttercup's rich gold hath no alloy.
 Sing on, and wake the echoes with your mirth;
 Ye keep the dew, the balm of morning's birth,
 The fairest rosebuds of the garden earth.

CHAPTER IV.

IT was close upon Christmastide; the snow lay thick on the ground, the waters were bound in iron frost, and the utter stillness of bitter cold reigned over the world.

It was night, no visible moon, but a clear grey sky, and a weird reflection from the vivid white of the snow carpet under foot.

Out of a little side door of the Manor House with trembling steps came Eleanor St. Aubyn. She was wrapped in furs drawn close to her chin; as she closed the door behind her, and stole noiselessly through the garden, the big clock overhead struck two.

She sped faster and faster, frightened at her own shadow, at the intense cold, the dead silence; she was bound for old Abel's cottage, which stood at the far end of the long pleasure where the bowling-green ended and a gate opened on to the high road.

Before she reached her destination her step had increased to a rapid run. Someone was watching for her, for the door opened as she reached it, and with one stifled cry, "Robbie! my Robbie!" she was clasped in her brother's arms.

They clung to each other wildly, passionately, as if they never could part again; then quite suddenly the young man thrust her from him the better to see her face.

It was dark in the cottage, but old Rachel had lighted a guttering candle, and now she threw a fresh log on the fire, which blazed up and flared redly on the children she had nursed.

Standing close together, their likeness to each other was wonderful—the same turn of brow and chin, the same dark eyes with deeply chiseled lids, the same sharply-cut lips; an extra couple of inches in Robbie's height alone told the difference.

He began to speak passionately: "It is not true, Nell! I come to assure myself that it is not true. I should not be here to-night; they are hot upon the scent, but I could not help it; I must hear your denial from your own lips."

"Robbie, why did you send for me here? The Manor House cellars are ready for you as usual. I have so longed, oh Robbie, so longed for you!"

"It is not safe even to be here! The rumour of my presence has followed me here, but I had no option; let us lose no time. I have come to know whether we have indeed seen the last of each other, whether you have turned traitor; if so, I thought I should like to say good-bye to the Nellie that was once mine."

Eleanor looked fearfully round; she hardly heeded the haughty words that at another time would have half broken her heart.

"Tell me," she gasped, "is your horse at hand? What precaution have you taken? Oh why, why did you come?"

"Abel watches outside. Yes, yes, my horse is there; do not be afraid. I know ways through the woods which would baffle all James' justice. Enough! I must, I will know the truth. Are you false?"

"Never, never!" she cried "False! You insult me by your question."

"Ah, then, you have refused to marry this man! Why did you tell me so foul a lie?" he cried, turning fiercely upon Rachel.

"It is no lie," answered the old nurse sturdily. "And you should be ashamed to speak to your sister so. Why does she marry this gentleman? sooth, to put bread into the mouths of the helpless folk dependent on her."

"Then it is true?"

"Robbie, Robbie, have mercy!"

But he flung her from him, so that she caught tremblingly the back of a chair to support herself.

"Nellie," he cried, "God knows I love you well, but I would rather see you lying dead at my feet, even though I knew that our twin life must ebb together as some have said, than know you traitor to the King!"

"Only listen!"

"Why should I listen? What can you have to say? Nellie, do you know what you are doing? Do you realise that at this moment, from all your heart has ever loved, from every secret written in life-blood in the records of our cause, from every struggle, every failing hope, every share in our scant triumphs and our fast-growing despair—as the forester lops off a rotten bough, I cast you out and repudiate you!"

"Have pity!"

"What do you call pity? I am no Virginus; I will not kill you! It is you that have no pity."

A low cry burst from her. The temptation was so strong to yield; she threw out her hands despairingly, as if to ward it off, and her voice sounded piteously.

"Robbie, Robbie, would you have me let them starve?"

"Starve!"

The wild look in his eye was that of fanaticism. "Those who do their duty do not starve! They may suffer; do we not all suffer? But what is suffering? who is the worse for it? The night cannot last for ever."

"Our father is weak, Robbie; he is very old."

"Older lives than his have been laid down for the King," he cried impatiently.

"I will not hear you plead; your own hand has cut the tightest bond that ever bound brother and sister together on this earth; you know that this marriage will not only tear us apart, but will bring on you—"

"Captain, Captain!" cried old Abel's voice as he burst open the door. "They are on the road; they will be here in five minutes at least! Oh, waste no time!"

Eleanor threw her arms round her brother's neck. "Robbie, have mercy! forgive me! Oh, my Robbie, pity me!"

But he tore himself from the clinging arms. "Lose no time," entreated Abel, "for heaven's sake, dear Captain!"

He went to the door. Eleanor stood now with her hands wrung together, her despairing eyes fixed on his face.

"You shall not wring from me my loyalty at least, the loyalty for which every hour of my existence I risk Tyburn Hill. You shall not, I tell you. Forgive you? Never! It is with the utmost effort of my soul, and because of what you have been to me, that I abstain from crying traitress, renegade, on you my curse!"

He left the house, the door swung back with a heavy thud; in less than half a minute they heard the sound of his horse's feet going past at a gallop; they listened breathlessly, a faint distant shout came to their ears, then the fast galloping of hot pursuit, the sharp report of a pistol, followed by dead silence.

Rachel turned round to the girl, who still stood listening with an agony of suspense in her haggard face.

"Dear heart," she said, holding out her arms. Eleanor crept into them with a low moan. "Child, child," cried the old nurse. "They were cruel words! He did not mean them."

"Yes, Rachel, he meant them only too well," said Eleanor, shuddering. "He has gone, with a curse on his lips. Oh, would that he and I were lying dead in the old churchyard, never to move or feel or suffer more!"

Presently Eleanor crept home again in dull, stupid misery. It was very cold, very still; the snow lay on the giant cedars like a white pall. She looked round her with a brief word of thanksgiving, for it was falling again, thick, blindingly, and would soon cover all trace of footsteps.

In the woods the defeated officers of justice were carrying home a dead man, the first man, they said, that Captain Bob had ever shot dead since he had been known on the road. Was he driven to bay?

A FEW RECOLLECTIONS SUGGESTED BY THE NAME OF MARY COWDEN-CLARKE.

PART II.

THE STUDY AND THE WIFE.

*“He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small,
For the dear Lord who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.”

“ON their return to town the wedded pair were welcomed home by those who were now parents to both, and who with loving generosity made the family house their home ever after. For Charles’ revenue was more than modest, it was scant, though he set to work with a will, and refused no writing employment that promised remuneration, however small, or that was ever so uncongenial to his tastes. . . . Every guinea Charles gained he brought to his wife, and confided to her from first to last the entire management of whatever money they earned. As belonging to this period of their early married life, should be noted a delightful week’s visit paid by Charles and his wife to dear and honoured Charles and Mary Lamb, at Chase Side, Enfield, by their invitation, and by way of atonement for having lurked at the Greyhound during their honeymoon season.”—“Recollections of Writers.” By C. C. C. and Mary C. C.

Among the recreations indulged in by Charles and his wife was an occasional “day in the fields.” One particularly remembered was a midsummer holiday spent gipsy-fashion, under a hedge in a meadow between Hampstead and Hendon. “From morn till noon, from noon to dewy eve,” in luxuriant idleness, stretched on the grass, enjoying the rural prospect, reading a page or two of poetry, munching a few prudently-brought sandwiches, with good grave talk, or playful talk, as the case might be, between whiles. Another well-remembered one was a walk all the way to Enfield, through Highbury, by Hornsey Wood House, and so along the lovely country by-road called the Green Lanes, to the Greyhound, where rest, coolness, and appetising refection were fully enjoyed by the pedestrians, who had started from London at an early hour. A fortnight’s stay at a pretty ivy-covered cottage on Highgate Hill, and a four days’ stay at a pleasant country inn at Dorking, when over-worked and needing healthful air and repose, likewise hold place among the memories of those times. The reason of this latter being restricted to a “four days’ stay” was the fear lest their finances should not suffice for a longer sojourn, though there was great temptation to linger, as they found that the exquisite Surrey district would have afforded “a fresh walk” for every day, even could they have remained there a whole month.

“At home surpassingly delightful entertainments existed for them, in the choice musical parties given by Vincent Novello. A signally memorable one is narrated in the “Life and Labours of Vincent Novello,” of which I am permitted to extract an account. It was soon after Malibran’s marriage with De Beriot, and they both came to this party at the Novello’s house. De Beriot played in a string quartette of Haydn’s, with that perfect tone and style which distinguished him. Then his wife gave in generously lavish succession Mozart’s “Non piu di fiori,” with Willman’s obbligato accompaniment on the Corno di bassetto, a Sancta Maria of her host’s composition, which she sang at first sight with consummate effect and expression;

a gracefully tender air, “Ah, rien n’est doux comme la voix qui dit je t’aime;” and lastly, a spirited mariner’s song, with a sailorly burden chiming, as it were, with their rope hauling. In these two latter she accompanied herself, and when she had concluded, among a roar of admiring plaudits from all present, she ran up to one of the heartiest among the applauding guests, Felix Mendelssohn, and said, in her own winning, playfully-imperious manner (which a touch of foreign speech and accent made only the more fascinating), “Now, Mr. Mendelssohn, I never do nothing for nothing. You must play for me, now I have sung for you.” He, nothing loth, let her lead him to the pianoforte, when he dashed into a wonderfully impulsive extempore—masterly, musician-like, full of gusto. In this marvellous improvisation he introduced the several pieces Malibran had just sung, working them with admirable skill one after the other; and finally, in combination, the four subjects blended together in elaborate counterpoint. When Mendelssohn had finished his performance, Vincent Novello turned to an esteemed friend who was one of the hearers, and expressed his admiration in these remarkable words: “He has done some things that seem to me to be impossible, even after I have heard them done.” No wonder the delight experienced by the musical soul of the master of the house took the shape which it did next morning in the composition of the beautiful canon—

“A Thanksgiving after Enjoyment.” By Vincent Novello, July 10, 1833.

As soon as he awoke next morning he wrote that, in acknowledgment of the great pleasure he had enjoyed, to the words, “Give thanks to God, and praise His name. Praise the Lord, for ever and ever. Praise the Lord, for all His loving kindness, for all His tender mercy unto us. Bless the Lord, and praise His holy name.”

All this home brightness and happiness gave zest and strength to the young people, who were the better armed for the day’s hard work by the evenings of inspiration and the sympathy of the superior intelligences attracted round them. To these, besides the glories of art, were added those of literature, and among them students and lovers of Shakespeare; and as the motto of our Lord Shaftesbury’s house was “Love—Serve,” so was the heart of her family, and specially that of this young student-wife, set to love and serve him whom they so deeply honoured. From this feeling arose the practical desire to supply a want they had all often felt, in the merry quips and quotations of the home circle, of a Concordance of the Poet they loved and revered so dearly.

The difficulties were enormous; so was the work; so were also the risks that after years of quiet labour, some unknown and unsuspecting rival would be in the field before her work was done. Still hope, the blessed hope of being of some use in the good cause, fired the young enthusiast, and at certain hours of the day she habitually vanished. The organisation of the work was most carefully planned, and all went well. Her education and the life of her home had thoroughly equipped her, not only with the power of accurate and concentrated study, but (which perhaps was still more valuable) with the love of learning. I might observe that in these very superior times the reward of work is a certain pass, a certain position, anything but the development of mind and character. An array of facts, a retentive memory, and no nerves are the keys of these gates to honours so crowded with young aspirants. Once passed, those who know best what follows could testify, if they would, that books and learning, the mules that have borne them on their weary way to advancement, are tossed aside and done with, in many cases never to be taken up again.

It was very different in this home. The young married couple began the life, which was in such a remarkable manner one long honeymoon, with their devotion to noble and elevating work. Even long years after, in the Genoa palace-home, remembered in the beginning of this little sketch, the study was occupied by those two happy people at six o’clock, and good work was done long before the house breakfast in that charming trellised hall was begun.

The young wife had been at work several years, when suddenly a rumour of a Concordance of Shakespeare coming out paralysed her hope and work for awhile, but it turned out a false alarm, and the work was resumed, unsuspected by the most intimate friend, until, after sixteen years’ hard work, the last word was done, the last proof corrected. It may not be out of place to quote an opinion on this work by a writer so well known and so fine a critic as Douglas Jerrold. He writes in “The Shilling Magazine,” January, 1846:—

“This is probably the most stupendous honour paid to genius by one admirer. The Iliad has been put into a nutshell, a childish piece of homage; but here we have the works of the poet repeated many times over. Endless toil, incessant attention, a love untiring for the author, could alone have produced such a work. Mrs. Cowden Clarke has performed what a very long list of nobler and gentler ones proposed and failed in, namely, to erect a monument to Shakespeare. Here we have one more lasting than brass or stone. A Concordance to Shakespeare! A Concordance to the only author which would not seem to be a presumptuous rivalling with that Concordance which belongs to the Book most important to the human race. There have been a verbal index and an index to the most remarkable passages in Shakespeare’s works; both works of labour, by persevering, painstaking men; but here we have the patient adoration of a woman producing a work more laborious than both combined, and infinitely more useful. We can easily understand that this must have been the labour of many years. A degree of skill was required in making the exact quotation required, to give the exact sense of the word, and in this Mrs. Cowden Clarke has been very fortunate. The immense utility for matters of reference is obvious at a glance, but it seems to us that many other advantages may be derived from an examination of this storehouse of words. Classical students of the dead languages have long known the advantage of studying an author through the means of a good verbal index, and thus comparing an author’s various uses of a word. In the present book he has the double advantage of seeing the various sentences in which it is used at one view. This itself will greatly aid the elucidation of Shakespeare’s text, and also of contemporary authors. It becomes in this way a great lexicographical aid to the language. It also presents many curious facts to the inquirer as to the comparative use of words, and presents in a most striking point of view the illimitable powers and inexhaustible wonders of Shakespeare’s genius. It would not be right to tell here of this noble labour without noticing the excellent manner in which it is printed. . . .

Altogether it is a work that all concerned with may very justly be proud of, and for which the public should be grateful."

Again, in his opening speech at the Whittington Club, of which he was founder and president, July, 1847:—"Have we not, too, Mary Cowden Clarke, whose wonderful book, 'The Concordance to Shakespeare,' is as a votive lamp lighted at the shrine of the poet—a lamp that will burn as long as Shakespeare's name is worshipped by the nations."

I cannot forbear quoting a beautiful sonnet by Thos. James Serle on the same subject, Nov., 1865, of the completion of the "Concordance to Shakespeare."

"By small degrees, like Nature's silent toil,
And with her patience, at the last, 'tis done,
And here the fruit from sixteen summers won.

How many wearers of this 'mortal coil'
Have spent the years in idlesse and turmoil,

While your wise diligence has let no sun
Go down upon the task you had begun;
But he hath seen you harvest golden spoil?
A jewelled key to a fair paradise,
Is this your book, to prate of that within
Were little better than presumptuous sin.
But the bright key speaks to observant eyes,
Its workman's honour must high virtue win,
Brave, single-hearted labour, such as yours hath been."

Want of space is the only apology for not inserting other most interesting and valuable testimonies to the work thus completed. The Jersey Times, Nov., 1846, says beautifully, "Nothing but that spirit of divine enthusiasm which actuated the architects of old to toil for years in the decoration of secret places aloft in the Temple, which God's eye alone could reach, could have supported and borne forward the learned authority in her long and arduous undertaking."

This was the first of a long series of works, animated by the same spirit, editing, collating, and in every way assisting to the more perfect comprehension of that master-spirit of English literature, besides others inspired by the sunny genius and happiness husband and wife exerted and shared so well, carried on in the study where they worked together, for no hour in the twenty-four was allowed to separate those two, who were so happy in this companionship. It is not strange that besides the critical acumen of their works, they should breathe a spirit of bright enjoyment and genial tenderness to all living things, and, most of all, to the Giver of all good and gracious gifts, which gives a glow of warmth and force to all they write. The "Shakespeare Key," by both husband and wife, is a most valuable work, unlocking the treasures of his style, and elucidating the peculiarities of his construction, etc.; while the wife alone wrote that most charming "Girlhood of Shakespeare's Heroines," which divines with a poet's feeling the first beginnings of the heroic proportions of the originals, and the training, whether of circumstance or character, which made them what they were. This drawing, as it were, the shadow of the poet, from Shakespeare's colossal figures, was like the reflection of a beautiful tree in water, so true is its fainter beauty to the original, and suggestive of depths and heights which enriched the picture to the young hearts that studied it.

The same pen produced a series of beautiful articles in the early numbers of the "Musical Times," on Music Among the Poets, collecting and collating the tributary verses to music by the great English poets. Also an edition of Shakespeare, with chronological table of his life, and glossary; and a biographical sketch of William Shakespeare. Also from time to time several very charming stories, novels, stories in verse, essays, sonnets, contributions to periodical literature came out, to carry on the work of that happy and busy life. Meantime "Charles and Mary Cowden Clarke may with truth be held in tender remembrance by their readers, as among the happiest of married lovers for more than forty-eight years, writing together, reading together, working together, enjoying together the perfection of loving literary consociation." The works of Charles Cowden Clarke comprise, besides valuable essays on the writers of England, most interesting lectures on Shakespeare's contrasted characters, on the British poets, on great European dramatists, on ancient ballads, on the schools of painting in Italy, etc.; but in this paper any reference beyond this to those valuable and critical works would have been out of place. Still, this record would be incomplete were it to omit all mention of the assistance rendered by Mrs. Cowden Clarke to a chivalrous project in which all the leading writers of the time (Charles Dickens at their head) took part, to raise a fund for the relief of distressed literary men and women, by acting together as a private society for a great public good, at the Duke of Devonshire's and elsewhere, a play of Shakespeare's, one of Lytton Bulwer's being composed expressly for them. The experiment was so successful, and the crowded and brilliant audiences contributed so largely to this benevolent fund, that it was repeated, and the charm of Mrs. Cowden Clarke's acting, added to the attraction of other eminent writers to produce a result which made those few enthusiastic and brilliant evenings a happy remembrance for all those connected with them.

It would be a very imperfect notice of Mrs. Cowden Clarke's writings which took no heed of the "rose-coloured spectacles" with which her friends would fain have reproached her, but which consisted in the kindly and tender gracefulness with which she brings out all the beloved beauty of what she sees, in singular vividness and variety, the keenness with which she perceives good motives, and the veil of charity she throws over doubtful or darker ones. "All things bright and beautiful" come naturally to her pen, and the spirit of happiness and enjoyment, and grateful love and faith in the Divine giver of all good things, breathes in her writings and animates all her influence. The homes of this world would be very different if the genius for discovering kindly motives and generous actions were more widely diffused, carrying out the old distich—

"Be to their faults a little blind,
And to their virtues very kind."

This would be a wonderful fortification against smaller and greater miseries, and united with the spirit of innocent gladness and gay humour, which she possessed so eminently, would put to flight that dulness and vacuity which grows into so many worse things. I am allowed to quote a few lines from the charming poem on "My Rose-Coloured Spectacles" to support the assertion.

"I reckon them among my best of treasures . . .

They bring me back the happy days of youth,
That see all beauty brighter and more
dear. . . .

Distinctly they reveal the soul of good,
Residing in things evil, and assist
Me patiently to wait and raise the hood
That shrouds it, like an overshadowing mist. . . .

They cause me clearly to behold God's will,
Displayed in every law of His creation. . . .
Oh! rosy spectacles, accept my thanks,
For all thou hast enabled me to see.
Well may it be thy gracious power ranks
Beyond most gifts vouchsafed by heaven to me,

And to that heaven itself who gave the gift,
My gratitude ineffable I lift."

We return to the shores of the Mediterranean, from whence we started at the beginning of this little sketch, to the beautiful home high on the Carignano, where the work of this dear lady has gone on. Alas! the hand held once so firmly in hers, the generous mind so eloquent on the great writers of past times, is no longer there; but the traditions of the old home, the reverence for parents, loved and passed out of sight, the family union of brother, sisters, and all branches of the old family, live on to make that home a centre of kindly sympathies and artistic work; while the writings that remain of Charles Cowden Clarke and his wife will be helpful and delightful, as far as English is spoken and Shakespeare honoured. I cannot leave the name of Charles Cowden Clarke without quoting a few lines written by him (quoted from the "Biographic Sketch." By her whom he made his second self") on the 15th December, 1859, of gratitude for vouchsafed welfare:—"Thank God I have attained my seventy-second birthday, and in fine health, and with that prime blessing, the next in bounteous magnitude, a wife of one-and-thirty years' standing, who is to me at once a daily bride, and a one-and-thirty years' friend. . . . My soul seems daily more and more knit with hers, and I do not conceive how there can be a happier being in existence than your brother Charles."

All who sympathise with honourable work in a good cause will wish God's blessing on a home so bravely founded and so splendidly carried on, and we will not leave to our American cousins only the privilege of expressing our admiration of her worth and our sympathy in her having

"All that should accompany old age,

As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends;"

in the honourable retirement realising Henry V.'s motto—

"After busy labore cometh victorious reste."

After self-devotion to others in youth and middle age comes the glory of a sunset, such as tells those who come after, that there is peace to the peacemakers, and honour and love to those who have honoured and loved and toiled bravely through a long life for a noble art, for their home and for their duty.

I must close with a few lines written by Mary Cowden Clarke after her husband's death, and will then leave a beloved and radiant memory of an absent friend.

MEMORIAL SONNET.*

When I repeat thy "Hymn to God" first thing
I wake, last thing before I go to sleep,
I feel thou biddest me take heart, not weep,
But pray with thee, and trust that time will bring

Us both our chief desire—a strengthening
In faith and love, and adoration deep
For our benign Creator, who doth keep Us still in spirit intermingling.
Thy simple yet most earnest hymn of praise
And thankfulness exalts and stimulates
My soul with constant eagerness to raise
To Him our joint appeal; it elevates
Me with the thoughts that thus we still unite
In prayer, and joyful, grateful, loving rite.

It may be some guiding light of hope and happiness to those who dream of wedding days to come, to see how a marriage begun with narrow means became a source of joy and blessing to everyone connected with it—a fortress of peace and quiet against storms without; and at last a bridge over the chasm of death itself, to realise the love and faith beyond.

THE MICROSCOPE AND OURSELVES.

PART II.

IN my last article I attempted to give you some idea of what our microscope had to say to us about a tooth, and also what it could tell about the structure of a piece of ordinary compact bone: and I chose those two specimens on account not only of their simplicity of structure and the ease with which you can make it out, but also because there is, as I have shown, a certain parallelism in their construction to meet the wants demanded by each.

We will now proceed to ask our microscope more questions about ourselves, and let us ask him about our skin. He will answer in certain terms, and before we ask him let me translate some of his words, by describing one or two elementary structures, a knowledge of which will enable us to understand the rationale of his remarks.

I must again introduce our old friend the "simple cell." This time you will see he has undergone some slight modification, and we shall, in speaking of skin, call him "an epithelial cell"; you will see the reason of this name presently. In Fig. 1 you will see a number of cells which are very flat and thin, joined together at their contiguous borders by a dark cement substance, and if we isolated one such cell from its fellows we should find that it was like a microscopic fish's scale; hence these cells have been called "squamous epithelial cells," from the Latin "squama," a "scale."

Now look at Fig. 1, "b." What does the arrangement seen there remind you of? Surely a paved hall or floor! And in some specimens the appearance is like that presented by a delicate piece of mosaic work; hence this same epithelium has been called by the Germans "tessellated or pavement epithelium."

You will notice in both the diagrams in Fig. 1 that each cell has a central portion or nucleus, which in reality measures from 1-6,000th to 1-4,000th of an inch. This, then, is the first variety of epithelium that we have to learn of. Now turn to Fig 2; here you see a widely different condition of affairs from that presented in the previous diagram. You will notice that this structure is also made up of a number of cells, each with its nucleus, and each in close apposition to its neighbour. But the shape of each cell—how does that differ from the last? Very materially; these cells are longer in proportion to their width, so that they look like a microscopic row of railings. These cells are called "columnar epithelium cells," from their shape. This, then, is the second variety of epithelium we have to know. And now while we have this columnar or prismatic form of epithelium under our notice, let us turn our attention to Fig. 3.

Here you see cells even more prismatic in their form than those in Fig. 2; but what is that arrangement at the tops of the cells, which makes them look like the representation of miniature flambeaux? Those are little lashes called "cilia," from the Latin "cilium," "a lash." These cilia play a most important part in some structures, of which I shall have to speak later. This epithelium, therefore, we see is prismatic in form—"columnar"—and is provided with these lashes—"ciliated," as it is termed, and therefore is a sub-variety of columnar epithelium, and each cell is called a "columnar ciliated epithelial cell."

One more variety of epithelium remains for our consideration, and that is represented in

FIG. 3.

Fig. 4. Here you see a number of hexagonal cells, each externally dark. These cells contain granules of colouring matter, and also a nucleus which is obscured by that colouring matter. This variety of epithelium is therefore coloured, and is called "pigmented epithelium." Each cell is fairly flat, and not prismatic or columnar.

I have given a preliminary explanation, then, of the various forms of epithelium, in order that we may have some fore-knowledge of the elements of the structure of the next specimen that we shall put under our microscope; that is a vertical section of skin stained in picramine. You can buy such a section ready mounted at any microscope dealer's.

On placing the specimen under the low power of the microscope, you will notice that it is generally of a red colour, owing to the carmine stain. Now let us examine our specimen systematically. With the low power you will see that one edge of the specimen is stained yellow; this is the surface of the skin. Now put in the high power, and examine this yellow part. What do you see? A homogeneous layer of tissue stained yellow, having a few shattered lines in it. This really consists of a number of horny squames or scales, without nuclei, and which may really be regarded as dead. This is the outermost layer of the skin, and serves to protect the more delicate subjacent tissue; it is thickest where the skin is submitted to intermittent pressure, such as the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, where it is enormously developed. This first layer, then, of the skin is called the "stratum corneum," from the Latin "corneus," "horny." When very much hypertrophied this tissue gives rise to those painful friends that are almost the inevitable consequence of tight boots.

Now let us go further afield in our specimen, and take the next layer, below this stratum corneum, which presents itself for our notice. You will see that it is very clear and stained yellow, you will also observe that there remain in this layer the vestiges of nuclei to the cells. This layer, from its clearness and brightness, is called the "stratum lucidum." In Fig. 5 "a" is the stratum corneum, of which "a" is a single cell element, "b" is the stratum lucidum, of which "b" is the cell element, the difference between "a" and "b" being the presence of a nucleus in "b," whereas in "a" the nucleus is absent; "b" is a "squamous epithelial cell."

Now let us proceed still further down. Now we have come to something that reminds us of our previous questions to the microscope about epithelium. Although "b" in Fig. 5 is a squamous epithelial cell, yet the section being vertical we only see it edgewise; but now we see a set of cells which are not quite so flat or clear as those like "b." I refer to the cells indicated at "c" and one of which is represented by "γ." Now these cells present characters intermediate between those presented by Fig. 1 and Fig. 2, that is to say, they are on the borderland, as it were, between squamous and columnar epithelium. You see that they form a very large part of the specimen; the upper part of this layer takes the carmine stain in a very marked manner, and stands out with a much deeper red colour than the rest of the specimen; this is due to the presence of certain granules, the signification of which I shall point out presently, and which are stained very rapidly and completely by the carmine stain. The layer, then, which we have examined is characterised mainly by the intermediate character of its component elementary cells, and the presence in each individual cell of certain granular particles; hence this layer has been termed the "stratum granulosum."

Passing still lower in the specimen, we come to another layer of cells, which forcibly remind us of the cells which we already have seen represented in Fig. 2—the columnar epithelium cells; they are not stained so deeply as the cells in the stratum granulosum were, for they have not the granulation of each cell like that layer, and therefore do not take the stain so completely. You will notice that the cells change from their quasi-squamous or columnar condition to that of a perfect columnar cell, not suddenly, but by a delicate gradation, those towards the surface more nearly approaching in character the squamous epithelium, those towards the deeper parts the columnar variety. The layer now under consideration is represented in Fig. 5 by "d," and an individual cell is depicted by "e."

It will be apparent to you that in Fig. 5 this layer dips down into the subjacent tissue "e" in four places, and that between these four involutions are received three processes of the underlying tissue called "papillæ." The stratum of epithelium we have just investigated is called the stratum Malpighii, from the name of its discoverer.

Taken collectively, the layers of epithelium we have considered thus far go to form the "upper skin" or "epidermis," as it is called, and it is this part of the skin that one sees raised in the formation of a blister. Now there is a special interest associated with this part of the skin, and that is the "process of regeneration" which is continually going on. The same cells are not for ever present in the skin, but are always undergoing fresh changes. New cells begin from the stratum Malpighii. Let us follow the life of such a cell. It begins as a columnar cell, and remains as such in the stratum Malpighii, but presently another cell appears beneath it, and pushes it upward; at the same time as the result of pressure it becomes shorter and broader, more like "δ" in Fig. 5; the same process being carried on it comes to the condition represented by "γ" in Fig. 5, and now we have the first indication of the beginning of the end. The cell gets granular; this is due to the presence of a substance called "eleidin," which is closely connected in chemical composition with "keratin," the essential part of the topmost layer. Passing onward, our cell loses its eleidin, and is composed mainly of keratin, but still retains its most vital part, the nucleus; it is now in the stratum granulosum (Fig. 5, β). And now the end comes, the nucleus disappears, the cell shrivels, becomes a mere scale, and is lost from the surface as "scurf." Even at the last it retains the potentiality of its columnar form, for if such a cell be immersed in caustic soda solution it swells up.

While speaking of the epidermis, Fig. 6 will be of some interest. It represents the condition of affairs in the skin of a negro. You see that at the lowest part of the stratum Malpighii there is a distinct black line (a). This is a collection of pigmented epithelial cells similar to those in Fig. 4, and to these does the black man owe his characteristic colour.

I have dealt only with the epidermis in the present article, leaving the true skin with its various appendages for a future occasion.

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER VI.

"This small, sweet thing,
Devised in love and fashioned cunningly
Of wood and strings."

I DO not know the author of this heading, but it so exactly describes the violin, its qualities, its method of construction, together with the love and devotion which its makers bring to the work, that I could not resist using it.

The violin is indeed "a small, sweet thing," perfect as art and nature can make it; but small as it is, it possesses a far-reaching, mysterious power of penetrating the human heart and sympathising with its every mood. At one time its sweet, pure notes may be heard speaking peace to the wearied brain, at another comfort to the sad and troubled spirit, and at other times entering heart and soul into the frolics of the young and the pleasures of the glad in spirit. What a loving, sympathetic thing it is!

Read the histories of the old masters, and note the enthusiasm and devotion they bestowed on their beloved art. Watch too the makers of the present day, and you will not doubt that hearts, intellects, and hands all work together to fashion this small, sweet thing.

Fashioned cunningly it certainly is, as all may see who are visiting with us the violin makers of Mittenwald. Up to this time we have been watching the formation of the various parts of the body, or resonance box, and seeing them put together, but there are still several additions to be made if we would possess the instrument in its entire power and beauty.

For example, there is the neck and the figure-head on scroll, the making of which is a special work, as we may see for ourselves if we continue our visits to the factory.

The workmen are sitting on their benches, with thick blocks of maple before them, and gauges of various sizes. They lay the pattern of the neck on the wood, pencil it round, and then set to work with their gauges.

Strange to say the old masters did not pay much heed to the neck, believing it to be of no real importance to the tone of the instrument. We, however, think differently, and are very particular that it shall have exactly its proper position and length, and as much beauty and grace as we can bestow upon it.

If the neck be too short it is disfiguring and demoralising, for it cannot perform the increased work which the higher pitch of these times imposes on it. If it be placed too forward or too much behind it forces the bridge, and has an injurious effect upon the tone of the violin, rendering it sharp, short, or metallic; altogether the neck requires a good deal of attention, but it is quite worth the pains. It is true that it gets a good deal of help from the bridge, the thicknesses and the arches, but it gives back quite as much and even more than it receives. It is an important member of the whole, but its life and health depend upon its working harmoniously with all the other members. Should it attempt to stir up strife among those with whom it is bound, it would lose its position, and another would be found to take its place.

It is joined so beautifully to the main body that it is difficult to detect it with the naked eye. It is done with glue and not by means of nail or screw, therefore it can be removed without taking off the belly should the process be necessary at any time.

Owing to the present alteration in pitch the necks of old violins have to be lengthened, and thus it is that there is scarcely a Stradivarius, Amati, Guarnerius, or Stainer in use but has been provided with a new and longer neck to suit the emergency of the times. The scrolls or figure-heads of violins are so very much alike to an outsider that it is difficult to distinguish one from the other, just as when one looks at a flock of sheep we think the faces all alike, but to the shepherd, or to a practised eye, each one has its own distinctive features; so it is in the scrolls of violins. Each possesses so decidedly the characteristics of the master who formed it, that it is as easy to read as his handwriting.*

In having new necks put upon the old and valued violins, the owners are most careful that the original scrolls should occupy their old places, because, as we have seen, they are the stamp or sign of the maker; and in the dissecting or putting together again many curious accidents have happened. One mentioned by Hart, under the title of "The Missing Scroll," is of this character.

It seems that the owner of a valuable Stradivarius felt the necessity of having the old neck removed, and a new one fixed in its place. So he went to the best violin surgeon he knew to get this delicate operation performed. He was a clever surgeon and an honourable man; but he had a great failing, which was want of punctuality. It was a great trouble to the owner to part with his treasure at all, but when time after time it was promised and never ready for him, he went in anger to the shop, wrapped up all the pieces of his Strad. in paper, and took them home, determined to get some one else to do it for him; but on taking the pieces out of the paper, he was almost beside himself to find the scroll missing.

* Hart, speaking of Guarnerius, says: "Who can fail to recognise the quaint head into which he seems to have thrown such singular character by the mere turn of his chisel, and which, when imitated, always partakes of the ludicrous, and betrays the unhappy copyist who is unable to compass that necessary turn."

Back he went to the instrument-maker whose unpunctuality had been the cause of all his trouble, asking every one he met, and astonishing them too by his wild manner, if by chance they had picked up a fiddle-head. No one had seen it, and his last hope was that he had left it behind in the shop. But, alas, there was no scroll there, and all who love their violins can understand that he was completely overcome by the magnitude of his loss. He offered rewards for its discovery without success. A few days later it was found by an old apple-woman in a gutter, and offered to the violin surgeon for two shillings.

Sometimes, scrolls find their way on to wrong violins and wander about from one instrument to another, and after years of wrong-headedness come back to their own body at last simply by accident. Hart gives a very amusing history of such an one.

Having now the body, the neck, the head, the soul, and the nervous system of the violin, we cannot do better than get the bridge made and placed. This simple little piece is called the tongue of the violin, or as Mr. Haweis facetiously styles it, the wife of the instrument. At all events, whether tongue or wife or both, it is one of the most important parts of the whole. It not only forms a support for the strings, but communicates the vibrations from them to the body of the instrument, and requires the utmost care in its adjustment.

It is a thin piece of wood standing across the belly of the violin between the f holes, and in a line with the little notches; its height is from an inch and a quarter to three-eighths, and its little feet should cling as tightly to the belly as though they grew out of it. The top should be only half the thickness of the feet, and the grain of the wood should run in the direction of its length.

It is not every piece of wood you take up that can be turned into a bridge: the selection must be carefully made, so that the wood may be suitable to the constitution of the violin; for example, if the instrument be wanting in brilliancy the bridge must have solidity of fibre. If it lack mellowness, then the bridge must make up the deficiency. In fact, the bridge must be thoroughly examined to see if its qualities agree with the violin in all respects, for they have to live together, and the violin being masterful and fastidious will put up with no unsuitable mate. "It is necessary," says one authority, "that the bridge should even have pores proportionate to those of the violin." If the bridge be too high or thick it muffles the tone, and if it be too low the tone becomes thin and sharp. Nothing will answer except what is exactly right. Fortunately the union of the bridge with the violin need not be of lifelong duration, and it is not at all rare for a violin to possess two or three. Mr. Haweis' simile of the bridge being the wife does not seem at all an unlikely one, and the remarks he makes upon it are very quaint:—"A perfectly harmonious marriage is as rare between violins and their bridges as it is between men and women. Although the old violin is very capricious in his choice, he does not object to elderly bridges, and when he finds one he can get on with, will obstinately resent any rash interference with the harmony of his domestic arrangements."

It will be interesting to those who have the opportunity to compare the bridges of the Amati and Stradivarius violins with those now in use. It will be seen that the design settled on by them has been scarcely altered at all. Many think that the ornamental cutting of the bridge is merely a matter of taste. On the contrary, it is a necessity, as any deviation from it is at once injurious to the tone of the instrument.

It is difficult to imagine how a little piece of maple, which seems merely to keep the strings on the finger-board from touching, should have such a powerful effect on the tone of the instrument to which it is not even fastened; it is, as all know, kept in its place by the pressure of the strings.

Savart, whose many experiments have been an education to those who have studied them, tried a plain piece of wood for a bridge, and glued it on to the violin; the result was that it deprived the violin almost entirely of sound; it became better when he made legs to it, and better still when the lateral cuttings were made.

As the finger-board and the bridge have to keep on good terms one with the other, always obliging and never contradicting each other, we will take that piece next. It enjoys the distinction of being made of dry, well-seasoned ebony, which is the hardest of all wood. Sometimes, however, mountain ash is used, which is the next hardest, but it is easy to detect the substitute; for example, an impression can be made with the nail on the ash which is quite impossible on the ebony.

In former times the finger-boards were curiously ornamented by inlaying them with pearl, silver, and ivory, according to a design; but this ornamentation finds no favour in the present day, owing to the unpleasant jar, which is the result of the pieces getting loose; in fact, except as a curiosity this ornamentation is not a success.

The finger-board requires to be very carefully constructed, otherwise the strings jar against it, and the movement of the bow is impeded. It is glued on to the neck.

The nut or rest is the little piece of ebony over which the strings pass on to the finger-board. Its position is between the peg-box and the finger-board. Heron Allen says he was asked why the nut need be a piece separate from the finger-board, and as it was exactly what I wanted to know I will give his answer.

"It is of course that the grain of the finger-board being parallel to the tension of the strings, it could not stand the strain of the strings, but would become dented by them (it should be $\frac{1}{4}$ in. high and $\frac{5}{8}$ in. long) at the upper end. The nut is therefore placed at this point so that the strings, on leaving the peg-box, encounter only the cross-grained piece of ebony constituting the nut, on which they can make no impression as they would on the soft parallel grain of the finger-board."

The button, although apparently an insignificant little piece of the whole, is by no means unimportant, and requires great skill to make; it is to the violin what the keystone is to the arch; it gives vitality to the whole instrument. Many violins have been spoiled artistically for want of skill in forming this little piece. Its position is at the back, just where the heel of the neck rests.

And now a few words about the pegs, for everything is of importance if it have place at all in a violin. In a little room on the ground floor of the factory we saw hundreds of these little pegs, and as many of them had been some time in stock they had shrunk a little and become somewhat oval on one side, and several men were correcting this fault before they fitted them into the holes.

The best woods of which to make them are ebony and rosewood. Boxwood is not unfrequently used, but it is very inferior to the other two. Pegs have been made of horn and ivory, but were not satisfactory.

When pegs have worn smooth, so that they do not hold, they should be rubbed with chalk, and not with resin, in order to fix them. We have watched the construction of the violin thus far, and the compass and the file may rest after their labours; but it is still in what is called the white, that is to say, unvarnished.

Many are the opinions as to the efficacy of this process, but as all instruments are varnished, it will be interesting to us to know why and wherefore. First, there is no doubt that the varnish preserves the wood from the inclemency of the weather, and above all from the breath of the player. Without it no violin could attain old age, and the tone would lose sweetness and power. That is the common-sense view of the effect of the varnish, but that is only a very small part of the subject; there hangs about it an inscrutable mystery which has puzzled violin-makers for the last hundred and fifty years.

The exquisite tints of the old Cremona varnish, ranging from a yellow orange to a brown mahogany red, have never been equalled, nor can it be distinctly stated what the mixture was which produced them. It seems that for a century or more before the time of the Cremona makers, Italy was indebted for the few colouring and varnishing receipts which she possessed to the Jesuit Fathers, whose missionaries obtained them from India, China, and other places in the far East. It is supposed that two of the materials used were dragon's blood and sandal wood.

The first of these it is almost impossible to obtain now, it is a product of Dracena draco, and yielded resin of the finest quality; but whatever the materials and the secret of dissolving and mixing, all is lost, and we can only approach the truth. How many experiments have been made, how many restless nights and days of study have been given by violin-makers and chemists to recover the secret no one could say. Of one thing we are quite certain, viz., that varnish has a marked influence on the air, the wood, and the tone of a violin, if it be properly put on, but it is not easy to apply it so that you get the full benefit of it.

"Varnish," says a master, "must be a dress, not a muffler, and its office is to soften the sounds without obstructing them." A thick, fat varnish stops respiration, therefore it should be light, clear, and volatile, so that it may stretch without cracking, and cover without bending.

The pine of which the belly is made imbibes like a sponge, therefore the varnish must be free of those ingredients which would burn and calcine the sap. The varnish should never obscure the "clouded shadows" of the maple, or the veins of the pine. Those of us who possess a Cremona will notice that the veins of the wood can be seen as clearly through the varnish as through glass, and it is just the beauty and delicacy of this varnish that makes it so difficult to repair an old violin; it is almost sure to get rubbed or injured, and to replace it with nineteenth century varnish would be a barbarism not to be thought of.

We will leave the violin with its fresh varnish to dry until next month, when we hope to supply it with strings and a bow.

These articles are not to teach us to make with our own hands the violin, but to help us to understand all its parts, otherwise I would have gone into detail about the materials and mixing of the varnish; but those who desire more particulars cannot do better than study Heron Allen's book on violin-making.

"HOPING AND PRAYING FOR OTHERS."

IN SILENCE.

By HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

SHE hath wrought and suffered in silence
For many a weary year,
She hath borne the burdens of others,
And spoken brave words of cheer.

The world would have claimed her gladly,
For hers was the magic pen
Which painteth the poet's fancy,
And swayeth the hearts of men.

But God gave the gift of loving,
And her choice was the better part,
To gild the cold path of duty
With warmth from her own brave heart.

She hath laboured and loved in silence
For many a weary year,
Hoping and praying for others,
And speaking brave words of cheer.

But the heat of the day is over,
The toil of the journey past,
And the hands that have wrought are folded
On the heart that is cold at last.

She was willing to go, God knoweth;
Aye, "willing and glad," she said.
Weep not that the sweet soul goeth
To the home of the happy dead.

THE TWIN-HOUSES:

By ANNE BEALE, Author of "The Queen o' the May," "Restitution," etc.

PART IV.

HOME, SWEET HOME.

IN a small room in one of the overcrowded streets leading from Edgware Road to Lisson Grove a pathetic scene was enacting. A father and son, long separated, and parted in anger, were making peace. They sat side by side, the old man and the young, talking eagerly, while two women listened, and three children hung about their mother. There was no recrimination, no reproaches, nothing but joy and thankfulness at reunion. Gripson, senior, looked almost younger than Gripson, junior, so forcibly had care written his lines on the face of the latter. Question and answer followed so rapidly upon one another, that it would be difficult to put them upon paper, but their substance is soon told.

William had been reckless and ambitious, and in wishing to grasp too much had lost all. He had not been content to work up, but had expected fortune to come without labour. He was disappointed, and found that the New World was not different from the Old, and yielded no honest gains without honest endeavour; and with all his faults, William Gripson was honest. Failure had kept him silent, and the hope of bettering his fortunes had brought him back to England. A misleading advertisement for the foreman of a shop took him to Edgware Road, and he, his wife and children were about to be turned out of their lodging, when Divine Providence brought the sisters face to face. Ruth was in search of a friend they had known in Canada when they met; and William, sick, dejected and wretched, had remained with the children in their miserable lodging

"A shop. Will! Back to your ditch after all!" chuckled old Gripson, when he heard of the advertisement.

"Yes, father; I knew how to serve," replied the son, humbly.

"Ah, my boy, you're not the only one whose great expectations have ended small. But since you're no longer above the counter, we'll begin again at Merriton. You and Martin shall keep shop, and I'll look on and see you don't ruin me. We'll bring up the young ones to the trade, and the Gripsons will be as good a name in Merriton, I'll be bound, as any of the great clap-trap, advertising, monopolising firms either of New York or London. Shake hands upon it, my boy."

Father and son shook hands, and tears rolled down the cheeks of the penitent William. Seeing this, two of the three children crept towards him, and began to cry for company, as is the way of sympathetic childhood.

"Bless my soul! come to Granfer," said old Gripson; and, willing or unwilling, the boy and girl were pushed towards him. "Lucy, come and let's get 'em something to eat. They're as thin as whipping-posts," he added, stroking their heads. "Back in a minute," he cried, cheerily, getting up like a brisk three-year-old, and hurrying away, followed by Lucy.

They were soon in Edgware Road, buying pies, German sausages, and other edibles, enough to last a month.

"Anyone to prefer this choky, smoky, crowded, poverty-stricken place to bright, prosperous Merriton, baffles me," grumbled Gripson. "We must get 'em back at once, and Fred with 'em, I'll warrant he'll be content at the wharf when he gets better."

"I am afraid that will be far off," said Lucy. "But we have them all again, thank God!"

"Amen! Take care, or you'll be run over, Lucy! Nobody cares what becomes of 'ee here, while at Merriton you belong to everybody."

"Oh, but they do care, Mr. Gripson! Only think of Ruth, and the hospital, and the kind lady."

"To be sure. Through them I found my son; or through the grace of God."

They were soon at the lodging again. They found the table spread with such plates and knives and forks as were available. The carriage and the advent of visitors had given the landlady hope of her rent, and she volunteered to supply deficiencies. William and Ruth looked almost cheerful, and the children hungrily expectant. Lucy placed the good cheer on the table, and they all sat down to the meal.

"Bless their hearts, how they do eat!" said old Gripson, heaping mutton pies and slices of sausage on the children's plates.

They were abashed, and began to relax their efforts.

"Work away, my dears; the more you eat the better I shall be pleased," said their grandfather. "We'll all be off to Merriton to-morrow morning, and then you'll have enough and to spare."

"Not to-morrow, Mr. Gripson," pleaded Lucy. "We must prepare mother, and Ruth must go and see poor Fred."

"Oh! but Fred must come with us," said the old man.

Lucy explained that this was impossible, and that if Fred ever recovered, it must be some time before he could go home. She said she would stay behind, if only her present landlady would let her have her small bedroom cheap, and that she had still three weeks of her holidays left.

It was now William's turn to make inquiries. He did not know that Fred had followed his example, and left certainty for uncertainty. He was much cast down, and this news depressed him still more. He was one of those who are buoyant with hope and exultation till trouble tames them, and then it seems as if they could never be roused again. He began to reproach himself with Fred's faults, but Lucy said cheerily that everything had ended well, so it was no good to go over old ground. "Pressing on to those things which are before," she added, laying her hand kindly on his shoulder; and he strove to smile at her in return.

Lucy had enough to do the following day. In the first place she consulted with Dr. Pearson, who said that good news might rouse and cheer Fred, and that when she had broken the return of his friends to him, he would arrange for the interview. She also saw Mrs. Everard, who had taken a fancy to her, and volunteered help. Indeed, Lucy was herself so helpful and hopeful, that she could not fail to make friends. Unselfish people generally do make friends; and she never thought of self.

As may be supposed, Fred was much overcome when he heard of the return of William and Ruth. They were waiting below in the great hall, while Lucy told him the good news, and his natural impetuosity returned with it. He would get up at once and leave the hospital, and go back to Merriton with them. But he was restrained by physical bonds. He was too weak to move.

"We will soon follow them," said Lucy, gently.

"Ah, me! perhaps I shall never go home again," moaned he. "I wish I had never left it. Poor mother! Have I quite ruined you all?"

"Would you like to see Will and Ruth?" he asked, doubtfully, beckoning the nurse, who was not far off.

"Just for five minutes," replied the nurse, on a question from Lucy.

The meeting was truly affecting. The allotted time was so short that few words were spoken, but those few penetrated from heart to heart. The two men, wrung each other's hands, while the women strove to keep from weeping. The sufferers in the various beds round about looked on; but scenes are so common and so pathetic in the great hospitals, and each patient has his own pain to bear, that they vanish like phantasmagoria from before the sight. Even Death becomes a natural occurrence, where his scythe seems always ready. Strange that the Reaper should be waiting, whether the corn be ripe or no!

Lucy had written home to prepare her mother for the joy in store for her, and the next morning she and Gripson met the returned wanderers at Paddington Station. She would scarcely have recognised any of them, hope had so transfigured them. As to the children, they were frisky as lambs, and already leaped about Aunt Lucy. But they were not half as frisky as their grandfather, who said he had come to town to watch over one treasure, and had found five. "Five per cent.," he chuckled.

It must be confessed that the "cent." felt rather lonely when she watched the long Great Western train steam off. There was a great waving of hands and handkerchiefs for a few seconds, and then those so lately found again disappeared. Oh! how Lucy longed to be with them, and to be present at their reunion with her mother.

She hurried back to her wee lodging, and waited for the hour when she could be admitted to the hospital. She had not been there long, when the household slavey told her Mrs. Everard wanted to see her. What was she to do? She could not receive so fine a lady in her bedroom. She hurried downstairs, and found her in a parlour on the ground floor. She had generously come to inquire about Ruth, and to offer assistance. Lucy told her the whole story, simply and truthfully, and Mrs. Everard promised to facilitate her visits to her brother, and to aid in his removal from the hospital as soon as it could be done with safety.

In less than three weeks Fred was pronounced convalescent. Meanwhile Lucy, with Mrs. Everard's help, had collected what remained of his effects and transferred them to her lodging. Mrs. Everard had seen Herr Franz, and had learnt from him that to perfect Fred as a public singer required more time, teaching, and continuous practice than Fred chose to give, so he, like many others, had drifted into low and scarcely respectable places of amusement. Herr Franz had lost sight of him. Not so Mrs. Everard. She looked after her protégés until her carriage conveyed them to the station, and she in turn saw them off. Let us thank God that there are many ladies of position in our vast metropolis always ready and willing to succour those in distress. Mrs. Everard is but a type of these truly Christian women. It is needless to say that Lucy and Fred expressed unbounded gratitude for such unexpected and undeserved kindness.

Fred bore the journey tolerably well. Lucy had written to beg that no outside friends should be apprised of their arrival, and that no one should meet them at the train. Fred had a nervous terror of being seen and of being looked upon as a failure. In vain Lucy tried to convince him that what seem failures are often only the beginnings of true success. He had learnt much during his long illness, but it takes time and the teachings of God's Holy Spirit to acquire by heart the lessons of resignation and contentment.

It was quite dark when the fly drove up to our twin-houses. They appeared to be illuminated to Fred's excited imagination.

"What a waste of candles!" he said, which was his first attempt at a joke, and enchanted Lucy.

His mother and Martin were at the door to receive them, and her warm embrace and his brother's "All right, old fellow, since you are safe at home again," were more acceptable at the moment than could have been the applause of a multitude.

"You will set the chimney alight!" was his second attempt at a joke, as he stood over a huge fire, and rubbed his poor thin hands, while tears filled his eyes.

Mother and son were alone for a few minutes while the others were seeing to portmanteau and carpet-bag, and such other luggage—a large package of music inclusive—as remained of Fred's small possessions.

"My dear boy! I was too desirous of your worldly advancement," said Mrs. Oliver, taking the blame on herself, if blame there were.

"And I of my own glorification," said Fred. "It will be long before I am able to sing again, if ever. I have quite lost my voice."

"But Mr. Holford says there is another post for you at the wharf," ventured his mother.

Further talk was interrupted by the entrance of Ruth, who was followed by her husband and Mr. Gripson. They all looked bright and happy, and welcomed him home with such joyful warmth that he broke down in their midst and almost sobbed. They carried him off to the other small room, where a feast was prepared, which was old Gripson's contribution to the family reunion. Never was grace more fervently said, or thankfulness more sincerely felt.

"No room for the children," said old Gripson, rubbing his hands. "Let's fall to, Fred, you must eat, and you'll soon be as stout as Will. He weighs pounds more than when he came home, and begins to agree with me that there's no place either abroad or at home like Merriton."

"That I do, Fred," said William. "I've taken to the shop with a good grace, having seen how thankful better men than I were to earn a small livelihood by selling at the stores in America."

William Gripson had learnt his lesson so thoroughly, that he was capable of imparting it; and he and Fred glanced at one another, as much as to say, experience is the best teacher.

"Where is Lucy?" was the general cry.

Lucy had gone off to the twin-house to see the children, and was talking to them and the old housekeeper.

"We are all alive again," said the latter. "The house is chockfull, and master is as happy as the day."

It certainly was chockfull, and as Lucy ran over it, forgetful of her meal, she saw that every room was utilised, and as neat as Ruth's thankful care could make them. She took the children back with her, bidding them stay in the empty parlour awhile. They were full of talk, and told her how they went to school, and how grandfather gave them sweets and toys, and how they played and ran races in garden and orchard.

"It is delightful!" cried Lucy, as she burst into the dining-parlour, and rushed up to old Gripson and kissed him.

There was a general laugh as the old man declared he felt much flattered.

"Why, you are the very kindest man in the world," she continued, excitedly. "And we used to think you —" she paused.

"Say it out, Lucy. No secrets. We're a family party. 'Tis easy to be kind when one has it all one's own way. But your mother and I are going to keep a sharp look-out upon all you young people. We don't mean to let any of you go away again; except for a good match. I suppose we must allow that, eh, Mrs. Oliver? Where are the children?"

Lucy fetched them, and the family party was complete.

It remains only to be told that so much of the future as can be settled by finite understanding was settled that evening. Fred declared his willingness to resume work at the wharf when well enough, and William his satisfaction at being enrolled his father's partner. Martin was to have a share of the business, and the twin-houses were still to hold the increased inmates. The boy had already taken up his partial abode with his grandmother, and was still to find a corner in her house, while his father's old smoking den had been converted into a sleeping apartment for the little girls.

"I am going to build a room at the back," said old Gripson.

"Then we shall all be ruined," broke in Fred, which was his third attempt at a joke, and caused his mother to rejoice, and Mr. Gripson to call him a young scamp.

If there is a beautiful sight in this world, it is a happy family party, and not the least happy, perhaps, are those whose joy is tempered by the wisdom which springs from the mistakes and sorrows of the past, and the sobered hope of the future.

As Lucy devoutly said to her mother, "We could not have brought it about of ourselves; it is all due to the grace of God."

A VERY PRETTY AND INEXPENSIVE QUILT.

quilt, by simply doubling the Andalusian and trebling the Shetland.

The effect of the variety of colours, worked in haphazard, is charming; and nothing could be better for the nursery or for the homes of the poor than these quilts, made of odd pieces of wool, which are at once bright, beautiful, and healthful.

An advantage is that they are made in small pieces and can be taken up at any moment without inconvenience. Should a quilt be wanted in a hurry, twenty people could work at it without any harm to the appearance of it when finished.

making of this affords an opportunity of using up odd lengths of wool of whatever kind or colour.

Berlin, Scotch finger, Andalusian, and even Shetland may be used in the same

It is extremely simple to make. First make a chain of six stitches and join it. Into this little ring work sixteen treble, and fasten off. This forms a little star, say of blue. Now, with pink, yellow, or indeed any colour, work two treble in between the second and third of the sixteen blue stitches. Miss two and work four. Miss two again and work in two treble, and so on till you get to the end of the blue circle. Fasten off.

You have in this outer line four corners of four stitches each, and one two on each side, so that the circle has become a square.

Now take another colour, red if you please, and work two treble between the four and the two and between the two and the four, and in the midst of the four at each corner work four treble, and so on until you get round, when the sides will contain two twos each independent of the four at each corner. Fasten off.

So far the worker can make use of any colour she pleases, but in the next row, which is the last, she must use black, and the stitches are in single crochet, not treble.

Work two stitches into every space with a chain of one between. Arriving at the corners, make one stitch of single crochet between the second and third of the four, then a chain of three and another stitch of single crochet into the same place, and so on till you have worked round, when you will have three twos on each side in addition to the corners.

Secure the wool, and your square is complete.

When two or more of these are made it would be well to join them.

Take one in your left hand, holding the right side of the work towards you; having a stitch on the hook, pass it through the right-hand corner loop and draw the wool through with a stitch of single crochet; then take a second square and put the wrong side of it face to face with the wrong side of the one in your hand, and secure the right-hand corners of each square firmly together. Continue to join by passing your hook first through the little chain of one square and then to the corresponding chain of the other till you arrive at the left-hand corners, which you will secure in the same manner as you did the right-hand corners—not both together, but first one and then the other. A great deal of the prettiness of the quilt depends upon the way you join these squares; if well done it makes a raised ridge between each side of every square.

It is possible to arrange the squares into patterns, but I think it is more effective if they are put together without regard to plan or colour.

When the quilt is large enough cut up your odd wool into certain lengths and fringe it. I put four lengths into each stitch.

It not only makes pretty quilts, but antimacassars, bassinette-covers, and covers for perambulators.

A PERPLEXED MOTHER.

I HAVE one daughter, for whom I am straining every nerve to procure the advantages of a good education. She has a pretty taste for music and singing, and I am also anxious that she should have the benefit of good masters for these accomplishments. But before going further I must state that I am obliged to live in a large house, and that my income and staff of servants are equally limited.

It is therefore essential that the domestic machinery should work with order and regularity, and not by fits and starts; but unfortunately the supply of oil for keeping the same machinery in good working order is sometimes difficult to purchase.

This of course makes it the more necessary that all the household affairs be well and quickly done, that no time be lost in looking for things that ought to be in their right places, and that no work be left for the morrow that can and ought to be done to-day.

Now my daughter Dorinda, aged eighteen, is an excellent girl in many respects; a girl who can be thoroughly trusted, and a general favourite; but she has one fault, which to an old-fashioned person like myself is a trial. She lacks the qualities of neatness and order, and this failing I attribute in a great measure to the present system of school education.

There appears to be no time in school-life for the practice of the virtues of tidiness and regularity; everything is at high pressure, and it is therefore plain to all that the girls can have neither leisure nor inclination to attend properly to their wardrobe. Their clothing is not properly repaired, and their cupboards are in a state which I have heard described as "making hay," and when a collar or a ribbon, etc., is needed, it appears almost necessary to rake through the contents to find the missing articles. At the last the owner considers herself fortunate, if at the end of a wasted ten minutes she contrives to find what she needs. I will not say anything about the condition of the gloves, ribbons, etc. Many good clothes are thus rendered unsightly in appearance, and what is much worse, habits of untidiness are formed which in later years are not easily eradicated. And when a girl leaves her mother's home for one of her own, she finds it almost impossible to manage her household on the old lines of system and regularity.

I have questioned Dorinda closely, and she tells me that when at school it is (as I have suspected) a constant scramble to have all lessons ready in time for the various masters, that all other matters go "anyhow." When work is over, the girls are too tired to think or care for anything but their well-earned rest.

Euclid takes the place of stocking mending, and algebra entirely does away with the necessity of sewing on buttons. Most desirable as all these things are, surely they should not supplant in a girl's education the learning how to use her needle, and how to keep her possessions (be they few or many) in such order that she can at any time find what she may require?

In these days but comparatively few mothers can afford to keep a maid for their daughters, so we may put them out of the question. The majority of girls have to wait upon themselves, and probably when they leave school have to keep the household linen and their brothers and sisters' clothing in order.

It would therefore be desirable if a little daily time were given through the years of education to such matters, which I cannot help thinking are not of minor importance. I believe that, by doing this, when a girl leaves school much friction of time and temper may be avoided, not to mention that important factor in our lives, the saving of money.

But Dorinda, dear girl, has just brought me some creditable "stitchery," and further promises that when she leaves school she will relieve me of much care in household matters, and also find ample time for reading, music, etc., varied by lawn-tennis and other pleasant amusements. I am looking forward to this epoch with feelings of great satisfaction, knowing well that when Dorinda acquires the virtues of neatness and order, she will remove a heavy burden from the shoulders of her perplexed mother.

OUR BESSIE.

CHAPTER XXIV.
IN THE COOMBE WOODS.

BREAKFAST was a more difficult affair than it had been on the preceding morning, and Edna, who was very quick-witted, soon saw there was something amiss with Bessie; but she was a kind-hearted girl, and she threw herself with such animation into the conversation, that Bessie's silence was unnoticed.

When the meal was finished Bessie withdrew to her room, and Edna would have followed her, but just then Richard came in and begged her in a low voice to get rid of Miss Shelton for half an hour, as he wanted to speak to her and her mother, and then in a moment Edna guessed the truth.

Bessie remained a long time alone. She had finished her letter to her mother and had just taken up her work before Edna came in search of her.

Edna looked excited, and there were tears in her eyes as she kissed Bessie.

"You naughty little thing," she said, trying to laugh; "whoever would have thought of you and Ritchie falling in love with each other!

I don't think I have ever been more surprised in my life."

"I was surprised too," replied Bessie, naively. "Dear Edna, are you very much shocked?"

"Not at all. On the whole, I am very much pleased at the idea of having you as a sister. I fell in love with you myself, Bessie. I told Ritchie that, so I ought not to be so surprised that he has followed my example. I am not quite sure that he is good enough for you. I suppose you think he is," doubtfully.

"Yes, indeed; it is I who am not good enough for him," replied Bessie, blushing, and looking so pretty that Edna hugged her again.

"You are very kind to me, Edna, but I am afraid your mother will not be pleased about this," and then Edna's face grew somewhat grave.

"No, Bessie, she is not; and she is very hard upon poor Richard as usual, and I had to take his part. Mamma is very proud, and that is why she approved so much of Neville, because he belongs to county people, and is his uncle's heir. Neville will be terribly rich one day."

"And I am poor!" in a troubled voice.

"Yes, but Richard has plenty of money, and as I tell mamma, I cannot see what that matters. You are a lady, Bessie; your mother is a perfect gentlewoman; and as for Dr. Lambert, mamma knows what he is—she cannot say a word against him. She says she is very fond of you personally, but all the same she does not want Richard to marry you. You see," hesitating a little, "mamma will have to leave the Grange when Ritchie marries, and she does not like the idea of that; but as Richard justly said, his father hoped he would marry early, and he had a right, like any other man, to take a wife when he wishes. Of course mamma has not a grain of right on her side, but she chooses to be angry with Richard because he has been down to Cliffe and settled everything without reference to her; she says it is the way he always treats her."

"I think I will go to your mother, Edna. Is—is your brother with her?"

"Yes, I believe so; but they are not talking now. Ritchie sent me to you. Must you go, Bessie dear? Mamma will not be a bit nice to you."

"I cannot help that, but I am as much to blame as your brother is, and I shall not leave him to bear the brunt of it all." And though Bessie looked a little pale as she said this, she carried out her resolve, much to Mrs. Sefton's astonishment.

Richard met her at once, and took her hand.

"I have told my mother, Bessie," he said, in a clear, high voice, that was a little defiant.

"Yes, I know now, when everything is arranged," returned Mrs. Sefton, in an injured tone.

"Dear Mrs. Sefton," said Bessie, gently, "nothing was settled until this morning. Mr. Sefton took me by surprise yesterday, and I was hardly prepared. Indeed, I had no answer to give him until this morning, so not an hour has been lost."

"My mother knows all that," interrupted Richard, "but I cannot convince her no offence is intended. Mother, I think you might give Bessie a kinder reception; she has promised to marry me, and I think my future wife should be treated with consideration and respect."

"No, no; how can you talk so?" interrupted Bessie, for the young man spoke in a fiery manner. "Mrs. Sefton, please don't listen to him. You shall treat me as you will; but I shall always remember how good you have been to me. Of course you are not pleased with a poor girl like me; but you will be kind to me all the same, will you not, and I will try to follow all your wishes. It is not your son's fault either," very shyly, but trying to speak out bravely, "for he could not help caring for me, I suppose. Do, do try to forgive us both, and be kind to him." And here Bessie faltered and broke down.

Nothing could have been better than Bessie's little impetuous speech. Mrs. Sefton was a proud, ambitious woman, but she was not wholly without feelings, and she had always been fond of Bessie. The girl's sweetness and humility, her absence of all assumption, the childlike way in which she threw herself upon her womanly kindness, touched Mrs. Sefton's cold heart, and she kissed the wet flushed cheek.

"Don't cry, Bessie. I suppose as things are settled we must just make the best of them. Richard put me out, and I said more than I meant. I was not pleased. I think I ought to have been consulted at least, not left so wholly in the dark."

"I am very sorry, mother, but you have never invited my confidence," replied Richard; but his lips quivered as he spoke.

"Yes, but you will be kinder to him now," and Bessie looked imploringly at her; "indeed, he has always loved you, but you have repelled him so. Richard," very softly, "will you not tell your mother that you mean to be good to her?"

Mrs. Sefton looked up, and her eyes met her stepson's.

"It was not my fault, mother," he said, with suppressed emotion.

Bessie thought that he was speaking of their engagement; but Richard's words conveyed a different meaning to his stepmother's ears. He was going back to the past. Again he saw himself a shy, nervous boy, standing before the proud, handsome girl who had just become his father's wife. "He can never be anything to me," he heard her say; and her low, bitter tones lingered long in his ears. "If I had known of his existence it might have been different; but now—" and she turned away with a gesture of dislike.

"Ritchie, my boy, you must ask this lady to forgive us both," his father had observed rather sadly.

How well Richard remembered that little scene. The discomfited expression of his father's face; his own puzzled, childish feelings. All these years he had suffered the consequences of his father's rash act. "He can never be anything to me," she had said, and her words had come true.

"Mother, it was not my fault," he said, looking into her eyes. And for the first time she quailed before that sad, reproachful gaze; it seemed to compel her to acknowledge the truth.

"No, Richard, it was your father's; it was he who estranged us," she returned slowly. "I was not the woman to forgive deceit. I wish, I wish things could have been different."

"They shall be different," he replied, gently, "if you will have it so, mother; it is not too late yet;" and though she did not answer, and there was no response to that burst of generous feeling, there was something in her face that gave Richard hope; neither did she repulse him when he stooped over her and kissed her.

"Try to make the best of me," he said, and Mrs. Sefton sighed, and left her hand in his.

Richard took Bessie out with him after that; he was agitated and dispirited by the interview with his stepmother, and needed all the comfort Bessie could give him.

"It is very hard to bear," were his first words, when he found himself alone with her.

"Yes, it is very hard," she replied, gently; "but you behaved so well, it made me so proud to hear you," and Richard felt a glow of satisfaction at her words.

"You were beside me, helping me all the time," he said, simply. "Bessie, if you only knew what it is to me to be sure of your sympathy! My little blessing, I think you were born to be a peacemaker. It was you who softened my mother's heart; before you came in she was so hard, and said such bitter things, and then I lost my temper, and—"

"Do not go back to that," she said, quietly. "Your mother was taken by surprise. She said herself that she spoke hastily. Let us give her time. She cannot alter her nature all at once. You have been very patient a long time, Richard; be patient still for my sake."

"There is nothing I would not do for your sake," he replied, and Bessie was pleased to see him smile. After all it was not difficult to comfort him; the cloud soon passed away from his face, and in a little while they were talking as happily together as though no unkind words had been said.

They had a quiet, peaceful Sunday together, and then Richard went back to Oatlands, on the understanding that he was to return on Wednesday night and take Bessie down to Cliffe the next day.

Bessie was not sorry to be left alone for two days to realise her own happiness; but all the same, she was glad to welcome him back again on Wednesday, though she was secretly amused when Richard declared those two days of absence had been intolerably long; still she liked to hear him say it.

It was a happy evening to Bessie when she saw Richard for the first time in her own dear home, making one of the family circle, and looking as though he had been there for years. How kindly they had all greeted him! She saw by her mother's expression how pleased and excited she was. She took the young man under her motherly wing at once, and petted and made much of him; and it was easy to see how proud her father was of his son-in-law elect. Bessie thought she had never seen Richard to such advantage before. There was no awkwardness in his manner, he was alert, cheerful, and at his ease, ready to talk to Christine or to the younger girls, and full of delicate little attentions to his fiancée.

"A fine manly fellow!" observed Dr. Lambert, as he wished his daughter good-night. "You have won a prize, my girl; I am thoroughly satisfied with my future son-in-law," and Bessie blushed and smiled over her father's encomium.

But the most comfortable moment was when she had her mother to herself, for Mrs. Lambert had stolen upstairs after Bessie.

"Oh, mother, this is what I wanted," she said, drawing her mother down into the low chair beside the fire, and kneeling on the rug beside her. "How good of you to come up to me. I was so longing for a talk."

"I think your father wanted Mr. Sefton to himself, so I left them together."

"You must call him Richard," corrected Bessie; "he wants you to do so. It was so nice to see him with you to-night; he will never want a mother now. You like him, do you not?" rather shyly.

"Yes, indeed, we all like him; there is something so genuine about him. My darling, I have not felt so happy since our poor Hatty's death."

"I think she would have been pleased about this, mother; it is the one drop of bitterness in my cup of happiness that her congratulations are missing. You were all so dear and kind to me and to Richard too; but I missed my Hatty," and Bessie leant against her mother's shoulder, and shed a few quiet tears.

"I think I must tell you something," returned her mother, soothingly. "Dear little Hatty used to talk in the strangest way sometimes. One night when she had been very ill, and I was sitting beside her, she told me that she had had such a funny dream about you—that you and Mr. Sefton were going to be married, and that she had seen you dressed in white, and looking so happy, and then she said very wistfully, 'Supposing my dream should come true, mother, and our Bessie really married him, how nice that would be;' and she would speak of it more than once, until I was obliged to remind her that I never cared to talk of such subjects, and that I did not like my girls to talk of them either. 'But all the same, mother, Bessie will not be an old maid,' she persisted with such a funny little smile, and then she left off to please me."

"How strange," replied Bessie, thoughtfully. "I must tell Richard that; he was so kind about Hatty. Mother, is it not nice to be able to tell someone all one's thoughts, and be sure of their interest? That is how I begin to feel about Richard. He is always so kind and patient, and ready to hear everything, and he never laughs nor turns things into fun as Tom does; and he is so clever, he knows things of which I am quite ignorant," and Bessie rambled on in an innocent girlish way of her lover's perfections, while her mother listened with a smile, remembering her own young days.

"She is very simple," she said to her husband that night; "she thinks only of him; she does not seem to remember that he is rich, and that one day she will be mistress of the Grange. That is so like our Bessie, she always goes to the heart of things."

"I am very much pleased with him," replied Dr. Lambert; "he is just as unsophisticated in his way as Bessie is in hers. You would have liked to have heard him, Dora; he seems to think there is no one like her. 'She is worth a dozen of me,' he said, and he meant it, too."

Richard spent several days at Cliffe, and they were golden days to him and Bessie. On the last evening they went out together, for in the Lamberts' crowded household there was little quiet for the lovers, and Richard had pleaded for one more walk. "I shall not see you for six whole weeks," he said, disconsolately; and as usual Bessie yielded to his wishes.

They climbed up by the quarry into the Coombe Woods, and walked through the long green alleys that seemed to stretch into space. The Coombe Woods were a favourite trysting place for young couples, and many a village lad and lass carried on their rustic courtship there. The trees were leafless now, but the February sky was soft and blue, and the birds were twittering of the coming spring.

"And Edna is to be married in June," observed Bessie, breaking the silence. "I am glad Mrs. Sefton has given her consent."

"I suppose they gave her no option," replied Richard. "I knew when Sinclair went down on Saturday that he would settle something. Edna would not be likely to refuse him anything just now. You will have to be her bridesmaid, Bessie, so I am sure of some rides with you in June."

"Dear old Whitefoot! I shall be glad to mount him again."

"I shall get you a better horse before next winter, Whitefoot is growing old—Bessie, I ought not to be dissatisfied when you have been so good to me, but do you not think it would be possible to induce your father to change his mind?"

Bessie did not pretend to misunderstand his meaning; she only said gently—

"No, Richard, and I do not think it would be right to ask him;" and then she added, "You know dear Hatty will only have been dead a year."

"Yes, I see what you mean," he replied, slowly, "and I must not be selfish; but next October is a long time to wait, Bessie."

"It will not seem so," she answered, brightly, "and we must not hurry your mother; there will be Edna's marriage in June, and my visit to the Grange, and every now and then you will come here."

"Yes, and there will be my mother to settle in her new house—you see what Edna says in her letter, that they have decided not to separate, that means that my mother will take a house at Kensington. Well, I daresay that will be for the best; but when my mother goes, the Grange will want its mistress."

"It will not want her long," she said, very gently, "and Richard, dear, you have promised not to be impatient. Mother is not ready to part with me yet. I shall not like to think of you being lonely in that big house; but it will not be for long."

"And after all, I shall not be lonely," he returned, for he was not to be outdone in unselfishness. "I shall be getting the house ready for you, and the new mare. Oh, and there will be a hundred things to do, and in the evenings I shall talk to Mac about his new mistress, and he will look up in my face with his wise, deep-set eyes, as though he understood every word, and was as glad as I was that October would soon come."

"Poor old Mac!" she exclaimed, and there was a soft colour in her face as she interrupted him. "You must give him a pat from me, and to all the dear dogs—Leo, and Gelert, and Brand, and Bill Sykes—we must not forget Bill Sykes—and Tim, and Spot, and tell them—" And then she stopped and looked at him with a smile.

"What shall I tell them?" he asked, coaxingly, "that you will be glad, too, when October comes?"

"If you like," she answered, quietly, "you may tell them that; but, Richard, when I think of the future, it is all like a dream. I cannot imagine that the dear old Grange is to be my home."

"You will find it very real," he replied. "Think what walks we shall have on Sunday afternoons with Bill Sykes and his companions, and when you go into the drawing-room to make tea, Tim and Spot will not be left outside."

"Wait a moment, Richard, look at that sunset," and Bessie pointed to the western heavens, which were bathed in a glow of golden light. They had reached the end of the wood; a wide stretch of country lay before them. How still and quiet it was; even the birds' twitterings had ceased. Bessie's eyes grew soft and wistful; the sunset glories had reminded her of Hatty in her far-off home.

Down below them lay the bay, like a sea of glass mingled with fire. "Thank God all is well with my Hatty!" she thought, and then she turned to Richard with a gentle smile, and they went slowly back through the wood again, talking quietly of the days that were to be.

[THE END.]

BIRD LIFE IN APRIL.

By A NATURALIST

"See the birds together,
In this splendid weather, Worship God—for He is God of birds as well as men—
And each feathered neighbour
Enters on his labour,
Sparrow, robin, redpole, finch, the linnet and the wren."

William Howitt.

THE birds appear to have come all at once, and their voices seem to tell that they are rejoicing that the warm showers and sunshine of April have succeeded to the cold winds of March. The green woodpecker shouts out his "Yike, yike!" making the old woods echo with it. You hear his tap, tap, tap on the tree-trunk, and then his laugh rings out again. The sound made by the black and white woodpecker, as he rattles on the dead branch or limb of a tree, is very different. That can be heard full half a mile away, and it is more like the roll on a side drum played by a skilful drummer than anything else. The nuthatch, or nut-jobber—so named because he hacks or hews at the nuts which he eats—ripples out his full notes as he runs nimbly about the tree-trunks and branches; while the wryneck—the cuckoo's mate, he is called—shouts out his "Peet, pee, peet!" This little bird, which is singular in its movements and plumage, always precedes the cuckoo a few days most regularly. It lives on ants and insects, which it finds hiding in the bark of trees, drawing them out by the sharp, hard tip of its long tongue. When the wryneck halts in his "Peet, pee, peet!" the cuckoo chimes in with his well-known note, "Cuckoo, cuckoo, cuc!"

The blackbirds flute it merrily, assisted by thrushes—the song thrush, and his stronger-voiced relative the missel thrush. The chaffinch "twinks, twinkles!" sets up his topknot, and sings his very best to his mate that is sitting near him. Even the hedge sparrow and the wren sing well, although few would give them credit for it. Green finches or green linnets, as they are sometimes called, utter their long-drawn notes as they sit high up in the trees.

On the slender branch of a young beech just bursting into leaf a little bird is fluttering here and there, more like a butterfly than a bird. It is the chif-chaff, or least willow wren. Listen to his simple song of chif-chef-chef-chif-chef! His larger and very near relative is on the same tree, but higher up a-top. The wood wren is a member of the same family, only he is of more retiring disposition. Strange that such delicate little birds should brave the long journey they must perform before our shores are gained.

Swallows and martins flash over meadows and streams, also that beautiful bird the kingfisher.

The moorhen glides in and out of the flags with cautious steps, jerking her tail about continually. No doubt her nest is near. Jackdaws, that live in the old trees close to the river, salute each other loudly. They are in a state of great activity in the early morning. A knowing, bright, handsome fellow is the jackdaw; what he does to get into bad odour with the keepers is best known to himself. I only know that after Master Jack has retired to rest, a man with a stick in one hand and a gun under his arm comes round, and with his stick raps the trunk of the old, dying tree where Jack is snugly asleep in one of the numerous holes. Poor Jack thinks his castle is coming down; and, coming out to see what is the matter, gets shot for his pains.

Ringdoves or woodpigeons soar and float about over the tops of the trees with wings and tails expanded. They are showing off, as they always do about nesting-time. The crow of the pheasant and the call of the partridge greet your ear as you walk down the road that runs by the copse, covered on the outskirts with bluebells and primroses. Homes and sanctuaries for all bird-life are these coppices. The jay loves them dearly. Always a handsome fellow, he is particularly so just now. Stand quiet, hidden within the trunk of this old yew. "Squak, squak!" He is near somewhere, but apparently a little suspicious. Perhaps he saw something of us as we turned off the road. "Quek, quek! Chatter, chatter!" There he is by the side of his mate, rehearsing his love song, with his crest raised, his splendid blue-barred wing drooped a little, and his broad tail spread out. No doubt his mate thinks his vocal performance something wonderful, though to our ears it sounds like the low creak of a wheelbarrow and the quick smatter of a duck when feeding. When he wishes to creep near to something, on the forage, he is quiet enough; you never hear a sound from him when he visits a cottage garden. He has a bad name for plundering; but he is no worse than other birds at that, only being large and handsome he attracts more notice. The sparrow-hawk waits on him to his great terror, making him chatter and squall his loudest.

Close to the lower end of the copse is a willow holt, sheltered by thick hedges and banks heavily timbered. Here the sedge warbler and the blackheaded bunting chatter and warble, finding it pleasantly warm and moist. From the branch of an oak a bird springs, singing as he flies, ascending and descending, returning to the same spot he started from. It is the tree-pipit, or tree-lark, pouring out his thanks for the glad, bright spring-time.

VARIETIES.

TOO FAMILIAR.

We may be too familiar with our friends. This is strongly and wisely insisted on in the following lines at the end of an epigram in the twelfth book of Martial:—

"Friendship's fair commerce to enjoy,
And keep the bright ore from alloy,
E'en with your warmest friend preserve
A cautious and discreet reserve.
Each fond encroaching thought restrain,
Your pleasure less and less your pain."

THE TRAVELS OF A POST-CARD.

A gentleman in London, on the 8th June of last year, sent a post-card, via the Brindisi and Suez Canal route, to Hong Kong, with the request to a friend there that it might be sent back to him via San Francisco and New York.

The card was duly received by the original sender on the morning of the 17th of August, the time taken in its transit round the world being exactly seventy days, which is about forty days less than the time taken ten years ago. The card was franked for the modest sum of 3½d.

INDEPENDENCE.

Socrates having received some very rich presents from his pupil Alcibiades, a friend remarked to him, "How happy he must be who has received such desirable gifts."

"He is much happier," replied the sage, "who does not desire them," and he immediately ordered the presents to be returned.

AN ANTIQUARY IN ERROR.

A famous antiquary—an enthusiast in the search for Roman antiquities—was travelling through England, when he heard that on a certain hill there was a stile called "Cæsar's stile." "Just so," thought the antiquary to himself; "such a road, mentioned in Antoninus, passed near here, and the traditional name of this stile confirms me in the opinion that there was a Roman camp on this spot."

Whilst he was surveying the prospect a peasant came up whom the antiquary addressed. "They call this Cæsar's stile, do they not?"

"Ees, zur," said the man, "they calls it so ar'ter poor old Bob Cæsar, the carpenter: I helped him to make it when I was a boy."

THE MUSIC OF THE FUTURE.

She stood by the open window, and as her father came into the room she put her finger on her lips and bade him hush. Then, as the last notes of a lawn mower in the adjoining washing green died away, she turned with a look of rapture on her face.

"Oh, papa," she said, "isn't Wagner's music simply exquisite!"

OBSCURE HEROES AND HEROINES.—Not a day passes over the earth but men and women of no note do great deeds, speak great words, suffer noble sorrows. Of these obscure heroes, philosophers, and martyrs, the greater part will never be known till that hour when many that are great shall be small and the small great.

—Charles Reade.

LOVE, FAITH, HOPE, AND MEMORY.

No steep is hard for Love's white feet to climb,
And faith is but ambition purified,
And hope and memory would still be sweet,
Though every other joy were quite denied.

—Lowell.

EDUCATIONAL.

17TH ANEMONE.—War was declared by England and France against Russia, March 28, 1854. The expedition against the Crimea sailed from Varna in September, and landed near Sebastopol. The battle of the Alma was fought September 20th. 2. Prince Bismarck is the Prime Minister of Germany.

LEON, Miss A. DUKE.—Your letter was unfortunately mislaid, or should have been answered long ago. In case you have not already obtained the addresses of institutions for the oral teaching of the deaf, we give the following: The Training College for Teachers of the Deaf, at Castle Bar Hill, Ealing, W—principal, Arthur Kinsey, Esq.; Private School for Upper-class Children (deaf)—principal, Miss Hull, Woodvale, Parkhurst Road, Bexley, Kent; St. John of Beverley's Institution for Deaf and Dumb, Boston Spa, Tadcaster. There are several more, but you could obtain particulars which may assist you to what you require. Possibly, although an adult, Miss Hull might take you into residence for a time, or you might obtain a teacher whom you could take into residence with yourself from Mr. Kinsey.

OLIVE WYAILLE.—Could you not join a correspondence class, and prepare for the Senior Cambridge Exam. in that way? You say nothing about your home life, or where you live, so it is difficult to advise you. If you reside in London a training School would be best.

HOUSEKEEPING.

ONE WHO IS VERY ANXIOUS must, we think, make a clean breast of her troubles to her mother, and leave her to deal with the matter. If the accounts be forthcoming and correct, she need have no fear, and should not delay, as something unpleasant might happen with the creditors.

PERPLEXITY, we fear, can do nothing except speak to the man who put the gilding on the plate. The cold water treatment of a wet compress, or towel, wrapped round the throat and kept on for an hour or so, is sometimes found strengthening.

JINNIE ROOKES, FRESHWATER DAISY, MAY, MARY B., HANDMAID, PUZZLED MATRON AND OTHERS have all written to inquire for the method of giving the wonderful gloss to be seen on shirts got up by a first-class laundress. The following is the method of a French laundress: Take two ounces of borax to half a pound of starch; put the borax into a small saucepan, and just cover with water. Simmer till all the borax be melted, prepare the starch as usual by mixing with a little cold water till smooth; pour on the boiling water, then add the borax, and at last a teaspoonful of turpentine. Stir until cool enough to use. Dip the linen into the mixture (each article separately); squeeze the hot starch out, and then dip into clear cold water and wring dry. Spread the things out on a clean cloth, roll up tightly, and let them remain thus a few hours. If cold starch be used, the things may be ironed immediately. The approximate allowance for ordinary starch is two ounces to one quart of water. A piece of wet linen must be kept at hand, to be used in case the things become soiled or dry. Some laundresses use a mixture of white wax one ounce, spermaceti two ounces, and one tablespoonful of salt; dissolve on the fire. Make boiled starch as usual, and to every ounce of dry starch allow a bit of the mixture as big as a cherry, and put in when the starch is hot.

MUSIC.

PANJO.—Judging from the banjos in the shop windows you can obtain them at any price; and also lessons as well. We should advise your inquiring for yourself. An article on the banjo is in the "G.O.P." for February, page 132, vol. x.

LUCIE might find gargling with a weak solution of alum and water of use, if the throat be relaxed; or catechu lozenges; but your singing master had better be consulted.

JOSEPH SPINK.—Frederick Francis Chopin was a Pole, born at Warsaw, March, 1809. He was exiled after the Revolution of 1830, and went to live in Paris. His music was much admired there, but his health was delicate, and he was much depressed in spirits. He visited England in 1848, where he was cordially received, but the journey seems to have exhausted him, and he died in Paris, October, 1849. His music is full of poetry and imagination.

SAMUEL WELLER.—The Choregus was the Athenian citizen appointed to provide the various choruses that took part in the festive and religious celebrations. The Choregus who best discharged his duties received a tripod as a prize. He paid himself, however, the cost of the tripod, and also for erecting a chapel in which it was dedicated. One street in Athens was called the "Street of the Tripods," because it contained so many of these monuments; whence the name "Choragic monuments."

MISCELLANEOUS.

BEATIE.—We sympathise most truly with you, and trust that your peace and even "happiness," thus crippled and bedridden as you are, may be attributed to your Christian faith, and that good hope in our blessed Lord's redemption-work, which must bring gladness and peace to the most suffering of His children. We are unable to pronounce an opinion on the ailment from which your sister's children are suffering. Your writing does you credit, more especially as you cannot sit up.

A SOLDIER'S HEARTSEASE.—All girls—of all ages and conditions, and of every nationality—are included by us in the designation "Our Girls," whether subscribers themselves or not. They are all welcome to any advice, sympathy, or gratification in our power to give them. "Ida" is a woman's name, and is Greek, and may denote "seeing." As a historical English name it is merely a diminutive of "Idonia," which is of doubtful derivation. Perhaps it is Celtic, and in this case (as we before observed in our articles on "Girls' Christian Names") it may mean "The Island Mountain." It is sometimes spelt "Idonea"; "Edna" is a variation of the name. It dates from the year 1228.

DAISY.—A bad squint may sometimes be improved by binding a handkerchief over the eye that does not squint, so as to force the eye that does to do its duty, and give it strength. We cannot say whether this plan—which answers for children and infants—would help you, but you might try it.

W. T. H.—We think you are very well rid of a man who, after such a lengthened engagement, wishes to withdraw in so heartless and cruel a manner. It seems fortunate that you are not married; for how could you hope for happiness with such a man?

TWO GIRLS.—We should advise your sister to use a little sweet oil to the ear, and refrain from employing soap, which has probably irritated the inflamed part.

AQUILA.—We regret that the poem is neither poetry, rhyme, nor yet reason.

PANDORA.—The lines are a plagiarism from A. C. Coxe, the American poet.

GERTRUDE, MAB, HENRIETTE, WM., M. E. C. G., have all sent us lines to be read and criticised, and to one and all we say the same, i.e., none of it is "poetry." But if the writing of it give you pleasure and afford a vent to the many and unknown troubles and feelings of girlhood, the end of it is gained, and you must be content with that for a reward.

CHIOS had better have the volumes of the "G.O.P." bound for her own use. They are useless unbound and in weekly numbers.

HEAD BRIDESMAID must consult the clergyman who is to marry the two sisters, as to whether he will make the one service answer more or less for the two couples, as is sometimes done. This makes everything much simpler, as the father can take up both of the brides.

LINCOLN can have a well-fitting bodice made to replace the corsets.

A. O. PATAVIUM.—We were much pleased with your card, written in such good English, but we fear you will be much disappointed when we tell you that your used stamps are of no value, either to get a boy into a hospital or to deliver a slave. Both these are exploded fictions, and old stamps are waste paper and nothing more.

FENETRE.—You can frost window panes by the use of a solution of alum and water.

PAULINE.—If parents have sufficient means to keep their unmarried daughters up to the age of sixty or longer, it would be disgraceful to turn them out and deprive them of their natural home. But where the struggle to live makes it desirable that the daughters should forego their natural rights, and the shelter and protection of their parents' house, the case is different; only under such circumstances the parents should have given their daughters such training and educational advantages that in leaving home they should be eligible for suitable appointments, which should be found for them before they leave.

OLIVE AND IRIS.—The 9th of May, 1872. The writing and composition of your letter are not good.

WELSH GIRL.—We have no means of making a diagnosis of your case, as we are utter strangers, and have no acquaintance of your mode of life and circumstances.

ELSIE.—Your neither name your age nor the sort of thing your friend wishes you to do, to which your parents object. You should certainly be baptised if you have not had that advantage, and might consult the clergyman on the subject whose church you attend. And above all else, pray for the Holy Spirit's guidance and help, and that He will make your way plain, and keep you humbly yet firmly steadfast in your Christian faith. You should redouble your filial attentions to your parents, and avoid giving them offence, as far as may lie in your power.

ETHEL.—In the sentence you suggest the apostrophe is employed but no additional "s" when the name ends with that letter. "Mr. and Mrs. Thomas' kind invitation," or you might transpose the sentence thus, "The kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas."

"IN TEMPORARY DARKNESS."—We think you might inquire of the clergyman, as you suggest. If young, or there be young people at home, you must beware of taking back infection to them, should there be any epidemic in the parish; and you should remind him of your home obligations when giving you work to do.

"SIR MICHAEL! OH, SIR MICHAEL."

CHAPTER V.

BEFORE the Christmas festivities were at an end Sir Michael brought home his bride. Beckonham Hall was distant about seven miles from the old Manor House. It was richly decorated to receive its new mistress. It was a long grey house with a great stone hall, adorned with antlers and other trophies of the chase; one wing was devoted to the servants, the other containing the master's rooms and a long range of unused apartments. The road to Beckonham passed through the thick close woods of Bartonshire, miles of closely timbered country, but round about the house itself lay a wide park and fields of rich corn land.

Sir Michael was as powerful in his neighbourhood as the fact of his being the richest landowner and the leading magistrate could make him.

His friends and dependents declared that six months of married life made a wondrously small difference in their master, and it was true. For a time, short in itself, but to him seeming very long, he had striven to share the pursuits of his young wife; then he had given it up and fallen back into his own ways. It seemed no fault of hers, it certainly was no fault of his: he sought her daily in her beautiful silken-hung rooms, and she received him gently, sweetly, like a welcome guest, and like a welcome guest he stayed awhile and went. She grew to care for him with a timid affection, half gratitude, half fear. Sometimes the remembrance of his kindness to her, his noble offer of release before their marriage would come upon her with a passionate throb of pain, that she could give so little in return. She would clasp her hands and blame herself with bitter weeping, telling herself that this man was worthy of not only the love but the devotion of his wife; and that, do what she would, strive as she might, this love could never be his—the dark angry eyes of the twin of her life came ever between them. She was never at ease in her husband's presence. So he fell back on his own study and the companionship of his favourite dogs, and knowing that his wife in her peerless beauty was under his roof, and most gentle and sweet to him, he blamed himself that he was not happy. Neither realised that the gift of love comes down a grace from God; wanting that grace, though worthy of all love, it was not for him.

So grew, against their will, constraint. She could not help it; no intuition told her what to talk about, or saved her from feeling that his presence called forth a constant effort on her part.

The old Squire and Mistress Betty lived on in the Manor House, and every time that Eleanor went there, she felt more sure that they were happier far, relieved from her young presence. They also had fallen into their own ways, their quiet walks about the old gardens, their frequent gossips with a few neighbours over a friendly dish of tea. Everyone seemed to have a place of his own excepting she herself: her father and aunt in harmless idle passing away of the hours; her husband in business, stern work, magisterial and political, of which she knew nothing, and did not seek to know, being out of sympathy with all his public life.

Her life was unutterably forlorn, cut off from everything she cared for in the world, and unrealising even the blessing of self-sacrifice since Robbie had called it by another name.

The winter passed away, and the full glory of June turned all the woods from their russet nakedness to the splendour of the young green leafage. The world arose into warm sweet life again.

Suddenly one morning all the country was awakened into a buzz of excitement, half astonishment and half panic. The roads had been peaceful for a long time now, thanks to the strict order and tight hand kept by Sir Michael Newport over all. Therefore when the news came that the most daring robbery that had been committed for many years had just taken place on the king's highway, people could think and talk of nothing else.

Sir Michael and his wife were sitting in the pleasant room called the cedar-parlour at their breakfast when the news was brought. The old butler, shaking with excitement, burst in, crying: "Sir Michael! oh, Sir Michael! What shall we do? our security is at an end; we shall all be murdered in our beds! Such news! such news!"

Only by some sternness did his master succeed in obtaining a coherent account.

The high road to London passed through a thick wood for about a mile, and when the mail on the previous night had arrived about half-way through this wood, it was set upon, two of the horses shot, and the passengers ordered out.

Sir Michael could hardly get an answer to his questions. "How many were the assailants? Did they all escape?"

Yes, they had all escaped; no one knew how many. The coachman swore that there were but three, and the passengers that there were at least a dozen men; ruffians armed from head to foot, and closely masked. It seemed wonderful that they had not taken more—the trinkets and purses of the travellers had been spared; all the efforts of the highwaymen had seemed to be directed to the capture of the valise of a certain John Mowbray, a man of little consequence, who had now lived some eighteen months in the neighbourhood, and who was supposed to have some commercial business in London, he was so often on the road.

When he heard that, Sir Michael looked very grave. He rose from the table, and for the first time looked at his wife. She was bending forward, white as snow, with a strange look on her face that he did not understand.

"You are frightened, Eleanor?" he said.

"Frightened!" she answered, raising her head. "Not I, indeed!"

He looked at her searchingly, then turned away. "I must ride into the town at once," he said, "and look closely into this matter. Eleanor, when last we spoke on this subject we were full of romantic interest. Sentiment vanishes before reality. Should these men be taken, you know the penalty?"

"I know," she answered, looking up bravely into his face. "Death."

"You are a brave woman," he exclaimed, with a sudden burst of admiration.

"That depends," she answered, quickly. "For a good cause the weakest woman becomes brave; in a bad cause I should be the veriest coward, lacking faith."

He frowned heavily. "Thank heaven, in this case you can but make common cause with me against breakers of the public peace, robbers, and would-be murderers!"

She opened her lips as if about to speak, then stooped suddenly and gathered up a little favourite spaniel that was always fawning at her feet—a long-eared, cringing little beast, of the race called after King Charles—and pressed its silken coat to her breast.

Sir Michael could not wait; for one moment he looked at her wistfully, and a pang shot through his heart. The last time they had spoken on this subject he had not been so harsh; it was different now. It was the irritation of disappointed affection that was turning the sweetness of his nature into gall, it was the hopeless sense of the impossibility of preventing that slowly widening distance between them. Some day he might grow content to let it alone, but now he was drinking to the dregs the bitterness of failure.

He strode away, checking a quick sigh. Eleanor was left alone; then her white face changed, a look of care came over it, her eyes grew large and wild, with both her hands she pressed her brow.

The day seemed long—interminable; she could not read or embroider or play her harp—the music ended in sharp discord, the silken threads in tangled confusion; her whole soul was fixed in so intense a strain of suspense, that though such agony itself is prayer, her lips could form no words.

In the afternoon Mistress Betty drove over from the Manor House, and was ushered into her niece's presence with all due ceremony. Since fortune had smiled once more on that lady, her dress had become rich and becoming, her step had grown more dignified, her manner more affected; but to-day all small affectations were thrust aside, and as soon as the servant had left the room Mistress Betty's face became as careworn as Lady Newport's own.

"I suppose you have no further news, Eleanor?" she cried, eagerly. "Has Sir Michael returned yet? What do you know? What have you heard? Is he taken?"

"Who taken? Have they not all escaped? I know nothing, nothing!" cried Eleanor passionately. "No one has come near me, the servants know naught but exaggerated gossip, and Michael has not returned."

"I will tell you all I know. The leader it is whom they are seeking. There were three of them, apparently all young, all well-mounted and well-armed. Two have been traced far on the London road, where they have disappeared; but the third, Nellie, the third and leader—"She caught hold of her niece's arm, holding it fast with trembling hands.

"Tell me, Aunt Betty."

"You have heard of John Mowbray?" she went on, in a low whisper.

Eleanor nodded.

"It seems that after all he has turned out to be neither more nor less than a Government spy."

"Ah!"

"He carried important papers, it is said. You can conjecture what they would be—enough to hang some score of trusty gentlemen, and his valise, they say (I only tell you what I hear), was the object of this attack."

"Go on!"

"But oh, Nellie! John Mowbray seems to have boasted in his triumph that it was all a ruse, that the highway-men have only captured idle papers and old bills, and that the dangerous packet is safe in his house at home. He had better have held his peace about that," she added, with a little gleam of cunning in her eye.

"But the leader, the missing man?"

Mistress Betty covered her eyes with her hand for a moment, trembling; then she went on.

"John Mowbray swears that he shot him in the breast; he knows that he shot him with a shot that must have proved a mortal wound to any man; and yet—yet he rode away, and not a trace of him has yet been found."

Eleanor sank back; every trace of colour had left her face. Her aunt drew out her vinaigrette hastily, and she inhaled the pungent odour eagerly.

"Then there is nothing to be done?" whispered Mistress Betty.

"Nothing now, Aunt Betty," gasped Eleanor, sitting upright. "You were very kind to tell me this. It may not, after all, concern us in any way."

"It may not," faltered her aunt.

"But still—" "Conjectures are of no use," cried Lady Newport, almost sharply. "They only make it worse."

"I have done my best, Nell," said Mistress Betty, plaintively. "I have told you all I have heard. I know you have never placed any confidence in me, and I do not ask for it—heaven forbid! But I can often tell you things you might never hear, surrounded as you are by men who hate our unfortunate king."

"That is perhaps as well," said Eleanor, putting her hand to her head with a painful movement, "when one is bound to neutrality. I do not want to hear of troubles I cannot share—it only breaks my heart."

"Well, I shall go home," said her aunt. "I will let you know if anything is heard of the fugitive, though perhaps you would rather not know that either," she added, with a quick movement adjusting her hood.

She did not see the expression in Lady Newport's eyes as she sat there, or she might have been sorry for her own cross humour.

Mistress Betty went out in state to her old yellow chariot, and was driven away, and Eleanor remained alone.

The twilight gathered; it grew late. A messenger arrived from Sir Michael; he was detained at the county town, and could not be home that night.

The first gleam of joy and relief that had visited Eleanor's face came over it when she received that message; she was seated cowering over a fire in her room, for the spring evenings were chilly, even in June; she sat with the little dog in her lap, and hands twined tightly together.

Lady Newport dined alone, and then went up to her bedroom and summoned her waiting-woman. She was wondering whether she could trust her, whether the few months of their relation to each other had been sufficient to awaken affection in the girl's breast; she could trust no one else in the whole house; they were all old servants, devoted to their master, and she so new, so strange among them all.

As the girl came in, Eleanor raised her eyes to try and read her face, and her half-formed resolution failed; she would not trust her.

She told her that she was not well, that she would go to bed at once, and dismissed her attendant.

Eleanor listened to her footsteps as they receded; she heard their echo all down the long stone passages, several doors shut, and all was still.

Then she leapt up and changed her dress as rapidly as she could; it was nine o'clock—there was no moon, only a fitful starlight. Lady Newport donned a close, short riding-habit, rolled up her long brown hair, which her maid had released from the elaborate high-piled coiffure of the day, into a great knot, and fastening her felt hat firmly on her head, she opened the door of her room very softly and went out.

The servants' rooms were in the left-hand wing of the long house; Eleanor could hear them laughing and talking in the distance; they were a long way off, but yet she trembled in every limb as she emerged from the passages, and stole down the great oak staircase. It was very dark in the hall, all the lights had been extinguished, only great logs of wood lay dully smouldering on the hearth; the locks and bars were drawn across the door, the chain was up, all secure for the night. It was well that the servants' rooms were so far off, and it was well that they were all so fully occupied with eager gossiping, for the bolts creaked every one, and shot back with a vicious harsh reluctance as their mistress opened them.

She came out upon the steps, drew the door to behind her, and went swiftly down into the carriage road.

Suddenly she started, and with a strong effort repressed a cry of terror, for a dark figure emerged from the trees and stood before her.

A sharp whisper reassured her.

"Mistress Eleanor! my lady!"

She knew old Abel's voice.

"Is it you, Abel?" she cried. "Tell me, have you come for me?"

"Yes, my lady; there is not one moment to lose. I thought you would come if it were possible. I have been waiting here an hour; I have a horse waiting at the gate. Come, lose no time!"

"Abel," whispered Eleanor, holding by his arm as she followed his guidance rapidly, "tell me, was it Robbie?"

"Aye, aye; that is why I am here."

"Is he safe?" she gasped.

"Aye, safe enough in the cellars of the Manor House."

"And the wound they spoke of?"

"It is for you to attend to that," he answered evasively. "We must lose no time if you must be back before day-break."

Eleanor said no more; she durst not ask any questions, for the answers might take from her her precious fund of strength and courage before that seven miles' ride.

The horse, with saddle and pillion, stood concealed within a clump of trees, and in five minutes they were riding as fast as he could carry his double burden.

The Manor House lay black and silent in the night, the few faint stars cast flickering reflections on the dark water of the stream. Abel tied his horse just within the gate; they went on on foot; the hand-rail creaked as they crossed the bridge.

There was one light in the façade of the house, the light in Mistress Betty's room, where she sat, as she was wont, holding wrangling conversations with her opinionated maid, trying new arrangements of powdered curls, new places for the becoming patch.

Lady Newport held her breath as they drew near the house, and passed round it to the offices. Everyone must have been in bed, for it was silent as the grave. Abel drew from his pocket the great cellar keys, and with trembling hands struck a light. Eleanor followed him closely, silently as a shadow.

There were vaulted cellars under the Manor House, in which any number of fugitives might have lain concealed. Abel passed through several of them quickly, till he came to a door leading to an inner cellar, fastened by a separate key. He strove to find the lock, but now his hand shook so that he could not find the key-hole, the key clattered helplessly against the door.

Eleanor looked up and in the dim light saw a great terror on the old man's face. The reflection of that terror quickened all her powers into a throbbing vitality and force; she put him gently aside, turned the key in the lock, and went in first.

There was a light in this inner cellar, fixed against the wall, showing the vaulted roof, deepening the shadows cast by the pillars that supported it. The place looked strangely like the crypt of some old cathedral.

In the far corner Eleanor perceived a heap of straw thrown down, a gleam of steel flashing back from a drawn sword and pistols, and a long figure lying covered by a great black travelling cloak.

She sprang forward and threw herself on her knees by that form. The rigid attitude, the immovability struck her with an agonised shaft of dread.

"Robbie! my Robbie!" she cried, aloud.

She drew aside the folds of the cloak; the light flared and spluttered in the draught from the scarcely closed door; it shone down on a young face with the ghastly pallor of approaching death stealing over it.

The dying man was so like his sister, so like, that had she been lying there instead of him, none could have told the difference. He opened his eyes when she knelt down by his side, and some strength seemed to come back.

"At last!" he gasped. "At last! and there is so little time left!"

"Darling!" she cried. "Have you no word of love for me? We have been parted so long. Have you forgiven me, Robbie? Oh, my darling, I could not help it. Robbie, do you love me still?"

"That depends," he answered, turning his great eyes on her with a look of strange mistrust. "I do not know whether I can trust you, and I must know, Nell."

She pressed her lips on his cold hands, on the dark hair lying on its rough pillow of straw. "I will die for you, darling; there is nothing in the whole wide world I would not do for you."

"Will you swear it?"

"Before God and man."

He grasped her hand with a marvellous force. "Nell," he said, "come closer. Listen! I cannot speak long. My men—

I have but three—the signal—Abel knows——"

He paused; every moment was increasing the difficulty of speech.

Abel came forward. "I know, Captain, I know," he said. "I can tell my lady."

"You will do it, Nell. You may save him!"

"The King?"

"Yes, yes; that valise—John Mowbray—we have information——"

"What are you asking me to do, Robbie?" cried Eleanor, her voice rising almost shrilly in her agony.

"To do—my work."

His voice gathered power; in his vehemence he raised himself up, with convulsive fingers clasping her hands.

"Nell! Nell! you will do it?"

Then the blood gushed from his mouth, and he fell back. Terrified, she strove to help him; but he was past all help—the fatal bullet had done its work too well. She answered the pleading of his eyes, which never left her face, long after the power of speech was gone.

"I will do it, Robbie. I will do what you would have done. God forgive me, Robbie, I will do it!"

Then came a wondrously sweet smile on his lips, his hands made a slight movement, his sister read his wish, and with her own hand made the sign of the cross upon his breast.

The candle flickered and waned in its socket. Just overhead, through the low underground window of the cellar where he lay, the breaking of dawn shed a pale and ghastly light.

There was a long, long silence.

Old Abel drew near, he heard one trembling whisper. "Robbie darling, darling, speak to me, Robbie!"

Then silence again. The faithful old man came nearer still, and bent over them; with a gentle movement he laid his hand on Lady Newport's shoulder, and with the other hand drew a corner of the riding-cloak over the face of the dead.

The candle flared up wildly, guttered, and went out; the cold grey dawn stole in. Presently something broke that terrible stillness—far away a distant sound, the church clock striking four.

Then Lady Newport rose from her knees, and Abel, glancing up at her, was astonished at the marble calm of her face.

"I must go," she said, with mechanical hands gathering up and fastening more tightly her long dark hair.

"Aye, dear heart, there is not a moment to lose," said the old man. "I will tell you all as we ride; but we must ride fast, for the day is breaking."

A GIRLS' TOUR IN BRITTANY.

CHAPTER V.

NANTES, with its brilliantly-lighted streets, its two rivers, numerous bridges, busy quays, gay shops, and handsome public buildings, was indeed a striking contrast to the old-world towns we had just left. The hostess of the Hotel des Voyageurs gave us a map, with which we started forth next morning, first visiting the Château, the birthplace of the Duchess Anne, the scene of her marriage with Louis XII., and the place where Henry IV. signed the Edict of Nantes, giving protection and toleration to the Protestants.

We next went to the cathedral, which has a fine unfinished west front. The interior is a strange mixture of elaborate detail in some parts, and utter want of finish in others. The effect of the lofty nave of pure flamboyant architecture is spoiled by a low, stunted Romanesque choir.

After visiting several churches, we rested for an hour in the "Jardin des Plantes," in a shady avenue of magnolia trees. Emerging by a gateway near the Loire, we took the tramcar towards the mouth of the river. We passed the Place Boufflay, where during the Revolution the guillotine did its deadly work, and came to the gloomy pile of buildings known as the "Salorges," where, during the infamous rule of Carrier, the victims of the "noyades" were confined. The guillotine was too slow in its work for this monster, so he contrived, by sinking boats at the mouth of the river, to despatch his 500 or 600 victims a day. At this dreadful time every horror that the brutality or refinement of cruelty could suggest was forced on the unfortunate city, whose victims in one year amounted to 30,000. At this part of its course, so full of terrible associations, the various sections of the Loire unite, and it flows towards the sea—a noble stream. The banks were once lined with avenues of trees, but these have been cut down to make way for railway and tram-lines. This arrangement is a great disfigurement to the city, and a considerable source of danger to the inhabitants.

On our way back we alighted at the Bourse, and made our way to the hotel, by the Passage Pommeraye, a curious arcade of three storeys.

We left for Le Mans at three o'clock, and seemed in danger of having another unpleasant journey, for a tipsy man got into our carriage by mistake. His intentions seemed most amiable, but as he held in his hand a sharp-pointed compass (or some such implement of his craft), his frequent lurches were very alarming.

We descended at the Hotel du Dauphin, Le Mans, in pouring rain, and received a voluble welcome from the landlord, who persisted in talking to us in the most unintelligible English. Determined, apparently, that the money spent on his education in languages should not be thrown away, he insisted on making the most unnecessary remarks, and in offering us all sorts of things we were not in the least likely to require.

At dinner, the waiter twice made a remark which we could not understand, and we began to think it would be awkward if both English and French were alike unintelligible. At length it dawned upon us that the day was Friday, and that he said "Vous dînez maigre ou gras?" Some ladies near were dining "maigre" (fasting), but they had as many courses as we had, and wine and cheese as well. Our host kept coming up to us with his one formula, "You al' right?"

The heavy rain of the night made everything delightfully cool and fresh, and Saturday morning rose bright and lovely. We got up at six o'clock, had early coffee, and went out.

Le Mans is a charming place with wide open squares, narrow streets, with clear water running down them, a river (the Sarthe), numerous bridges, traces of the old city walls, and shady walks. It, too, dates from Cæsar's time, but most of the very old parts are swept away. Prince Frederick Charles had his quarters there in the last war, when the army of the Loire was finally dispersed, and all hope of relieving Paris abandoned.

Our first view of the cathedral filled us with delight and astonishment. We entered by a tiny door among the deep buttresses at the east end, just where the arches are most compressed, and found ourselves at once in the chevet or aisles of the choir, amid groups of worshippers paying their devotions at one or other of the eleven apsidal chapels.

The outer pillars encircling the choir are plain, massive circular columns with rich capitals, giving a sense of rest and strength, and contrasting with the inner circle, which are fluted, and which send up their shafts to an almost impossible height. The great ambition of French architects has been to obtain height. Sometimes they have sacrificed proportion to height, but in the choir and transepts of Le Mans they seem to have attained their end without any sense of loss.

The fine stained glass causes an indescribable play of light and shade among the arches; from whatever point of view one looks, a lovely broken perspective meets the eye, suggesting ideas of mystery and of unexplored recesses. The transepts are still higher than the choir. As we looked up a swallow circled over our heads; it had not, indeed, like the lark, "become a sightless song," but its diminished size showed at what an altitude it soared. A monument to Berengaria, queen of Richard Cœur de Lion, stands in the south transept, which also boasts a fine Romanesque porch.

A sudden change awaited us in turning from the gorgeous intricacy of the eastern end of the cathedral, with its rich colouring, burning tapers, smell of incense, scattered worshippers, and monotonous chanting of magnificently dressed priests, to the solitude, pale light, white walls, and simple lines of the nave. There was an air of Puritan tranquillity about this part of the edifice, and one could fancy it was built at a time when the ritual of the church was less ornate than it afterwards became; and so it was, for whereas the choir is of the thirteenth century, "the period of perfection of pointed Gothic," the nave is Romanesque, a period which corresponds to our Norman.

The west front, which has happily been allowed to stand in its original plainness, is said to be of the eleventh, and the side aisles, with an arcade of very simple design, even of the tenth and eleventh centuries.

A clerestory has been added to the nave, and it is very easy to see where the new work joins the old.

After visiting two churches, and wandering about the town, we left Le Mans at noon, and reached Chârtres about three o'clock. Since leaving Vannes we noticed many changes both in the landscape and people, which were not all improvements. In the Loire valley the poplar tree, either tall or pollard, became a frequent object, and the delicious blackberry hedges were seen no more.

When we entered churches the worshippers stared at us, telling their beads all the time, instead of being oblivious of our presence as heretofore. People at table d'hôte stared too. On leaving our hotel, waiters, for the first time (since we crossed the Channel), posed in picturesque attitudes, expectant of tips.

When we spoke people did not always listen, but concluded at once they could not understand. Strangers interposed, speaking a strange tongue, which proved to be their idea of the English language, "as she is spoke," but if we replied in our native tongue they were utterly confounded. (French being a foreign language to the Bretons, they always listened attentively, and an accent more or less strange did not affect them in the least.)

wear caps, though, to do them justice, the bonnets and dresses which made them seem to us so commonplace, were in reality very simple and in good taste.

As we pushed open the heavy door of Chârtres Cathedral at eleven o'clock next day, a gorgeous procession of over one hundred men was filing down the central aisle. It was composed of the officiating priests, variously attired, the acolytes in scarlet gowns and skull caps, and a number of young priests from an adjoining seminary. After going round the church they went to fetch Monseigneur L'Evêque, a very infirm old gentleman of eighty-six, arrayed in purple velvet, with a tunic of white lace. High mass was performed, during which both string and wind instruments were used, while ever and anon the organ, perched high up in the nave, gave forth heavenly sounds.

When the "office" was over we hastened to the northern aisle of the choir, and were just in time to see the bishop pass out. Ladies, richly dressed, were kneeling on the pavement, while their children kissed his hand and received his blessing. Low mass was then said in a side chapel, the quiet tones of the priest mingling with the chanting still going on at the high altar. The black dresses of most of the groups of worshippers were relieved here and there by the immense white caps of the Bonnes Sœurs. Dim oil lamps burned in some of the side chapels, while hundreds of candles flared in the one dedicated to the Virgin. From our seats we could count twelve windows, but such is the maze and intricacy of the arches as they curve round the apse, that only one window was visible to us in its whole length.

The dark, rich stained glass gives an effect of indescribable mystery, which is now and again suddenly pierced by a shaft of the "light of common day" coming through a pane of clear glass. The choir of Chârtres is not unlike that of Le Mans, but is still finer.

It is encircled by a double row of pillars, and the space between the buttresses is filled in with chapels. A lovely screen surrounds the altar; on its inner side are marble bas-reliefs, and on its outer side is carved work (representing scenes in the life of Christ) so rich and minute in detail as to deserve the description of "point lace in stone." Mr. Ruskin bids us remember "that the part of a building in which the Divine presence was believed to be constant, as that in the Jewish Holy of Holies, was only the enclosed choir; in front of which the aisles and transepts might become the king's hall of justice, as in the presence-chamber of Christ, and whose high altar was guarded always from the surrounding eastern aisles by a screen of the most finished workmanship; while from those surrounding aisles branched off a series of radiating chapels or cells, each dedicated to some separate saint. This conception of Christ and His saints was at the root of the entire disposition of the apse, with its supporting and dividing buttresses and piers; and the architectural form can never be well delighted in unless in some sympathy with the spiritual imagination out of which it rose. We talk foolishly and feebly of symbols and types; in old Christian architecture every part is literal; the cathedral is for its builders the house of God, and is surrounded like an earthly king's with minor lodgings for the servants."

The cathedral of Châtres is in such perfect proportion, and in parts so massive, that at first one does not realise its immense height and size. We liked best to sit in the sacristan's chair at the extreme western end, there losing the restless sense produced by the enormous mass of detail of the choir, and taking in the simple beauty and rich colouring of the church as a whole.

The stained glass of Châtres is of world-wide renown, and to see it is to realise its loveliness and the warmth and richness it gives to a building. At the west end are three plain lancet windows of the twelfth century, one of them containing a "tree of Jesse." Of these windows Lassus said, "Châtres possède trois magnifiques verrières, qui font pâlir tous les vitraux dont le 13^e siècle a enrichi cette magnifique cathédrale."

At the end of each transept and of the nave is an exquisite rose window, with plate tracery; the one in the north transept, being the gift of Saint Louis, is called the "Rose of France."

The outside of the cathedral is perhaps of the most unique and unrivalled interest. Of the nine spires contemplated in the design of Châtres only two are completed, and these are of different periods and of unequal heights. The older and less lofty spire is considered by good judges to be one of the most admirable and perfect products of French architecture.

The west front, which is of the twelfth century, is profusely ornamented with figures, and the north and south entrances are covered by triple projecting Gothic porticoes, resting on small bundles of pillars, the sides and vaults lined with statues, or filled with niches where statues have once been. Without counting figures simply ornamental, such as birds, gargoyles, etc., there are 1,800 statues of symbolic or historic interest on the exterior of the cathedral; the north porch alone contains over 700 statues and statuettes relating to the life of Christ, the precursors of the Messiah, the tree of Jesse, the creation, the wise and foolish virgins, the beatitudes, and the royal benefactors of the church. A flight of seventeen steps leads to the south porch, where is depicted the Last Judgment, Christ being surrounded by apostles, angels, martyrs, confessors, prophets, and virgins.

When sitting on some steps that hot day in a shady corner of the cathedral square waiting for Ruth to join me, I marvelled at the extraordinary faith and self-abnegation of the first architects and builders. They seem not to have cared even that their names should be perpetuated, and they must have planned and built, laid stone on stone, knowing that neither they nor their children's children would see a tithe of the work completed. How they toiled on, generation after generation, nothing daunted, even when fire (as at Châtres) three times destroyed their handiwork! "They dreamt not of a perishable home who thus could build."

It is beautiful to read of the neighbouring kings and princes sending presents, while the people from Rouen came and encamped in tents to assist in the stupendous work. Yet admitting that each workman was animated by religious zeal, still the marvel grows, that men with few models, few means of travel, and few mechanical contrivances, could produce such lasting monuments of skill. I wonder if the faith is wanting now-a-days, that our ever hastening, never resting age is incapable of undertaking anything the completion of which is not within measurable distance. We have special need to learn

"One lesson of two duties kept at one,

Though the loud world proclaim their enmity

Of toil unsevered from tranquillity,

Of labour, that in lasting fruit outgrows

Far noisier schemes, accomplished in repose,

Too great for haste, too high for rivalry."

These meditations were cut short by the sight of Ruth crossing the bright sunshine of the square; her appearance was the signal for us to visit the crypt of the cathedral, the Church of "Notre Dame Sous Terre." It is the largest crypt in France, and the oldest part of the building, having been constructed by Bishop Fulbert, in the eleventh century. It is a weird place; in one chapel, dedicated to the Virgin, over a thousand metal hearts hang from the ceiling, while hundreds of feebly glimmering lamps are visible down the whole length of the aisle.

At four o'clock we again visited the cathedral, and were just in time to see pass round a procession of young girls with banners and lighted tapers. The stately pile never looked more beautiful than that one moment when the central aisle was filled from end to end by the white-robed, white-veiled figures.

On Monday we climbed up the less ancient and higher spire of Châtres, and were just in time to see the bells rung, which is done by the feet and not by ropes. The bell-ringers had a violent altercation, which was rather alarming in their perilous position above the bells.

Our guide told us that when the Germans were in possession of the city, one of them was always stationed in the spire. The ringers were only allowed ten minutes to climb the immense height, and ring the bells and descend. This precaution was used lest they should signal to the French camp. He spoke well of the Germans, saying they supplied the poor with food, even with brandy and tobacco, and they insisted on every respect being paid to the cathedral and to the religious services. Anyone attempting to keep his hat on in church, or otherwise misbehaving, was assisted in his exit by the point of a bayonet.

On Monday morning at eight o'clock we drove round the town, through the Porte Guillaume (the last remnant of the old walls), to the river with its crowded wooden wash-houses and its picturesque old gables. There is another branch of the river, a sluggish stream, with pretty villas and gardens, each with its little bridge leading to a shady avenue.

We were well repaid for a visit to the church of St. Pierre. It dates from the tenth to the thirteenth century, and its stained glass is little inferior to that of the cathedral. The triforium of the lantern-shaped choir is glazed, and gives a charming effect of lightness and grace. There are three side chapels, vulgarly decorated, and a few windows with modern glass, which reminded us of nothing so much as of a Highland tartan or a Paisley shawl. We wondered less every day at Mr. Ruskin's anathemas on all attempts at restoration. One would have thought that to spend a week, still more a lifetime, near such a building as Châtres Cathedral was education enough for the least artistic soul.

A worse shock was in store for us at the church of St. Aignan, a fine enough building in itself, and containing some gems of stained glass. In an evil hour in the year 1842 that church was restored and decorated, and converted into a miracle of bad taste. The marvel is how any human brain could conceive such monstrosities of colour and design. The chief idea has been to portray vivid green cloth covered with stars, the shadows of the folds being indicated by straight black lines. The roof, a wagon ceiling in wood, is covered with a meaningless design of white dots. It is a pitiable spectacle. The author of it ought long ago to have been put under restraint for life, to prevent his committing further barbarities.

We went to see "l'Escalier Reine Berthe," an old oak spiral staircase outside a house. The next house is a crèche; they take in twenty children. The little things were out in the garden, crawling about in the warm sunshine on a piece of matting.

From Châtres we went to Paris, and spent nearly a week in a private hotel or pension, which I can well recommend to ladies travelling alone, as comfortable and moderate in charges—Hotel Villa Lord Byron, 16, Rue Lord Byron, Champs Elysées. We drove in the Bois, visited churches, went to Fontainebleau, studied pictures at the Louvre, and worshipped at the shrine of the Venus of Milo. We also shopped, cela va sans dire.

Having a vague remembrance of Mr. Ruskin's indignation with travellers who rush pêle mêle to the buffet at Amiens, and who never dream of breaking their journey to visit the cathedral, we determined to go there on Saturday and spend our last Continental Sunday in its precincts. We were anxious to compare it with Châtres and Le Mans while the remembrance of these was fresh in our minds.

On approaching the east end we noticed the usual apsidal form, the flying buttresses, and a delicate spire over the cross centre, "the pretty caprice of a village carpenter." The west front has two massive towers and three recessed doorways, which in beauty and elaborateness rivalled anything we had seen. On entering the church our first impression was of the lightness of the building, both in point of colour and architecture. There is less stained glass than in Châtres, and what there is, is of lighter tone. Then the tracery of the windows being bar tracery, with every corner and angle filled with glass instead of the stonework being left, there is little to impede the entrance of daylight.

The choir is enclosed by a single eastern aisle, which branches off as usual into radiating chapels; there is therefore an absence of the extreme intricacy and multiplicity of arches and pillars at this part which were so charming at Châtres and Le Mans. All round the choir and at the end of the transepts the triforium is glazed (as it once was all round the cathedral), admitting floods of light. Mr. Ruskin says, "If you have no wonder in you for that choir and its encompassing circle of light when you look up into it from the cross centre, you need not travel further in search of cathedrals, for the waiting-room of any station is a better place for you."

At the end of each transept is the most lovely rose or wheel window it is possible to imagine—one of the thirteenth and one of the fourteenth century.

The oldest piece of glass of all is a narrow lancet window at the extreme east end, with a most exquisitely delicate round window over it. In all these windows a celestial blue predominates, suggesting the expression, "The blue vitrailed gate of Heaven."

The pulpit and altar-piece are ugly productions of modern days.

Amiens Cathedral is larger than any other in France, and is indeed only surpassed in size by Cologne Cathedral and St. Peter's at Rome. It was built about the same time as Salisbury (1220), "under the orders of two successive bishops, one of whom directed the foundations of the edifice, and the other gave thanks in it for its completion." It is called by M. Violet le Duc "The Parthenon of Gothic Architecture." Whewell says: "The interior is one of the most magnificent spectacles that architectural skill can ever have produced. The mind is filled and elevated by its enormous height (140 feet), its lofty clerestory, its grand proportions, its noble simplicity. The proportion of height to breadth is almost double that to which we are accustomed in English cathedrals."

In Mr. Ruskin's opinion the "apse is not only the best, but the first thing done perfectly by Northern Europe." In the "Bible of Amiens" he gives this advice: "Whatever you wish to see, or are forced to leave unseen at Amiens, if the overwhelming responsibilities of your existence and the inevitable necessities of precipitate locomotion in their fulfilment have left you so much as one quarter of an hour—not out of breath—for the contemplation of the capital of Ricardy, give it wholly to the cathedral choir. Aisles and porches, lancet windows and roses, you can see elsewhere as well as here, but such carpenters' work you cannot. It is late—fully developed Flamboyant, just past the fifteenth century—and has some Flemish stolidity, mixed with the playing French fire of it; but wood-carving was the Picard's joy from his youth up, and, so far as I know, there is nothing else so beautiful cut out of the goodly trees of the world.

"Sweet and young-grained wood it is: oak, trained and chosen for such work, sound now as four hundred years since. Under the carver's hand it seems to cut like clay, to fold like silk, to grow like living branches, to leap like living flame.

"Canopy crowning canopy, pinnacle piercing pinnacle—it shoots and wreaths itself into an enchanted glade, inextricable, imperishable, fuller of leafage than any forest, and fuller of story than any book."

At the conclusion of a long morning service we climbed up into the triforium, and made the whole tour of the cathedral, sometimes inside and sometimes outside the building. We were surprised to find High Mass commencing. The faint sound of the bell and the monotonous chanting of the priests sounded most strange as we wandered round, sometimes catching glimpses of the service that was going on in miniature below.

Then we went up into the spire, and saw the city, with its churches, forts, houses, and its river (dividing into twelve canals), laid out like a child's toy city far below.

We walked on the roof of the nave, and our guide opened a ventilator and let us look down. Two old men were sitting just beneath (very lilliputian in size), little dreaming of the temptation to unregenerate hearts to try "if marbles would bounce on their bald heads." Truly we had never been so high in life before, and never expect to be again.

We stood in a narrow ledge high over the organ, above the clerestory, and looked down the whole length of the church. We did not disturb anybody, for we can only have looked like big flies to the people below. Our guide told us that the nave is one metre wider in the upper part than in the lower; but whether this is intentional or owing to a giving way of the building, caused by its vast height, he did not know. In any case we felt it was unwise to add our ponderous weight to that part of the edifice, so descended with all convenient speed.

We attended an afternoon service, and saw the bishop and other gorgeous beings. We lingered about until the deepening twilight produced that air of mystery we had missed at noonday. A feeble glimmer from a candle or an oil-lamp was all the light there was when at length we tore ourselves away. After dinner we went again, hoping to see the effect of moonlight, but the moon was obscured by clouds. A very simple service was going on in the nave.

We reached London at three o'clock next day, crossing by Calais, and thus ended a delightful six weeks' holiday, which cost us each about £31.

[THE END.]

NEW MUSIC AND MUSICAL EVENTS.

MANY events of interest to our musical girls have already taken place this year, or are about to do so. We think it may be of assistance to our readers if, from time to time, we give them notice of any performances or publications of high class music, by the hearing or studying of which their perception of the divine art may be quickened, and their enjoyment of it enhanced. What we must strive to do above all things is to persuade you all to help on the music of native composers, by finding out what is good and hopeful in their compositions, rather than by cynically comparing them to their more experienced foreign brethren, and by encouraging their efforts with your attendance at their concerts and your purchase of their best works. It is satisfactory to find that the appreciation of native efforts is by no means confined to England—nay, more, it is almost a reproach that keener interest should be shown in them in Germany than at home. We must blush to think that in January last the best musicians in Leipzig attended an orchestral concert, of which every item was composed by Dr. Villiers Stanford, our most able professor at Cambridge University. The audience not only attended, but applauded and enjoyed that collection of British compositions, all by one hand. At the celebrated Saturday Concerts in the Crystal Palace British music always meets with a kind helping hand from Mr. August Manns; on the 15th of February the entire concert was devoted to a performance of Mr. Hamish MacCunn's new cantata, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." So far, Mr. MacCunn has wisely illustrated scenes and subjects belonging to his native Scotland.

On 23rd February Dr. Stanford's third and latest symphony was heard for the first time in England (the Germans already know it!), and at succeeding concerts we are to have overtures by Dr. Bridge and Mr. Prout, and a serenade by that very clever musician, Mr. Wingham.

The plays of Shakespeare which are being represented in London at the present time have musical interpolations by Sir Arthur Sullivan, and, in every way, there seem to be hope and encouragement for British music and musicians. This state of things can be best developed by combined exertion, but every individual, in however small a way, may assist in the advancement of what is best in our native productions, either, as I have already suggested, by the purchase of the best and purest compositions, irrespective of the amount of advertisement, which is as a rule anything but a guide to good music, or by the attendance and attention at concerts where new and standard works by fellow-countrymen are to be heard. This alone would encourage our people to make music rather than to import it.

Amongst events of interest, we note the return to this country of little Otto Hegner. You will probably have taken the opportunity of seeing and hearing the youthful genius, and will, we hope, have been able to discover in him all those makings of a Mozart or Mendelssohn, all that firm foundation and good purpose, without which a terrible affliction, "the infant prodigy," stands unmasked, a skeleton of wretchedness, and quite as much a case for the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals as the Baldwin pony!

Mr. Henschel's excellent Symphony Concerts came to an end in February with a performance of the ninth symphony of Beethoven, known as the "Choral," being the only symphony in the last movement of which voices are employed, and followed the "Walpurgis Night" of Mendelssohn, for the interpretation of which the celebrated Leeds Choir came to London for the first time. These splendid northern singers should be heard. If we can show them delicacy in chorus singing, they can teach us firmness of attack, and enthusiasm, such enthusiasm as is altogether wanting in our apathetic meetings in the south.

The Philharmonic Concerts recommenced in March, but the conductor, Mr. Cowen, did not return from Australia until after the first concert, at which Dr. Mackenzie most kindly took his place; but the reason for Mr. Cowen's absence is a very important one. At the Melbourne Exhibition he has preached to our colonies the crusade of good music, he has introduced to the thousands of our brethren out there very many works and composers, well known here in London, but never before heard in Australia; and best of all, he has the gratification of knowing that the good seed sown is even now taking root and springing upwards. The importance of this cannot be over-estimated.

Think of the life, the rough bush life, the hard-working life, and picture all the hardships softened, all the troubles comforted, all the hopes revived, and the latent good feelings brought out by this glorious art of music. Most of the new English work has been published at a cheap rate, and may be obtained at the various well-known music establishments. We hope to speak more fully about some of it next month.

NOVELLO AND CO.

Monsieur de Pachmann's clever wife, Margaret de Pachmann, contributes a Thème et Variations, and a Réverie du Lac, two piano pieces fairly full of difficulties, but most musician-like and worthy of all the toil they demand.

Twelve Songs, by Schumann (Op. 35), not published in the older sets, and written to words by Kerner, will be welcome to all singers of good music.

We can also recommend some books of soft voluntaries for the organ, composed by George Calkin, and a toccata, by W. G. Wood, the latter rather difficult.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

BY A LADY DRESSMAKER.

It is not often that poetry, in the present day, is brought in to embalm and immortalise dress; so I cannot help quoting the following pretty little morsel about tea gowns, from the St James's Gazette—

Now floats the tea gown into use,
Elaborate, costly, neat, but loose,
A rustling plush of twilight gray
Lined with shot silk of opal ray.
From neck to feet the front should float,
With beaded agrafes at the throat.
Should mat be worn, a coarser kind,
A demi-train should float behind,
Embroidered gold or satin white
The front, drawn in with smockings tight,
Or what if silky Pompadour,
Lace trimmed, with Watteau pleats before,
While dainty frillings, trebly deep,
Adown each side with ribbons creep;
And flowers in bouquets here and there
Teach Art with Nature to compare?

Now, is not that a very nice description of anything made in silk and satin for daily wear? There is no doubt but that the "Princess dress" is a most useful garment, and one suited more especially to the woman who works. The tea gown form of it is for the woman who does not work, and who can afford to be like the "lilies of the field;" so this happily constituted dress suits everyone.

I do not know whether I mentioned the attempted introduction of black silk undergarments. Black stockings and black petticoats are quite recognised fixtures, and useful ones too, amongst us. But I do not think we shall regard black silk chemises and combinations with the same eyes. The black silk night garments—if used for travelling, as they are said to be in America—would then have a kind of excuse for their existence, for they would not be at all bad for the exigencies of sleeping in a train, which so largely prevails out there. They would not catch the dust nor would one mind their exposition in possible railway accidents, as one would look far less bad in a kind of black "Princess robe" than in an ordinary white night gown. They are trimmed either with white tuchon or with black lace, and the soft well dyed China silk is said to wash well. Thus far for American fashions. The whole argument for black undergarments reminds one of the very antique story about the old maiden lady and her "fire night cap," which was made very becoming and handsome, in case of that catastrophe happening to her in a semi-demi-toilette, and she should appear at cruel disadvantage.

I have got our artist to show us in a picture the different styles of the "Directory" and the "Empire," so that we may have some little knowledge of the very different styles they are; also, of the fashions in vogue to-day which are attempting to follow both of them with more or less success. The severe and truthful style will not, I fancy, ever return; but still, our gowns are more than ever taking on the distinctions of both. The straight and severely simple skirt of the same length all round, and just showing the foot, is already very popular; and it is to be hoped that the high and very short waist will really come in, for that would be the death of tight-lacing, as it would be of no use, nor add to beauty to lace tight up as high as our "Empire" lady wears her bodice, which dress is a copy of the costume of ancient Greece and Rome. In those days, "figure compression or training" would have been considered pure madness, and the tightly-laced figure would have been regarded in the same way that we in the present day look at the tiny malformed and destroyed foot of a Chinese lady.

I have tried to illustrate one of the very new bonnets of the season, which is of the simplest make, and seems principally to consist of a large bow of completely Alsatian character below, while some bonnets have the two higher bows put in, to make them a little more imposing. They are made throughout of ribbon; a wide one with satin stripes is the prettiest, and the foundation is rather like a small horse's hoof. But the whole thing is so simple, that the powers of the milliner at home are quite equal to its manufacture. This bonnet seems like a prophecy of what is coming for the season, and the general tendency of all seems to be towards extreme smallness, while the newer hats are rather large and of the Gainsborough style.

The simple lace dress illustrated shows something fit for a young girl's evening gown. The lace is black over white, or a colour such as poppy-red, and the pointed belt and side sash are either of black velvet, or they match the hue of the under-skirt. Embroidered materials bid fair to be more popular than lace this season, and quantities of them are seen; cashmere and cloth as well as vigogne being generally the materials employed. The embroidery on them is most beautifully done in silk, and the designs are excellent. For the spring we shall probably find them very popular. Striped materials of all kinds, brocaded stuffs, moiré and plain black silks seem to be more worn than anything else just now, and a combination of green and black is as favourite a mixture as ever.

Strange to say, the private views at the different picture galleries, where one expects to see a fair indication of the coming season's fashions, did not show many tailor-made dresses, and picturesqueness seemed to be more the order of the day. Cloth jackets were worn of all kinds, long mantles, and a few short ones, cut like an all-round cape. Many of the small cloth jackets bordered with fur were black, and both grey and black astrachan were much used as borderings. The muff and the bonnet or hat generally matched each other, but not the rest of the costume.

I have said that green is as popular as ever, and all kinds of shades of it seem to be appreciated. Pale water-green, apple-green, dark rifle, shamrock, and the green of the beetle's wing are all to be worn, and black, grey, fawn, and buff are mixed with it, as well as blue and terra cotta, which latter is quite restored to favour. Then there are red-browns, earth-browns, Egyptian and Pompeian reds, and a very bright poppy or carnation red, which are used for skirts, under small Senorita or Zouave jackets of black. Bright orange is also in favour for these under-skirts, which are worn with all skirts and look very pretty on young girls.

SPRING DIRECTOIRE JACKET, WITH FOLDED FRONT.

I have illustrated several of the newest long cloaks which are to be worn in lighter materials for the spring. Very fine ladies' cloth, fine tweeds and serges, are already being prepared for them, and I think stripes will be generally used. The huge bows fancied on the hats will be noticed, I am sure; and, in truth, they are very big, and unless very skilfully put on, they have a tendency to be top-heavy, and perhaps a little clumsy. But I am rejoiced to see any fashion come in which will save the poor birds, and enable them to complete their lives and spend them as happily as God intended they should, in the green trees and bright sunshine.

The centre figure is intended to show the new puffed sleeve, which will certainly be a feature of our spring fashions, and a very becoming one too. Another way of putting on the puff is to make the lower part pointed to the elbow. Some sleeves of the kind which I have seen very lately were gigot, or "leg of mutton shape," and they were put in with an up-standing puff at the top round the armhole, which was made by gathering the top of the sleeve about an inch from the edge, and drawing it up to the size of the armhole, and sewing it in with the edge of the sleeve, thus making a puff to stand up. The running was graduated, so that the puff was wider at the top of the armhole, and fell to nothing under the arm. These puffs suit tall and slight people best. Many of the new sleeves are made with a double sleeve, the inner one being an ordinary tight coat sleeve, and the outer one made long and hanging, and square in shape at the lower edge, and often trimmed with a handsome ball-fringe. Nearly every sleeve has deep cuffs of a Mousquetaire cut. I have not seen so many of the puffed sleeves—I mean those puffed their entire length—as I expected. So, either they have been tried and not found becoming, or else they are not quite introduced yet, and will appear later on.

The hat is more generally worn than the bonnet just now, but these tiny new bonnets that I have illustrated this month will perhaps make a change, for I have seen them on some of the prettiest of our London girls. The newest veils are of lace, which is patterned all over in a straggling design, which is neither becoming nor pretty. All the new veils entirely cover the face, and the very small ones seem to have disappeared. They are nearly always bordered, either with lace, or a pattern in the lace itself.

The gloves now worn are chiefly of almond and mastic colour, when not tan or black; but black has quite returned to favour when worn with dresses which are braided with black, or trimmed with astrachan. In the evening, white or pale colours are the most worn, and mittens are unscen.

One could not help observing at all the galleries, where the London residents have congregated lately, the extreme plainness of the skirts, and the fact that the steels and cushions appear to have been abolished. Either the skirt hangs in plain straight folds at the back, and plain in front without folds, or else the fluted folds at the back stand out and form all the fulness. But this season we shall certainly see a reign of plain skirts again. One of the new kind is gauged in front for about five inches down, showing below the bodice; the back being arranged in two double or three box-pleats. One of the new bodices had a point at the back, round which the fulness at the back of the skirt was gathered and sewn, after the fashion of nearly thirty years ago. The point is from two and a half to three inches long, and is corded round quite in the old style, and should have a tiny cushion to support it, so as to prevent the bones from breaking.

The sash continues in favour, and, indeed, is likely to do so with the coming-in of plain skirts; and the wearing of the folded sash round the waist is quite a feature of the pretty Directoire jacket which we illustrate this month. The sash is generally of soft silk, which will fold without being bulky, and tie in large, soft-looking bows with long fringed ends. Bengaline or China silk may be used. Satin is much employed for linings, and the Directoire coats and redingotes require a good one, as they are so liable to fly back. The deep ruchings also on the short "Empire" gowns require lining with satin, and many ladies like to use a bright colour with a black gown to make it more cheerful in appearance. Fortunately there are quantities of moderately priced satins at present.

The paper pattern selected for the month is one of the new Directoire jackets, with a folded front or waistcoat and a sash-like band. These will probably be more worn than any other style during the spring and summer, as they are most graceful and pretty, and very suitable to a youthful figure. The bodice may match the skirt or not, and the silk front may be of a contrasting colour. The trimming of the jacket is of velvet, and about half a yard will be required; a yard of silk and three yards of material. The plastron in front may be of braiding instead of folds of silk, and in this case the lining may be used as a foundation. There are three pieces of the plastron—i.e., right and left side and band—half of lining of plastron, two sleeve pieces and cuff, collar, front, and revers, back, and two side pieces—thirteen pieces in all.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale, and one pattern given each month. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each pattern. If tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, including the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American bodice instead of stays ("emancipation"), Corday skirt with pleats, jacket-bodice with waistcoat, princess dress with full back, bodice with revers for braiding, and Directoire jacket with folded front.

THE GIRL'S OWN:

AN OCCASIONAL PAGE OF AMATEUR CONTRIBUTIONS.

Neuwied am Rhein.

August 11, 1888.

DEAR AUNT JEANNIE,—

At last I have something to give you an account of. I hope it will be some good, though I doubt it. Last Tuesday afternoon we were all told to come into the Stube, and we had been waiting about half a minute when in came Herr Director and told us that as the weather appeared to be changing for the better (it was about time, don't you think?) we were to make the three days' walk, going up the Rhine to Bingen, and sleeping there two nights, making excursions all round and returning to Neuwied on Friday. He was no sooner out of the room than all the girls began screaming and shouting and making such a row as you never heard in your life, unless it might be when the lions are fed at the Zoo. Then we had to set about packing our bundles, which all went into a huge box together. The next morning (Wednesday) we got up at seven, had breakfast in a fearful hurry, and rushed off to the station. Of course after our hurry we had to wait about half an hour for the train! We got to Coblenz about 9.30, where we took the boat, the "Niederwald," such a splendid ship, lighted with electric light. We were all tired by the time we got on board, and I am ashamed to say, instead of staying on deck and enjoying the lovely scenery, about eight of us went down into the ladies' cabin, which is all comfortably fitted up with armchairs and sofas, and told stories, awful ghost-stories, adventures, and all sorts, taking it in turns. I told Rider Haggard's "Jess," which was greatly appreciated. We stopped and had dinner at St. Goar, a jolly little village with a splendid castle, "Rheinfels," on a hill above it. After dinner we climbed up there. We had a guide, who told us a good bit about it. It is by far the largest castle on the Rhine; you get a beautiful view of the "Katz" and the "Maus" (castles) from it. The reason they are so called is that the Graf of the "Katz" was called Graf Katzenelnbogen, and the other Graf nicknamed him the "Katz." When he heard of this he said he might be a cat, but that he could make the mouse feel his claws. Ever since that they have been called the "Katz" and the "Maus." In Rheinfels there is a well in which (so the guide said) anyone over eighteen looking would be married the same year. Only one of us was the right age, and she was made to look in, though I don't think she wanted to particularly. There were in a sort of cellar place six deep square holes, six by eight feet square, and thirty-six feet deep. Into these, the guide told us, the unlucky war prisoners of the Graf were put to drag out their miserable existences as best they could. They were in no way criminals, only poor men against whom the count had a spite. They could not possibly get out, though the holes were not at all covered nor the door of the cellar locked, because the walls of the holes were quite straight and smooth. It must have been dreadful to have the fresh air and freedom "so near and yet so far."

We came down from the castle about four, and went on up to Bingen in another boat, the "Rhine." I can tell you we did not go into the cabin then. The scenery all round us was perfect, old castles and towers on both sides. The first, very interesting, was the "Lorelei," of which everyone knows the legend. The Rhine there is still very narrow, though most of the rocks which made it so dangerous have been cleared away. You can quite imagine "Lore" sitting on the top of the rock combing her golden hair and singing.

It would be no use to attempt to give you details of every castle that we passed; it would fill a book almost I think; I almost filled my sketch-book with them! There was the "Devil's Way," a very steep and rocky precipice, one might almost say, up which a brave knight had to ride to win a fair lady's hand; "Fürstenburg," where there is a rock just like a nun, which as you go along appears to go into the castle and then comes out the other side like a monk; it is awfully queer; Rheinstein, the most beautiful castle on the Rhine; then as we came into Bingen, "dear Bingen on the Rhine," the "Mäuseturm" in the middle of the Rhine, where old Bishop Hatto was eaten up by the rats for burning a lot of poor people in a barn; and "last but not least," on the mountain opposite Bingen, with the Niederwald behind and round it, the Germania monument, which was erected after the Franco-German war.

We got into Bingen about 7.45 p.m., and were very glad to get to our beds. The next morning we got up at 7, as we were going up the Nahe, a tributary of the Rhine, flowing into it by Bingen. We went in the train beyond Kreuznach to a little village called Münster am Stein. We climbed a dreadful hill, and thought we were quite dead when we got to the top, but somehow we came to life when it was proposed to go to a still higher one, with a still more beautiful view. From there the first mountain looked quite small; but the climb! Think of the greatest heat you ever were in, multiply it by ten, and add stuff dresses, which we were all bound to wear, and you may have a small idea of what it was like. Coming back we had to cross the Nahe in a ferry boat: it was lovely on the water though the sun burned dreadfully. We thought that after all our exertions we were going to have a nice quiet rest in an hotel in the town; imagine our horror and surprise when we were told that we must climb another hill to get to the place where our dinner was awaiting us.

We felt really like bursting when we got to the top, but we had not long to wait for dinner, and that made us better again. There were two human skulls in a place in a wall, besides a lot of cannon balls, some very big, which had been shot by the French against the place, which was an old castle. The proprietor of the hotel had the sweetest little baby boy, which would come to us quite willingly. We could hardly tear ourselves away from him when it was time to go. We went then by train to Kreuznach, a large watering-place. We got there about three, and had two hours in which we might go where we liked in the town and enjoy ourselves. There are most lovely shops there, and splendid roses can be had for a halfpenny or a penny—you can buy a huge bouquet for 1s. 6d. Our money did go quick there. I, and most of the other girls, came back to Bingen at night without a penny! We got up at 6.30 the next morning and went over the Rhine in a steamer to Rüdesheim, where the best Rhine wine comes from (the spirit of Charles the Great, who had the vines planted there, is supposed to come and bless them every spring). From there we went up the mountain to the Germania in a cog-wheel train, and saw the "Germania" monument, which is the most lovely thing, and the biggest of the sort I ever saw. On the top is Germania, the German Britannia, about four times life-size, holding up in the air in her left hand a crown, in her right hand a long sword. Her dress is lovely—like brocade satin—with eagles and flowers on it. At the corners of her pedestal wreaths of oak, palm, laurel and beech, and below, all round, the coats-of-arms of all the German princes. Underneath these, in front, a group of men, portraits of the chief people in the army, with the old Kaiser in the middle on horseback, and Kaiser Friedrich and Prince Bismarck on either side of him; on the two sides beautiful pictures of the departure to and return from the war, of the father, husband, and son. The former of these is, in my eyes, the most beautiful part of the whole. These figures are all life-size. One step below, at the front corners, are War and Peace (angels), one having trumpet and sword, the other an olive branch and the horn of plenty overflowing with grapes and other fruits. They are about two and a half times life-size.

Below these, in the middle, are the Father Rhine and the Virgin Mosel. Old Rhine is giving to the Mosel a horn, through which she shall shout to him when the enemy approaches, so that the watch on the Rhine may be kept. Underneath the whole of the "Wacht am Rhein" is written. In the front of it, before you get up to the statue, are the words of the Kaiser as he laid the foundation stone in 1877: "As my royal father called the people to him when the monument was erected in Berlin, so do I now call my people to me in laying the foundation stone of this monument to the memory of those who fell in the war, that the living may remember them, and that future generations may follow their example." This is not exact, but something of the sense. The figures are all of metal, made of the guns taken from the French in the war. Mustn't they rage at it just! After seeing the monument we walked along through the Niederwald, which is a beech forest, and lovely, till we came to the "magic cave." You go in through a long dark passage, and suddenly come out into the light, when you get a very pretty view through the trees.

We went up a high tower, too, from whence it seemed as though we saw the whole world around us; the Rhine, the Nahe, castles, towns, villages, forests, fields, everything; simply beautiful! Then we came back through the wood again, down the mountain very quick in the cog-wheel train, and over the Rhine in a small boat; then table d'hôte in the hotel, and we came back down the Rhine in the "Drachenfels." This time we did not go down in the cabin, I can tell you, so we saw a good bit of fresh scenery after St. Goar. There are two castles almost exactly alike not far from there, built by two brothers, who both fell in love with the same young lady.

They fought to settle which should have her, but they each killed the other, and the lady entered a convent. She is the most to be pitied I think, don't you? A little before Coblenz is Stolzenfels, a beautiful castle, where there are lots of armour and weapons. Opposite Coblenz is Ehrenbreitstein, a large and very strong fortress, called the "Gibraltar of the Rhine." It looks like a great lion on the hill watching over and guarding the city from all enemies.

After Coblenz there was not much to see except occasionally a bathing house, with a lot of boys waving towels at the steamers! About six we got back to dear old Neuwied. I was quite glad to be home again after all our wanderings, but I think the others were sorry for the end of our freedom.

With much love to Uncle Harman and the boys,

I am, yours affectionately,

MARY T. LLOYD (age 14).

MY WORK BASKET.

FIG. 1.—INFANT'S KNITTED DRAWERS.

FOUR knitting needles are required. The size of needles and cotton selected according to the size of drawers.

Commence at the waist by casting on 130 stitches, and knit 3 plain rows.

4th Row.—Begin by knitting 1; bring the thread forward, knit 2 together; repeat to end of row.

5th, 6th and 7th Rows.—2 plain, 2 purl.

104 plain rows follow.

105th Row.—46 stitches; leave them on the needle; take a third needle and continue the row by taking 2 together; knit 34, then 2 together; leave the remaining 46 stitches on the left hand needle.

Turn the work, and knit with the fourth needle 63 rows on the 36 stitches; after which, decrease each row by taking 2 together before the last stitch on needle, until the work is finished in a point; fasten off and commence one of the legs.

Work 30 rows; 2 plain, 2 purl.

FIG. 1.

When both legs are finished, sew them up; also the pointed piece to each side of the drawers to the waistband. The open stitches have an elastic threaded through them. Four loops are made on the top of the waistband to correspond with buttons on the bodice, so as to keep the drawers in place without pressure. The legs are trimmed with a simple edging of crochet.

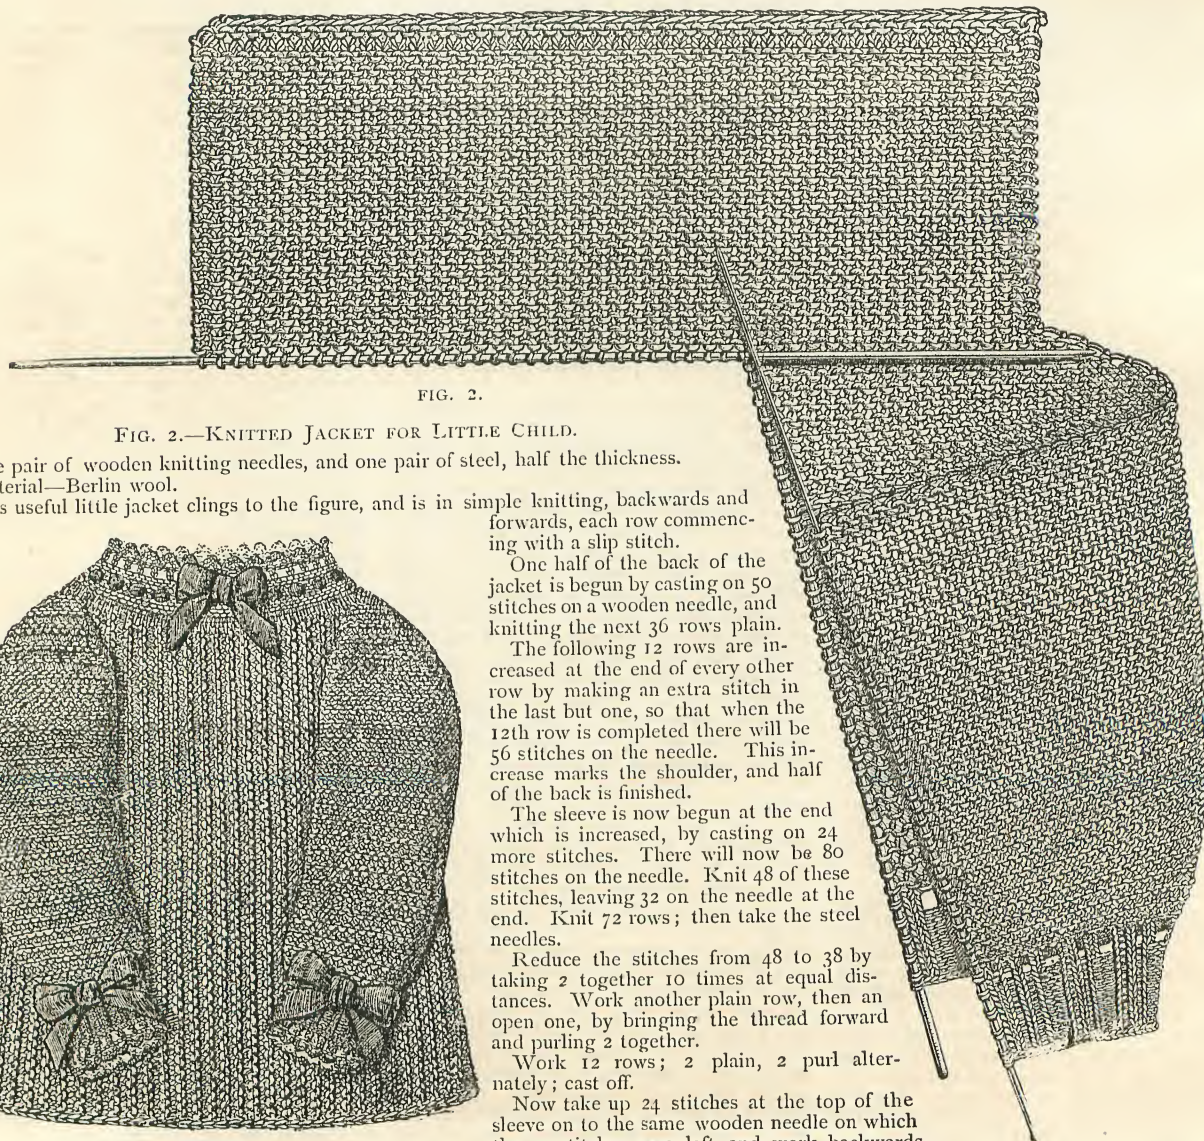

FIG. 2.

FIG. 2.—KNITTED JACKET FOR LITTLE CHILD.

One pair of wooden knitting needles, and one pair of steel, half the thickness. Material—Berlin wool.

This useful little jacket clings to the figure, and is in simple knitting, backwards and forwards, each row commencing with a slip stitch.

One half of the back of the jacket is begun by casting on 50 stitches on a wooden needle, and knitting the next 36 rows plain.

The following 12 rows are increased at the end of every other row by making an extra stitch in the last but one, so that when the 12th row is completed there will be 56 stitches on the needle. This increase marks the shoulder, and half of the back is finished.

The sleeve is now begun at the end which is increased, by casting on 24 more stitches. There will now be 80 stitches on the needle. Knit 48 of these stitches, leaving 32 on the needle at the end. Knit 72 rows; then take the steel needles.

Reduce the stitches from 48 to 38 by taking 2 together 10 times at equal distances. Work another plain row, then an open one, by bringing the thread forward and purling 2 together.

Work 12 rows; 2 plain, 2 purl alternately; cast off.

Now take up 24 stitches at the top of the sleeve on to the same wooden needle on which the 32 stitches were left, and work backwards and forwards for 12 rows, taking 2 together every alternate row at the neck, thus decreasing it in the same manner as it was increased at the back of the shoulder. Work 11 plain rows, which will complete the half of the front.

The other half of the jacket is worked in the same way, excepting that the knitting is continued from the front, which is left whole, and carried on to the back, where it is fastened up by buttons.

Take up the stitches round the neck on a steel needle. Work 3 rows; first row plain, second purl, and third plain, so that the purl side is the right or outside of the jacket.

4th Row.—Open row to match the wristband. 3 more rows like the three first rows. Cast off.

The throat and sleeves are trimmed with a narrow crochet edging.

The sleeves may be joined by taking the stitches on each side on to two separate needles, and with a third knitting the 2 rows together. We think that simply sewing up the sleeve will make a smoother seam.

Each side of the jacket has a band of linen sewn on inside for a stay for the buttons and loops. The under, or button side, must have a wider band, so as to allow of the jacket closing well over.

FIG. 3.—SMALL ANTIMACASSAR.

This antimacassar is made of white or cream-coloured French or Java canvas, or coarse, even Irish linen, and trimmed with a suitable strong lace to match. The design given is edged with a crochet border, but this style is not in strict keeping with the work; and bought trimming laces are so effective and reasonable in price that few would be willing to take the time to crochet a lace for such a purpose.

The canvas may be purchased ready drawn, to save a somewhat troublesome part in making this pretty antimacassar; but should the plain material be preferred, a larger square of canvas must be taken, in order to leave a good margin for the finishing of the edges.

The design is entirely outlined with black filoselle, within which is a row in a rich cream shade. Both these rows are in plain cross stitches. The filling in is worked in piqué stitches. The corners are worked in cross and Holbein stitches. The outline of each part is in cross stitch of the black and cream-coloured filoselle.

The centre stitch of the large square is in black, round which is a row of cream-coloured filoselle. The four designs round the centre are alternate bronze and light claret. The lower parts of the four floral corner designs are dark claret in Holbein stitch, edged with a row of cross stitches in cream. The upper part, half bronze, half light olive. The four remaining parts of the design are, two light blue, and two light olive.

The corners are worked in cross and Holbein stitches. The centre of the diamond is in dark claret in Holbein stitch, outlined with cream colour, and an outer row of black in cross stitch. The remainder of the square is in light olive and light blue.

The Punto Tirato is worked with one of the shades of the filoselle. The lace is greatly improved by being outlined with the dark claret.

THE ROMANCE OF NATURE;
OR,
THE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS, PLANTS, EARTH, AIR, SEA, AND SKY.

By JAMES MASON.

IV.—MORE FOLKLORE OF PLANTS.

IN our last article we spoke about plants of modest stature, but now we enter the greenwood shade and turn our attention to the giants of the vegetable race. And first about the oak, "the king of forests all."

The oak was held in reverence by many ancient nations, such as the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, and the old inhabitants of our own country. It used to be said amongst the Greeks that it was the first tree ever created, and they showed their regard for it by the phrase, "I speak to the oak," used in affirming anything with particular solemnity.

The Druids worshipped the oak and performed many of their rites under the shadow of its branches. Whatever grew on the tree was thought by them to be a gift from Heaven, and more especially was this believed of the mistletoe.

"When you see a large hole in an oak," says an old woman, an authority on the folklore of Yorkshire, "you may be sure that the tree is haunted." In Germany the holes in the oak are believed to be pathways for elves. "These elves," we are told, "are little beings small enough to creep into acorns and hazel nuts, where they hide themselves, and where sometimes even "Lying down they soundly sleep

As safe as in a castle."

Amongst northern nations the oak used to be considered under the protection of Thor, the hammer-wielding god. When Christianity brought in a new state of things, and the cross took the place of Thor's hammer, crosses used to be marked on oak trees. They were thus, it was thought, withdrawn from the dominion of Thor and put under the care of Christian spirits, after which they were a safe refuge, not only for human beings, but for some tribes of the elfin world.

The oak used to be referred to by the superstitious for information regarding the future. The change of its leaves from their usual colour gave more than one, says Evelyn, "fatal premonition of coming misfortune during the civil war." From the gall or oak-apple, too, much valuable information was obtained. Willford in his "Nature's Secrets" remarks: "In autumn (some say), in the gall or oak-apple, one of these three things will be found (if cut in pieces)—a fly, denoting want; a worm, plenty; but if a spider, mortality." An older writer tells us: "If you take an oak-apple from an oak tree, and open the same, you shall find a small worm therein, which, if it doth fly away it signifies wars; if it creep it betokens scarceness of corn; if it turns about, it foreshows the plague. This is the countryman's astrology which they have long observed for truth."

Not so long ago the influence of the oak in curing disease was believed in. A writer in Notes and Queries states that about a mile from Berkhamstead in Hertfordshire, on a spot where two roads cross each other, are a few oak trees called cross oaks. Here patients afflicted with ague used to resort and peg a lock of their hair into one of these oaks, then by a sudden wrench transfer the lock from their heads to the tree, and return home with the full conviction that the ague had departed with the severed lock. "Persons now living," says the writer, "affirm that they have often seen hair thus left pegged into the oak, for only one of these trees was endowed with the healing power."

A good remedy for toothache was held in Oldenburg to be to bore the tooth with a nail till it bled, and then drive the nail in an oak at a place where it would not be shone on by the sun, not saying a word all the time. The pain was held to cease when the nail rusted.

It was an old notion that lightning might strike but would never burn the oak. Another superstition mentioned by Bacon is that boughs of the oak put into the earth will put forth wild vines. A curious tradition exists in Westphalia, giving the oak a place in the life of the Wandering Jew. It is said that that luckless vagabond can only rest where he finds two oaks growing in the form of a cross.

The custom, perhaps, does not now survive, even in out-of-the-world corners of England, but at one time it was a common practice for people to wear in their hats the leaves of the oak on the 29th of May, the anniversary of the Restoration of Charles II. Huge branches of oak were also cut down and dragged home, and the old towns and villages were made to look gay with long lines of green boughs projecting from every door and window. This was done to commemorate the wonderful escape of Charles II. from those who were in pursuit of him, who passed under the very oak tree in which he had hidden himself after the battle of Worcester.

The oak was adopted as their badge by the Stuarts, and the superstitious Highlanders used to say that its not being an evergreen was an omen of the fate of the royal arms during the rebellion of '45.

The holly has an advantage over the oak in being clothed all the year round. A Border proverb defines an habitual story-teller as one who "lees never but when the hollen is green."

The name holly is said to be a corruption of holy, the monks of the olden time having been in the habit of calling the tree "the holy tree."

Everyone knows the conspicuous place taken by the holly amongst the evergreen decorations of Christmas. The custom of employing it and other plants in this way is one of considerable antiquity, and has been looked on as a survival of the usages of the Roman Saturnalia, which fell about the same time as Christmas. Or it may have taken its origin from an old Teutonic practice of hanging the interior of dwellings with evergreens, as a refuge for sylvan spirits against the frost and snow of winter.

A quaint old writer thus spiritualises the use of holly at Christmas. "Our churches and houses," he says, "decked with bayes and rosemary, holly and ivy, and other plants which are always green, winter and summer, signify and put us in mind of His deity, that the child that now was born was God and man, who should spring up like a tender plant, should always be green and flourishing, and live for evermore."

In some parts of England it is thought unlucky to introduce holly into a house before Christmas Eve. In various rural districts holly with sharp prickles and holly without are known respectively as "he" and "she," and in Derbyshire there is a saying that as the holly brought indoors at Christmas is smooth or rough, the wife or the husband will be master.

The Christmas evergreens long ago were removed on Candlemas Eve. On the approach of Candlemas, says Herrick—

"Down with the rosemary and bayes,
Down with the mistletoe,
Instead of holly, now upraise
The greener box for show."

According to the same poet a complete clearance must then be made of all the evergreens. "For look," he says—

"How many leaves there be Neglected there, maids, trust to me,
So many goblins you shall see."

In Suffolk the peasants used to believe that a death was sure to occur in the family occupying any pew in church in which even a leaf or a berry was left.

It is in some places held to be very wrong to burn the Christmas decorations, but where that view is not held, the young people occasionally draw inferences regarding the steadfastness or fickleness of their sweethearts from the brilliancy and crackling of the flames.

Holly that has adorned churches at Christmas is in Worcestershire and Herefordshire much thought of, the possession of a small branch with berries being supposed to ensure a prosperous year. It used to be thought by the common people in Germany that consecrated twigs of holly hung over a door were a safeguard against thunderstorms.

Witches were held to hate the holly most cordially, which makes it a desirable tree to have in people's gardens. "As touching the holly or hulver tree," says Pliny, "if it be planted about a house, whether it be within a city or standing in the country, it serveth for a counter-charm, and keeps away all evil spells and enchantments."

Some other curious superstitions are told by Pliny. He records that the flowers of the holly cause water to freeze; that it is a defence against lightning; that it repels poison, and that if a staff of its wood be thrown at any animal, even if it fall short of touching it, the animal will be so subdued by its influence as to return and lie down by it.

The hazel is a wonderful tree. Of its wood are made divining rods for the discovery of concealed objects, it being an old belief that the hazel has a subtle sympathy with what lies hidden deep underground. "The child," says Mr. Conway, "who, fortunate enough to get hold of the original version of Cinderella, sympathises with poor Ashputtel as she sits under the hazel, saying—and glows with delight as the bird alights with all that is desirable, is catching a faint echo of a profound faith, which once held the hazel to be in the secret of all the treasures of the earth."

"Shake, shake, hazel tree, Gold and silver over me."

The way in which the hazel was used for purposes of discovery was very simple. "A long forked branch or twig formed the divining rod. The person who bore it walked very slowly over the place where he suspected mines or springs (for the rod was also good for discovering springs) to be. When the rod which was held horizontally bent of itself, that indicated at once the presence of the desired metal or water. It was employed for finding metals and minerals of all kinds, gold, silver, copper, veins of lead, seams of coal, &c. Even to this day this superstitious practice is observed in the North of England, in Cornwall, and other mining districts." According to Cornish tradition the divining rod is guided in its marvellous indications by the pixies, all the treasures of the earth being in the keeping of these little people.

The divining rod of hazel was also used in the pursuit of criminals, and to point out where the bodies of murdered men lay concealed. In a work published in the seventeenth century, a surprising story is told of a man who, guided by a hazel wand, followed a murderer more than forty-five leagues over the land and upwards of thirty leagues over the sea. In Suabia it used to be believed that a hazel rod if cut on a Friday would enable one to give a whack to an absent person.

There is a superstition in some parts of the Continent that the hazel affords a resting-place during the silent hours of night to Salome, the daughter of Herodias, who danced before Herod on the eve of the execution of John the Baptist. She hovers between heaven and earth, and can only alight when all the world is sleeping. She rests then till cock-crowing upon oaks and hazel trees.

The nut of the hazel occupies a prominent place amongst the rites of All Hallows' Eve, or Halloween, as it is called in Scotland. "When young women," says the author of "Popular Antiquities," "would know if their lovers are faithful, they put nuts upon the bars of the grate, naming the nuts after the lovers and themselves. If a nut cracks or jumps, the lover will prove unfaithful; if it begins to blaze or burn, he has a regard for the person making the trial. If the nuts named after a girl and her lover burn they will be married."

In Burns' well-known poem of "Halloween" we have a lifelike picture of this nut-burning spell:—

"The auld guidwife's well-hoordit nits
Are round an' round divided,
An' mony lads' and lasses' fates
Are there that night decided.
Some kindle, conthie, side by side,
And burn thegither trimly;
Some start awa wi' saucy pride,
And jump out-owre the chimly,
Fu' high that night."

"Jean slips in twa, wi' tentie e'e;
Wha 'twas, she wadna tell;
But this is Jock, an' this is me,
She says in to hersel.
He bleazed owre her, an' she owre him,
As they wud never mair part,
Till fuff! he started up the lum,
An' Jean had e'en a sair heart
To see't that night."

Fuller, in his "Worthies," speaking of the willow, says it is "a sad tree, whereof such as have lost their love make their mourning garlands; and we know what exiles hung up their harps upon such doleful supporters." It may be that the tree has obtained its dolorous character from the exiles of Israel hanging their harps on its branches.

The willow figures in many a song of the olden time dealing with deserted love, such as that by John Heywood—

"All a green willow, willow,
All a green willow is my garland."

Then there is that touching ditty sung by Desdemona, beginning—

"The poor soul sat sighing by a sycamore tree—

Sing all a green willow;
Her hand on her bosom, her head on her knee—
Sing willow, willow, willow."

With songs such as these running in his memory, Herrick thus addresses the willow-tree—

"Thou art, to all lost love, the best,
The only true plant found;
Wherewith young men and maids distrest
And left of love are crowned.

"When once the lovers' rose is dead,
Or laid aside forlorn,
Then willow garlands 'bout the head
Bedewed with tears are worn.

"When with neglect—the lover's bane—
Poor maids rewarded be:
For their love lost, their only gain
Is but a wreath from thee.

"And underneath thy cooling shade,
When weary of the light,
The love-spent youth and love-sick maid
Come to weep out the night."

For lovers' spells the willow used to be used in the North of England in the following way: A girl took a willow wand in her left hand, and taking care that no one saw her, slipped out of the house and ran round it three times, crying, "He that's to be my gudeman come and grip the end o't." During the third circuit the likeness of the future husband was supposed to appear and seize the end of the wand.

The aspen or trembling-leaved poplar is remarkable on account of the constant movement of the leaves, even with a very gentle breeze. To account for this trembling motion there are three curious legends. According to one the shivering of the tree is a punishment it undergoes for its pride in refusing to bow to our Saviour when all the other trees of the forest bent before Him. Another affirms that the cross of our Lord was made of aspen wood, and that the aspens of our day shiver with horror in sympathy with the mother tree. In some districts it is said to have been the tree on which Judas hanged himself after betraying his Master, and that ever since the leaves have trembled for shame.

The ash is a tree whose folklore is full of interest. It was a sacred tree amongst all the Teutonic and Scandinavian nations. In the "Prose Edda" we are told that the first man was made out of a log of ashwood found lying on the seashore. The court of the Northern gods was reported to be held under an ash tree, and it was there that they administered justice.

A carriage with its axles made of ashwood was long ago believed to go faster than one in which any other sort of wood was employed. Tools, too, with handles made of this wood were supposed to enable a man to do more work than he could overtake with tools whose handles were not of ash.

In Somersetshire the "ashen fagot" used to have great prominence amongst the Christmas customs. There was a notion that misfortune would overtake the house in which it was not annually burned. In Derbyshire, when the fagot was burned on Christmas Eve, it was made of small sticks bound together by a cord or withes. People said that the ceremony was in commemoration of the fact that our Lord, when born, was dressed by a fire of ash sticks.

Snakes, it is said, are never known to rest under the shadow of an ash, and a single blow from an ash stick, according to a popular notion, makes an end instantly of an adder, whilst if struck by any other stick it will retain marks of life till sunset. In Devonshire it is said that if a circle be drawn with an ashen staff round a sleeping viper it cannot pass out of it. The sap of the ash tapped on certain days in spring is drunk in some parts of Germany as a remedy for the bite of venomous reptiles.

The mountain ash, known in Scotland and the North of England as the rowan tree, is a tree of a mysterious character. It is powerful against witches. The smallest twig crossing a witch's path will, it is held, effectually stop her career.

An interesting anecdote illustrative of this belief is told by Waterton, the author of the celebrated "Wanderings." "In the village of Walton in Yorkshire," he says, writing about 1835, "I have two small tenants; the name of one is James Simpson and that of the other Sally Holloway; and Sally's stands a little before the house of Simpson.

"Some three months ago I overtook Simpson on the turnpike road, and I asked him if his cow was getting better, for his son had told me that she had fallen sick.

"'She's coming on surprisingly, sir,' quoth he. 'The last time the doctor came to see her, 'Jem,' said he to me, looking earnestly at old Sally's house, 'Jem,' said he, 'mind and keep your cowhouse door shut before the sun goes down, otherwise I won't answer for what may happen to the cow.' 'Ay, ay, my lad,' said I, 'I understand your meaning; but I am up to the old slut, and I defy her to do me any harm now!'

"'But what has old Sally been doing to you, James?' said I.

"'Why, sir,' replied he, 'we all know too well what she can do. She has long owed me a grudge; and my cow, which was in very good health, fell sick immediately after Sally had been seen to look in at the door of the cowhouse just as night was coming on. The cow grew worse, and so I went and cut a bit of wiggan (mountain ash), and I nailed the branches all up and down the cowhouse; and, sir, you may see them there if you will take the trouble to step in. I am a match for old Sally now, and she can't do me any more harm, so long as the wiggan branches hang in the place where I have nailed them. My poor cow will get better in spite of her.'

"Alas! I thought I to myself, as the deluded man was finishing his story, how much there is yet to be done in our country by the school-master of the nineteenth century!"

The virtue of the mountain ash as a safeguard against witches and evil spirits is recorded in one of the stanzas of a very ancient song:—

"Their spells were vain, the hags returned
To the queen, in sorrowful mood,
Crying that witches have no power
Where there is rowan tree wood."

It is mentioned by Dr. Robert Chambers, in his "Popular Rhymes of Scotland," that David Ritchie, a deformed pauper and the original of Scott's "Black Dwarf," always carried a piece of mountain ash in his pocket, while his garden was full of plants of this tree. In Yorkshire the rowan used to be grown near houses with a view to scaring witches off the premises.

Farmers often had their whipstocks made of rowan tree wood, believing that—

"If your whipstock's made of rowan
You may ride your nag through any town."

Herdboys in Aberdeenshire preferred to have a stick of ash, because, they said, in throwing it at the cattle it was sure not to strike on a vital part, and so kill or injure the animal, which a stick of any other kind might do.

In the North of England, when the gude-wife churned for hours without the butter coming—in which case it was clear the cream was bewitched—it was considered that the best thing to do was to get two small branches of the mountain ash, strike the cream with one of them and beat the cow with the other. The charm would then be broken.

The handle of the churn, people say in Germany, should be of mountain ash. "An instructive tale is told of a man who, passing by a farmhouse one morning, heard the people in it churning. But it seems they were attempting it without the rowan handle. At the same time he saw a woman whom he knew, a witch by reputation, standing by the side of a running brook, and churning with a stick in the water. He went on to town, and in the market-place saw the same woman selling a large lump of butter.

"In the evening he again passed by the farmhouse where he heard the sound of churning in the morning. They were still churning away. He went in and told them that they might just as well leave off; their labour was in vain, for the butter already had been sold in the neighbouring town."

The elder is another curious tree. In this country a belief was once prevalent that the cross of Christ was made from its wood. For this reason it was never used as fuel or treated with disrespect. In Scotland this superstition was very commonly held. "In my boyhood," says Mr. James Napier, speaking of the folklore of the West of Scotland, "I remember that my brothers, sisters, and myself were warned against breaking a twig or branch from the elder hedge which surrounded my grandfather's garden. We were told at the time as a reason for this prohibition that it was poisonous; but we discovered afterwards that there was another reason, viz., that it was unlucky to break off even a small twig from a boutree (elder) bush."

Mr. Napier also adds, writing in 1879, "In some parts of Scotland, people would not put a piece of elderwood into the fire, and I have seen not many years ago, pieces of this wood lying about unused when the neighbourhood was in great straits for firewood; but none would use it, and when asked why, the answer was, 'We don't know, but folks say it is not lucky to burn the boutree.'"

The Scotch peasant used often to address the following rhyme to the elder or boutree, ascribing misfortune to it ever since it was made the instrument of our Saviour's death:—

"Boutree, boutree, crooked rung,
Never straight and never strong,
Ever bush and never tree,
Since our Lord was nailed to thee."

It was, however, a common tradition in the Middle Ages that the elder was the tree on which Judas hanged himself. For this reason, perhaps, to be crowned with elder was in the olden time considered a disgrace. Mushroom-like resembling the human ear are often found growing on the elder tree. These are known as Jews' ears, a corruption, say the best authorities, of Judas' ears, and evidently referring to this old superstition.

A Scandinavian superstition asserts that the elder tree is inhabited by a mystical being—the elder mother or elder wife—by whom all injuries done to the tree are avenged. In Denmark the flowers may not be gathered without asking her leave, its wood must not be used for making any household furniture, and a child sleeping in an elder-wood cradle would certainly, they say, be strangled by the elder mother.

The country people in Lower Saxony, until very recent times, when about to lop the elder, repeated the following prayer three times, with bended knees and folded hands: "Lady Elder, give me some of thy wood; then will I also give thee some of mine when it grows in the forest."

The elder is the last tree we shall mention for its folklore, for in our next article we must proceed to a new division of our subject.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A RUSSIAN GIRL.—We are much gratified by your appreciation of our magazine. The origin of the name "teetotaler" is ascribed to Richard Turner, who when speaking at a temperance meeting (September, 1833) tried to emphasise the word "total" in reference to abstinence from spirituous drinks, and said, "We not only want total abstinence, we want more, we want t—total abstinence," and the force of the expression took the fancy of the audience, who adopted it as their distinctive name. In reference to the letter "a" in English, it has three sounds: "Abel," "ape," "ache," "fate," "plate," etc. The second sound, as in "alas," "animal," "bag," "band," "abbot," etc. The third sound, as in "all," "hall," "call," "wall," "autumn," etc. Germans are rarely successful in their pronunciation of English, whereas the Russians are remarkably proficient in this respect, as also in their facility in acquiring the grammar and whole construction of the language. Of this your own letter is a good example.

E. WILKINSON.—We much approve of your society for the suppression of exaggerated terms, diverting the use of the real significance of the word, or departing from the actual truth through the use of the "superlative" degree of comparison, instead of the "positive" or "comparative." This mode of speaking involves a great departure from truth, and shakes confidence in any testimony. The use of "slang" terms is also much to be reprehended. We wish your efforts much success.

DEVONSHIRE LASSIE.—There is no living animal called a "griffin." It is a fabulous one employed in heraldry. At the same time we think that its origin, or the ideal, was taken from the monsters of pre-historic times, or a combination of more than one. We are glad you are gratified by the "advice given to poor girls."

O, MA MERE, QUE JE VOUS AIME!—We are never prisoners in "Doubting Castle," God be thanked! unless we like to be such. Our low spirits and vexations too often arise from thinking too much of ourselves. When we can see our duty we know that, like our Divine Master, we must be busy in the service of others, and find our happiness in "going about doing good." The virtues of His life—humility, unselfishness, and love—are hard to practise, especially the "loving others better than ourselves."

AN INQUIRER E.—We should advise you to have your hand well rubbed with a little oil, so as to give it strength, keep it warm, and wear mittens when playing the piano.

BEN-MY-CHIEF.—Paternoster Row was so named from the rosary or paternoster makers, and some say it was so called because funeral processions on their way to St. Paul's began their paternosters at the beginning of the Row, and continued them till they reached the church gate. Paternoster means the Lord's Prayer, so called from the two first words in the Latin version ("Father, ours").

BROWNIE.—If liable to colds in the head, be careful to cover it on going into a cold atmosphere, and sleep in a flannel cap, covering the forehead. On going out of a warm room always breathe through the nose, and, indeed, remember that this last is a very important thing.

A WEARY WORKER might find what she requires at the Home of Rest, Buckingham Cottage, Bickley, Kent. It is for the benefit of school teachers, postal and telegraph clerks, and women employed in business. No case requiring nursing is received, and a medical certificate and reference is required. Board and lodging, 8s. a week; washing and railway fare extras, but the latter from London to Bickley by second-class is 1s. 6d., and third-class, 9d. only. Apply to Miss Lyell, 9, Cornwall Gardens, S.W.

E. HARTLAND.—We draw attention to your Early Rising Society with pleasure. The yearly subscription, 1s., and a stamped envelope is to be sent for the rules. Applicants should address Miss E. Hartland, secretary, Church Street, Newent, Gloucester.

BEATRICE.—One of the best things for use in cleaning and washing the hair is a beaten up egg well rubbed in, and afterwards washed out with warm water. Your hair does not require washing often, unless you live in London, where nothing keeps clean very long.

ORIANA.—We are sorry to hear of your illness, and regret that we cannot help you further than by suggesting an advertisement in one of the many ladies' newspapers.

SUFFERER had better write to the matron at the hospital and inquire CLYTH writes to say that she puts a heavy weight on her feet for five minutes, as a remedy for coming chilblains! We should advise her to try rubbing them with a little dry mustard for five minutes instead. February 27, 1864, was a Saturday.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We think you would find a desirable Home of Rest at Shaftesbury House, Seaside Road, Eastbourne. Address Mrs. Parsons. We have named this place before, having been greatly approved by the headmistress of St. John's schools, Canterbury Road, Brixton. The charge is 12s. a week in a dormitory, and 15s. for a private room, and no extras. It is a temperance home, and there are prayers morning and evening, including the singing of hymns. There is perfect freedom to all alike to attend their own places of worship on Sundays.

SAMBO.—We do not object to your reciting any poetry published by us, provided that you state that it was taken from our magazine.

M. W. K. L.—The verses show much religious feeling, but are not "poetry."

BASLYN MEUX.—The 15th November, 1880 (Leap Year) was a Monday. Many thanks for your amusing and kind note.

A BUSINESS GIRL.—We do not insert queries of the kind, but it is quite needless, as we have personal knowledge of the home in question, and it is everything that is comfortable and pleasant.

LEONIE.—It is quite allowable to use the Christian name in the way you mention, if you wish so to do. It is very frequently done, and where there are several of a family it proves useful. The name would be printed "Miss Mary Pryce-Hamilton," but without any connecting hyphen between it and the surname. 2. In case of the bride's living in one of the London suburbs, the day she will be "at home" from her wedding trip and ready to receive callers is sometimes mentioned with the announcement of the marriage. But it is not usual.

THE BABY GIRL. LAURA should consult a doctor. She apparently needs strengthening and some tonic medicine.

ORANGE.—The bride is usually accompanied by a sister or a friend, who in any case stands beside her. It is not needful to call her a "bridesmaid," unless you like to do so.

DIE ENTBEHRUNG.—The lines beginning—

"A heart at leisure from itself
To soothe and sympathise," are by A. L. Waring. The other lines you quote are from the chorus in "Atalanta in Calydon," by A. C. Swinburne. "Before the beginning of years" is the first line of the theme.

L. L.—Ling's Swedish drill is taught by Madame Bergman Osterberg, at the Hampstead Physical Training College, Broadhurst Gardens, N.W., close to the Finchley Road Station.

WENTWORTH's verses are in advance of most of the specimens sent us, though they need revision in the length of the lines, etc. Still, there is a certain swing about them that gives promise of future improvement provided she study the rules of metrical composition.

CHAPTER I.

LITTLE MRS. KITTY AT HOME IN ORIEL.

RS. KITTY DACRE was one of the two children—a son and a daughter—of Dr. Peter Dacre, a learned scholar and professor, of Oriel, in Oxford University. Dr. Peter represented the married men who, after the Reformation, took the place of the half-monkish heads and members of colleges. But although he was, in a sense, a citizen and a father of a family as well as a zealous and erudite teacher of youth, he was as buried in his books and as abstracted from the world outside their boards as ever was a bachelor by choice or by a priest's vow. This was especially true after the death of his wife, and in the absence of any woman among his kindred who could take her place, so that his boy and girl had to be entrusted to the care of his housekeeper, a confidential servant who had acted as Kitty's nurse in her mother's lifetime. Happily Mrs. Judith Pettit was worthy of the confidence reposed in her. Happily, too, for there are few trials without their compensations, the children had been too young at the time of their mother's death to realise the loss. This was notably true of Kitty and partly so of her brother John, or "Jackie," though he was manly and independent for his years.

Besides Mrs. Judy, Kitty had two good women friends. One was her aunt—her mother's sister—Madam Walton, the widow of the Squire of Islip Barnes, not very far from Oxford. But though her aunt and cousins were exceedingly kind to the little girl, and in her childhood she paid many a happy visit to their house, revelling in the delights of a country life, the distance was rather too great under the circumstances. Dr. Dacre led too retired a life, and Madam Walton had too delicate health and uncertain spirits, for Kitty to derive all the benefit from her kinswomanly regard which she might otherwise have done.

Kitty's other friend was more available. This was her godmother, Dame Tabitha Ottery, the widow of Sir Jasper Ottery of Hayston. She had for a period of years occupied a lodging in the High Street. Being childless and in affluence, she had every reason, born of near neighbourhood, leisure, ample means, and the good will of an attached friend of the family, not to lose sight of her god-child.

By favour of the Provost of Oriel, an infringement of rules had been permitted in Dr. Peter Dacre's case. As he was a poor man, and known not to be capable of great outlook in worldly matters, he had been suffered, on the death of his wife, to return to the college rooms he had formerly occupied and make them his home again. That would have been allowable enough, but another and much greater license had been granted to him, to bring with him his young children and his housekeeper, and establish them in a part of the Provost's house, which, as he happened to be a single man, he had never put to any use, while it was contiguous to Dr. Dacre's rooms and connected with them. The arrangement, meant to be temporary, slipped into a permanency, and after it had been winked at for the first few years, came to be considered a settled matter.

Even when the accommodating Provost died in a good old age, and was succeeded by another, who was a comparative stranger to Dr. Dacre, the new man did not like to inaugurate his college reign by showing himself one of the new brooms which sweep clean. He tolerated the innovation of his predecessor, with the greater ease to himself and his household, that he had but a small family. He resigned the rooms which had been given up to the Dacres with as good a grace as he could summon to his aid, till the time of protest and resistance had passed by.

No doubt these latitudinarian practices were helped by the fact that old Oriel or Hall Royal, with its foundations dating back to back to Adam de Brome and Edward II., was undergoing a grand restoration and transformation about this time. Before the political troubles of the generation had reached a crisis, while it was still palmy days with the beautiful venerable university city, there was much building and enlarging of old foundations going on at Oriel. In the original quadrangle the southern and western sides had been replaced in 1620, and in 1636 the re-erection of the northern side with the hall and chapel was about to begin. In the confusion occasioned by such extensive alterations, abuses were more likely to be tolerated than reformed.

Times were out of joint, no doubt, when a little fair-haired child went flitting like a white butterfly about the shady cloisters, destined as a sanctuary for learning and celibacy. Actually her ball could be occasionally heard bumping against the walls, and her brother Jackie's kite seen flying over the open space of the quadrangle. The brother and sister's chatter had been known to penetrate such "oaks" as were sported at an era when "oaks" were rare. For it had required an order in council to clear the town tennis-courts, bear-pits, and taverns of Oxford, of teachers and scholars alike, who preferred playing tennis and baiting bears, dicing, card playing, carousing, and brawling to the study of ancient books. It was the select few even among the elder men who did not linger in the common room from the mid-day dinner to long after the sundown supper, loudly toasting the king and drinking confusion to his enemies or vice-versa, boldly inveighing in a pugnacious minority against the misdoings of the Star Chamber and the corruptions of prelacy.

After all it was surely better that a merry young undergraduate should be caught playing ball with Kitty, or a kindly Fellow be discovered perching her on his shoulder as a necessary step in her progress to his room, where she would sit on his table, and eat all his quince marmalade, than that such a scene should happen as had conferred an unenviable distinction on a neighbouring college. For there two Fellows had wrangled so fiercely over the bone of contention supplied by the politics of the day, that the one had been tempted to waylay the other on his way to his room with a stout staff hidden in the gown of the waylayer, and to break his learned brother's crown before the proctors and the college servants could part the combatants. And if Kitty and her brother did introduce colonies of kittens and rabbits within the time-honoured precincts, the animals were not lion's cubs or bear's whelps that their growling and snarling should distract students from their studies.

Thus it came about that little Kitty Dacre grew up in Oriel, a famous college devoted to the needs of men, not that she was by any means grown up in 1636. She was only a small girl of ten years when Mrs. Judy called her with unusual imperativeness one fine August morning.

"Wake up, Mistress Kitty! Rouse, little mistress. There do be great doings this day in Oxford town; a raree show is nought to them. A whole king and queen are on their way, and you still lying a-bed as I left you in your first sleep like any John o' Dreams. Have you clean forgot that you are to be dressed betimes and taken to my Lady Ottery's to see the procession? Thy worthy father is to walk in it with the other doctors, and Master Jackie is to walk with the other scholars. Lady Ottery's windows are the best in Oxford for seeing sights, and thy godmother will take care you have a stool in a good corner. Sure you are in luck, Mistress Kitty, and should be as thankful as thankful can be."

Mrs. Judy was always telling Kitty she was in luck and ought to be thankful, which, as it was clear the speaker meant what she said, and did her best to make the words facts, was probably the reason why Kitty manifested early in life that contented, grateful temper which is at once the greatest boon to its possessor, and one of the most certain means of winning and retaining the affection of kindred and neighbours. Withal there was a sturdy honesty about Kitty which even in a child inspired respect as well as affection.

Mrs. Judy was a little elderly woman, somewhat wizened and wrinkled, but with very much the cheer of a winter apple in the roundness of her withered cheeks, and the streaks of wholesome red which they still bore. Her eyes were almost as bright as when she had been a rosy, clever lass in her degree, more than a quarter of a century before, and her mouth, though fallen in from lack of teeth, was still firm-lipped, with sagacious, humorous lines, full of character and kindliness.

She had a great respect for Dr. Peter Dacre, whom she had served for a score of years, together with a great pride in John and Kitty Dacre, her nurslings, and a great affection for them.

The affection was none the less that as their father's trusted housekeeper and one of their oldest friends who had taken them from their dying mother's arms, she had exercised no small measure of authority over them, and would still take it upon her to scold Master Jackie roundly, though he was on the road to be a scholar like his master, for tearing his small scholar's gown and losing his bands. In a similar manner she would chide Kitty for not attending to her darning sampler, or to the lessons in embroidery her godmother was beginning to give her, or to her reading and writing. Yet in good truth Mrs. Judy's own darning, while punctually and tidily performed, bore no relation to the fine art of the sampler. She knew no more of embroidery than the man in the moon knew; and as for reading and writing, they were not in her line, since she had never learnt her letters and reckoned up her accounts by the rule of thumb. But she only prized all gentlewomen's accomplishments the more on that account, she said.

Mrs. Judy's dress was such as became the responsible housekeeper of a university doctor. It was of sober, substantial woollen stuff, relieved by spotless white linen sleeves and an equally spotless cambric hood, except when she went abroad. Then the cambric cap was replaced by a more voluminous hood in dark silk, matching the long cloth mantle, not unlike the cloaks which Flemish market women wear to this day.

Kitty was clad like any gentleman's daughter, as both Mrs. Judy and Dame Tabitha took care she should be. In modern eyes it would have seemed a dress over-rich even for a great occasion, as well as quaint for a girl of her age. Her small gown was a reversion of a stiff flowered brocade which had been her mother's. Her thin white sleeves were puffed from the tiny wrists to the shoulders. She wore a lace ruff sewn with seed pearls round her slender throat. Above her little round lace cap she had a velvet cap trimmed with gold lace, and there were gold buckles in her Spanish leather shoes.

Kitty was a sunny-haired, white-skinned, pink-cheeked, blue-eyed English girl. She became her dress as she would have become something much simpler and better calculated for her to move in with freedom. But she was not thinking at all of her dress to-day; she was full of the great gala in which she was to bear a part. "And shall I see the king and queen—a real live king and queen, and not just their effigies, with my own eyes, Mistress Judy? Yes, I know it is very good of Lady Ottery to have me, and I'll try to remember to hold up my head and curtsy down to the ground to do her and you credit. But I'm frightened I'll miss the king and queen in seeking to see them over grown-up people's heads," said the child, wistfully.

"Still, it is a great thing to have the chance," Mrs. Judy reminded her charge, promptly. "What would not some young mistresses give for it? Only do not be uplifted by thy great good fortune, Mistress Kitty; just you make the most of it fairly and modestly."

"And their gracious majesties will see me," went on Kitty, in happy excitement; "and may give me a nod, if that be not too great condescension. They have a little girl—two little girls of their own, my godmother says—don't you know, Mistress Judy?"

Mrs. Judy had trouble in stilling Kitty's tongue so as to get her to swallow her bread and milk breakfast in the oak-furnished, book-lined room, lit up by a copy, in small, of the great oriel window which was one of the distinctions of the college, from which, according to some authorities, it had its name. Dr. Dacre and his young son were already dressed and abroad on this great day, when Mrs. Judy had found so many calls on her attention that she had been fain to let Kitty sleep beyond her usual hour, in order not to have a little girl also on the elderly woman's hands.

Mrs. Judy was to conduct Kitty to her godmother's—no easy matter, though the distance was not great, when the streets were a-flutter with flags flying from every tower and pinnacle of vantage, and gay with an abundance of green boughs from the surrounding woods, and with such flowers as August had left—late tiger lilies and roses, purple and white phloxes, asters and marigolds, relieved not inaptly against sheaves of ripe corn, and mingled with clusters of pale green nuts and branches laden with russet pears and tawny plums.

The very pavement was alive—no longer with mere town and gown—citizens in grey or brown, and schoolmen in black, but with crowds from far and near. There were country gentry hurrying to take their places in the windows and on the stands hired for their accommodation. Men and women who had been journeying from break of day or through the early autumn night from Abingdon, Aylesbury, Reading, etc. Labouring men and women and bargemen from the river, who would be well enough pleased to stand and gape and stare, tightly packed in a wedged-together mass extending from the colleges and houses as far into the middle of the street as the city authorities would permit.

At Lady Ottery's there was already such a gathering of the upper ten of Oxford as gave some warrant for Kitty's fear whether she would ever see through them, or past them, or over them, when the moment came for gazing with all her heart in her eyes at the wonderful spectacle she was brought there to profit by.

But Lady Ottery, like Mrs. Judy, was fond of Kitty, the only child with whom she had ever had much to do since the dame was herself a child. She took care that not only the stool which had been counted upon was provided, but that it should be placed at her elbow, so that no other member of her party could come forward and extinguish the maid.

"You keep by me, little woman," she said, in a voice which was a little hoarse, and almost as deep as a man's, but which always sounded sweet to Kitty. "I'll warrant you'll like to tell when you have children of your own, if you live to see the day, which I hope and pray you may, little Kitty, how when you yourself were a child, you saw their gracious majesties King Charles and Queen Mary* enter Oxford in state and splendour, to do honour to their ancient University, of which your good father is a member, and its chancellor, their trusty servant, my Lord the Archbishop."

Dame Tabitha Ottery was an aquiline-featured, gaunt woman, about the age of Mrs. Judy; she had seen troubles in her day. Her late husband, Sir Jasper, and more than one of her kindred, had been entangled in one of the plots which disturbed the close of King James's reign, and though the victims had escaped with their lives, banishment, fines, and confiscations had wrought such havoc with Sir Jasper's property that had not Dame Tabitha been a woman of rare energy and prudence, the entire ruin of the family must have followed. Like many unfortunate ladies in that and the next reign, she was called upon to play the man's part in managing what remained of the Ottery estates, in travelling to and fro—no light undertaking in these days—between her husband in exile and the authorities at home, to wring from them for her own maintenance such supplies as would also support Sir Jasper. After his death it had been at once her duty and pleasure so to nurse what was restored to her of the old noble inheritance, as to have the prospect of leaving it unimpaired to the next heir—with whom, though they had not a drop of blood in common, she was on excellent terms. Her self-imposed task did not hinder her from being liberal and generous in all her dealings with her household and neighbours. It was only in what concerned herself personally that she had learnt to practise a rigorous economy.

In the process of managing the estate in whose great house she did not choose to dwell, being able to lodge with more comfort and less expense in Oxford, near which her lands lay, she had become a positive adept in the drawing out of leases, "the setting of lands and ordering of stewards," until she was resorted to for her opinion and advice in all matters connected with a squire's obligations and with farming generally. In the course of her busy and burdened life and her many engagements, she had necessarily left behind her many feminine arts and graces, so that when she rooted out her old embroidery frame for little Kitty Dacre's benefit, my lady was heard to say with a curious blending of regret and disdain—

"Child, I have neither had the time nor the heart to work at such a piece of frippery, not since I came a young bride to the old manor house at Hayston."

A certain masculine indifference and bluntness clung to her, while she was

* Henrietta Maria was called "Queen Mary" by her husband's desire. The christian name "Henrietta" had not been heard in England before her reign, and when she began to be prayed for in the parish churches as "Queen Henry," there seemed some reason for the change. At the same time King Charles was warned in vain that the miserable associations with the beautiful name "Mary," when borne by a queen, would render it unpopular in that light both in England and Scotland.

thoroughly kind-hearted and held in general esteem. Men like Dr. Peter Dacre, who had become more than half recluses among their books, and felt shy and awkward, like owls in the sunshine in the society of fine, gay young madams, when they shunned women's society in general, made an exception in favour of Lady Ottery. They could always talk to her and feel at ease with her, destitute though she was of womanly wiles, and they enjoyed listening to her experiences, which were like pages out of their own books, with a difference.

Among the observances which Dame Tabitha had left behind was keeping up with the fashion of the day. She always wore a plain version of a widow's weeds, which, at that date, in its black and white bore a resemblance to the dress of a religious order, the illusion being heightened by the mixture of austerity and authority in her strongly-marked face and tall, erect figure. Her garb might have become the abbess of one of the suppressed convents. Her close coif, or cap, was black, coming down in a sharp peak in the centre of her forehead, and falling back in the form of a veil on her shoulders. Her skirt, short bodice, and sleeves were black, in strong contrast to the square white habit-shirt, which rose to her chin, and the white cuffs turned up above her bony hands.

Her own practice did not prevent Lady Ottery from being very particular that her goddaughter should be in the appropriate trim of small maidens of her rank and years. In spite of the influx of company, Lady Ottery found time to turn Kitty round and to pronounce gruffly, "Right, Kitty. Your woman, Pettit, has seen to you." Dame Tabitha was on excellent terms with Mrs. Judy, a humble friend of many years' standing; but the lady always spoke of the housekeeper, whether before her face or behind her back, as "Pettit," or "Kitty's woman, Pettit."

ART AND HEART; OR, DECORATION FOR THE POOR.

By C. HARRISON TOWNSEND.

JOHN KYRLE.

PART III.

THE "Bouverie Ward" of the Westminster Hospital, although executed some years ago, furnishes an example of how we still think certain "Places of the Poor" should be decorated in the interests of those who are to see, enjoy, and we hope to benefit by, what our art can say to them. Our readers will remember that in our first article we professed to adopt—though not as a cast-iron rule, but rather as a lex non scripta—the principle that decoration intended for a sick ward should be of such a nature as to appeal to the emotions rather than to the imagination or the intellect. By this we meant that such subjects should be selected as would call into play the memory, for instance, of the happy days of a youth spent in the country, and should not make a call upon a mind weakened by illness for what, after all, is the intellectual exercise of tracing out an intricate pattern. Broadly put, the enjoyment derived from contemplating designs in which geometrical arrangement or conventionalism plays a principal part is one of the intellect; while such subjects as flower groups and figures when quite naturally treated give a pleasure arising from an appeal to the emotions.

In the same way it is advisable to arrange one's key of colour with as great a view as possible to brightness of effect. How depressing some colours are to gaze at, the long day through, when we are sick and low from illness, we all know. And there is little doubt in our minds that the process of recovery must, to some extent at least, be affected by the difference in the surroundings, according as these are sombre or gay.

Again, as regards principles to be kept in view in decorating sick wards, there is one that we have already alluded to, and one moreover that is pretty certain to be brought home to the would-be decorator by the medical authorities of any hospital. It is absolutely necessary that all panels, friezes, bands of ornament, or pictures should be executed on such material, and in such a medium, as to allow of their ready cleansing. Any suspended pictures should be easily accessible, and covered on the back with material also washable. A large number of small vases or examples of ornamental pottery is not a desirable thing. They are apt to collect dust. And absence of dust and dirt means the destruction of another lurking place of the bacillus, or the fever-germ.

This need of frequent and ample use of the wet sponge on our decorative work in the case of the Bouverie Ward moved us to make our first use on a large scale of a material which is above all things washable. The "Willesden Waterproof Paper Company" manufacture paper, cardboard, and various canvases, which are subjected to a chemical process, with the result of making them absolutely waterproof. So far is this the case that their paper may be actually boiled for an hour without in any way affecting it. It is made principally in tones of green, some of which, especially the more neutral ones, are extremely effective for use as a ready-prepared background. There are also shades of brown and reddish-brown.

There was another consideration which led to our adoption of this as our material. The ward we had to treat is forty feet long by twenty feet wide. This made a total of one hundred and twenty feet, or forty yards in length of wall space to be treated, if we determined on a continuous band of painted work—either frieze or dado. The cost of artist's canvas would have been immense. The Tectorium, which we mentioned in our last article, had not then come into existence, and we were relieved to find in Willesden paper a material that met our wants, and did not exceed our means. The price of 4-ply paper (which is about the thickness of an artist's mounting board) is 2d. per foot. Formed of this material, a frieze of pale olive-green ground, two feet six inches deep, runs round the walls. The work on it consists of flowers treated quite naturalistically and with very bold touch. Each side of the room is consecrated—as regards the selection of flowers—to one of the seasons; winter and spring occupying the ends or shorter lengths of the walls. There is no cornice to the room, so a deal moulding three inches deep finishes the top of the frieze, and acts in this capacity. The moulding at the bottom is five inches deep, also of deal. Economy was such a consideration that these were both selected from the pattern book of a machine-made moulding manufacturer, instead of being specially designed and made. They are stained dull black, with certain small parts picked out in Indian red. The walls below are distempered pale-green, and the dado painted. The various presses, cupboards, doors, etc., are also black, with the exception of their panels, which are of the same Willesden material as the frieze, and are treated with flower or fruit subjects. Thus the angle-door and its panelling, at the Spring end of the ward, have a long horizontal band of that season's early flowers—daffodils, primroses and narcissus; while four panels contain the spring blossoms—cherry, apple, willow and plum. Another cupboard has, as motif, lemons, grapes, oranges and plums. The mantelpiece as treated by us we show in our illustration. The over-mantel is made of mahogany, ebonised, and wax polished, the carved panel in the centre being the natural colour of the wood. The panelling on the mantel proper is American walnut, the figure-subjects being brown and yellow tiles. Each side of the room bears above the flower-frieze one of the following mottoes: "Bear with Evil, and expect Good," "The test of Nature's true Nobility is honest, able, fearless Industry," "He is not poor that hath Little, but he that desireth Much," "Well Doing makes well Being."

The little curtains, which are embroidered in red and yellow on linen, conceal behind them some of the nurse's sick-room appliances.

The Kyrle Society also presented the pictures hanging in this ward. They are some of the chromo-lithographs of the Arundel Society, and are all framed alike in black reeded frames. The two kind proprietresses of a shop where faience and art pottery are sold, allowed us to select what we liked as their present to our Society and the hospital. The cost of this decoration was between £80 and £90. It is a pleasing fact to record that the 120 feet of frieze painting was executed most cleverly by two ladies—one of them, alas, now no more. To these sisters the Society and the many places where they have worked owe very much.

The remarks at the beginning of our paper on the Society's use of non-conventional treatment for the kind of work we have been describing leads us to say a word or two as to the other conventional or semi-conventional treatment. In many places where the scheme adopted is a more severe and formal one, this must be considered obligatory. We experienced in our earlier days but little difficulty in enlisting the services of volunteer artists able to paint—and paint often very beautiful—groups of natural flowers. But the production of a pattern of a creeping-plant, such, for instance, as the convolvulus (with due attention to obtaining the necessary "repeat," and a form that can be easily transferred by means of stencilling or pouncing), is a matter requiring some instruction and technical knowledge. This teaching some of our workers were fortunate enough to receive from one of our volunteer designers, who gathered them together and explained to them the principles which underlie this form of decoration. Its advantage, of course, is that after the preparation of the design and the execution of a portion as a sample, the execution of it can be entrusted to those who would not feel willing or competent to undertake any more important or original work. Granted the possession of a correct eye, little technical knowledge in the use of pigments or the painter's brush is called for.

The scheme for the Kingsley Club was not a very elaborate one. The club premises consisted of a couple of rooms in the basement of a block of model dwellings in Whitechapel. The members of the club, youths and young men living in the district, and mostly employed there during the day, themselves selected the name of the large-hearted Canon of Westminster as the title of their club; and this suggested that the decoration of the institution should in some way be connected with its name-giver. The smoking-room (really the parlour of the workman's little flat) was a small room with a fireplace set anglewise in one of its corners. The intention was to treat this as an "ingle-nook," in a way suggested by the old-fashioned fireplaces one sees from time to time in old farmhouses and village inns. Seats of deal, painted peacock-green, were placed as shown on the little key plan in the illustration. But the principal decorative treatment was with regard to the panelled overmantel,* the central feature of which was a portrait of Canon Kingsley. The woodwork was of deal, painted to correspond with the seats we have mentioned, and the frieze below the top cornice of "Lincrusta Walton," the pattern slightly emphasised in a lighter tone. The quotation is, as our readers will know, from one of Kingsley's poems. Such a scheme as this, where there is much use made of woodwork in seats, panelling, etc., is likely of course to be more expensive than one where we rely altogether on painted work. This latter is generally on one of the inexpensive materials we have learnt to use, and the artist's labour is invariably given to us. But in the former case the carpenter and his "little bill" have to be reckoned with. The cost of the Kyrle Club scheme would be about five or six pounds.

* Though writing on this decorative work as a completed fact, we may say that circumstances have prevented the scheme from being as yet carried out. It has so far progressed, however, that the portrait referred to has been executed by a kind worker for the society.

Our remaining illustration gives a bay of the ceiling of the parish room of Holy Trinity, Westminster. The room is about thirty-five feet long, by seventeen feet wide, and is used for all meetings and objects connected with the parish. The names of the various guilds, societies, etc., thus using it are painted on the shields. The material forming the background of the decorations is the Tectorium already alluded to. The scheme of colouring is bright, employing the primary or secondary colours. The ground of the panels is pale greenish blue, diapered with stars of various colours, and the Tectorium decorations are pasted on the panels. The moulded ribs, cornices, etc., are picked out in colours. It is difficult to say what the cost of this scheme will be, as the work is as yet not completed, but it probably will not exceed seven or eight pounds.

HOW WORKING GIRLS LIVE IN LONDON.

By NANETTE MASON.

PART I.

THE happiness of London," says Dr. Johnson, "is not to be conceived but by those who have been in it."

This is one way of looking at it, and true enough so far as it goes. No one will deny that the great metropolis contains the best of almost everything that can make life pass pleasantly, and that those who are tired of its busy streets and countless objects of interest must be tired of existence.

But there is another side not to be ignored. To talk about happiness to many who live in London would be like talking about the comforts of some fine estate they owned away in the moon. To them the first city in the world is a place of hard work, little pay, and still less enjoyment. Victims of pitiless and incessant competition, they are struggling through life with small pleasure in the past and with but little hope for the future.

Now, in this battle for existence, in the fierceness of which there are of course degrees, women, though often heroic, seldom cut a victorious figure. The working girls of London form our present topic, and they, considered as a class and compared with other sections of the community, are remarkable for their difficulty in making both ends meet, for the strain on their health and energies, for their temptations, and for the risk they run of being drawn at last into the current that hurries along to ruin. To lead even a moderately happy and successful life as a working girl, and to get out of London even a small fraction of the enjoyment that Dr. Johnson suggests, one must have a great deal of common sense and a large stock of cheerful and contented philosophy.

The subject of working girls in London, or indeed anywhere, is one the importance and deep interest of which cannot be exaggerated, and the claims which it makes on attention have been more recognised of late years than ever before. Every thinking person is beginning to see that the more healthy lives young women lead, the better in the long run for society. The weakness of women in most things is proverbial, but their mighty influence both for good and evil no one questions who knows anything. It is folly, therefore, not to do what we can to place them in such circumstances that all, even the humblest, will be a blessing and not the reverse to those who come in contact with them.

This is putting it as a matter of interest, but the voice of duty is even more impressive. More champions are wanted every day for our industrious sisters, and those who desire to help in making this a happy world may be recommended to take the bettering of the condition of such girls as a subject to work upon. The mission, however, is not an easy one, and requires in a marked degree the possession of worldly wisdom as well as of sympathy.

Our intention in this and the following papers is to bring together a few facts connected with the life led by this busy class, and under the term working girls we mean to include all who have, at any employment whatever, skilled or unskilled, to earn their own living, whether they be girls in domestic service, girls in factories and workrooms, girls at desks and counters, or any others that can be named. We propose not to speak of the industries they follow, but of how they live during their intervals of leisure. Thus will be seen something of their home-life, their life in lodgings, their friends and acquaintances, their amusements, perils, privations and discomforts, the expenditure of their too scanty wages, and the institutions started for their benefit, or in which they have an interest. We shall try to be practical, and give such hints as may prove useful to girls launched on the sea of life, with no friends to guide them and no knowledge to speak of, of their own.

It is difficult to estimate the number of girls employed in the various industries of London, and to say what fraction they are of the five millions that people the great city. A writer of experience calculates that there are a hundred and fifty thousand factory girls at work every day engaged in making almost everything, from a beautifully bound book to a halfpenny box of matches. With that figure as a basis, readers of a speculative turn may hazard a guess at the total number.

A large proportion of these are not London born, but have far-away towns and villages for their native place. They have come to London, drawn sometimes by tempting promises, but more frequently by a too vivid imagination. They have heard that others have got on; why should not they? They have read of there being countless workers; why should not room be found for them? So they come to be hired to the market-place of the world, and often find, alas, that the great metropolis, whose streets from the distance seemed paved with gold, is little better than a monster with cruel appetite waiting to devour them. So far as getting on is concerned, many a country girl would be wise—and find it cheap and healthy besides—who preferred to a London lodging a cave or a hole in a tree with a bed of dry leaves, and a dinner of nuts and herbs.

The working period with many girls is no doubt only a time of transition between their leaving school and entering on married life. They engage in work only till they can find a young man eager to provide for their support. This, it has been often pointed out, is against their throwing themselves zealously into industry of any kind, and what is pursued in a half-hearted way can never end in anything approaching success.

Now, if there is one maxim of prudence that should in these days be impressed on the minds of working girls more than another, it is this, that they should pursue their calling, and guide their lives as if it were written in the book of fate that they were to die old maids. This maxim is weighty enough to act as ballast to steady even the most volatile.

The stern fact is to be considered that there are considerably more spinsters in the world than bachelors. There are more boys certainly born than girls, but the girls have the best chance of surviving. In London for every thousand men there are one thousand and one hundred and twenty-three women. This is higher than the average for the whole country, which is only one thousand and fifty-five women to a thousand of the other sex. The extra number in London is no doubt largely due to the influx of working girls who flock there hoping to find employment.

If we leave out of account all under fifteen years of age, the total number of unmarried women in the metropolis was 545,653 in 1881, when the last census was taken; the total number of unmarried men was 462,550. If, therefore, some fine day every bachelor were to haste to get married, there would be a balance left over of 83,103 unmarried women.

It has also to be remembered that the marriage rate has been steadily falling for many years. In 1864 to 1868 it was 17.0 to every 1,000 of the population in England and Wales; in 1884 it was 15.1; in 1885, 14.4; in 1885 and '87, 14.1; and in 1888, 13.1. This last was the lowest marriage rate since civil registration began.

But whatever her future may be, the working girl who throws her heart into her work, and does her duty by her employer, has the satisfaction of knowing that she is thereby qualifying herself for being a business-like young woman, and doing her duty by a husband, if ever she gets one. He on his part will have the unspeakable blessing of securing a wife who can really do something. That something may be very different from domestic work, but she who can do something can learn to do anything if only she sets her mind to it. For a man with a limited income a working girl is likely to be a better helpmate than a superior creature who has never had the least need for exertion. She has had experience of the difficulty of getting money and keeping it, whereas for all the other knows money may be fruit that grows on a tree and falls into people's mouths.

The girl who by steady industry makes a living for herself need be in no haste to change her condition, and this independence is one of the pleasant features of a working girl's life. She looks on a lover in a much more sagacious way than one who dawdles away time in an aimless existence at home, ready to fall a prey to all kinds of sentimental nonsense.

Besides being independent, the life of the industrious is dignified. We may lower ourselves by many ways, but not by work. Indeed, she who goes out into the world to assert by industry her right to live, may hold up her head with the best, even though she be meanly clad and go to sleep under a humble roof.

But if working girls have some things to congratulate themselves upon, there are others, and not a few either, which tend to take the conceit out of us. The world, however, is advancing, and there is a time surely coming when the condition of many of the working classes will no longer be a reproach to Christianity and civilisation. That will be when capital and labour give each other fair play, and the reign of kindly feeling and common sense is universal.

A difficulty not to be lost sight of lies in the character of girls themselves. Their love of freedom and impatience of restraint has its weak side. Liberty is all very well when accompanied by knowledge of the world, but till that knowledge is acquired young folks are the better of having someone to whom they are responsible for their actions.

Working girls who live at home or with their employers, and are under the watchful eye of parents and guardians, and with the natural companionship of their relations, have much to be thankful for. It is a great pity of those who, without experience, have to shift in all things for themselves and be their own schoolmistresses in lessons of duty and prudence. Life and example have a powerful influence, and, so long as old heads are rarities on young shoulders, an independent girl in lodgings with no model to copy but herself will be encompassed by dangers from which every well-wisher would desire her to be free.

The worst of it is that girls who have next to nothing to brag about often indulge in the pleasing habit of magnifying to themselves their little scraps of knowledge and diminutive excellences. All who do that need hardly be surprised if they fall into the hands of those who trade on their levity and ignorance.

Another great obstacle in the way of working girls is the miserable wages that as a rule they earn. No wonder that many of them look as if they never had a luxury in their lives. The average weekly earning of girls engaged in labour of all kinds cannot be more, it has been estimated, than ten shillings.

As an example of what some of the poorest of them have to slave for, take the evidence of two young women, members of a deputation received during the winter of 1887 by the Home Secretary and Mr. Ritchie, President of the Local Government Board. These stated that they received sixpence for making a waistcoat, which they produced, but out of that sixpence they had to find silk, cotton, thread, and fire to press with. By working very hard all day the two girls could do four of these waistcoats, and that meant two shillings a day, out of which they had to find all these things.

No doubt such starvation wages are only paid for work which is the refuge of the destitute and incompetent, but even in the other extreme and amongst what may be termed the aristocracy of working girls, the earnings are such that one is often tempted to ask, how can they live, much less lay by something against a rainy day?

If low wages are a drawback, long hours of labour are about as bad. These are generally injurious and often ruinous to health, not to speak of their being fatal to all chances of self-improvement, or to the enjoyment either of fresh air or family and friendly intercourse. In the case of shop and warehouse girls a step in the right direction was taken recently by the passing of an Act of Parliament, which gives the more youthful of them a somewhat easier time of it. By this Act any shopkeeper who employs in his shops or warehouses any person under eighteen years of age for a longer period than twelve hours a day, or longer altogether than seventy-four hours a week, may be summoned by the assistant or, indeed, anyone, before a magistrate, and if convicted may be fined. Under the Factory and Workshop Act, a woman's working day is ten hours and a half, but as wages are reckoned on a twelve hours' day, a working girl must, somehow or other, make up the deficiency in order to obtain the full wage.

From the ranks of working girls some noble women have sprung. To give only one instance, there was Sarah Martin, whose name as a philanthropist will ever be held in honour. When she entered on her prison labours and constituted herself chaplain and schoolmistress to the criminals who filled the gaol of Yarmouth, she was an assistant dressmaker, earning a shilling a day.

A London working girl who rose to a high position was "Nan Clarges," the daughter of a farrier who had his forge on the north side of the Strand. Nan had the good fortune to become sempstress to General Monk, and used to carry him his linen when, in 1647, he was a prisoner in the Tower. Monk married her in 1652, and on his being raised to a dukedom she became Duchess of Albemarle. Her father, the farrier, when that happened is said to have raised a maypole in the Strand, nearly opposite his forge, to commemorate his daughter's surprising elevation in the world.

A story worth repeating is told about another working girl of London who had good fortune almost within her grasp and yet missed it. She was servant to Thomas Guy, the founder of Guy's Hospital, and her name was Sally. Sally was of such frugal habits, and had so studied the wishes of her master, that Guy, who was a thrifty bachelor, promised to make her his wife.

Everything was got ready for the wedding, and amongst other preparations several repairs were ordered in and about the house. These included the laying down of a new pavement opposite the street door. It so happened that Sally observed a portion of the pavement, beyond the boundary of her master's house, which appeared to her to need mending, and of her own accord and whilst Guy was absent she gave orders to the workmen to have this job accomplished. The men objected, on the ground that her master had said nothing about it.

"Tell him I bade you," said she, "and he will not be angry."

She was mistaken. When Guy came home he noticed what had been done, and on asking the reason was told it was "by orders of the missus."

Guy thereupon called the foolish Sally and quietly said, "If you take upon yourself to order things contrary to my instructions before we are married, what will you not do after? About the wedding I have changed my mind."

These were not days of breach of promise cases, or Sally would have been able ever after to live handsomely on her damages. She lost a rich husband, and London gained the noble hospital which her master afterwards built and endowed at a cost of nearly two hundred and forty thousand pounds.

BLUE AND GOLD.

A STORY OF THE SEA.

BY GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

CHAPTER I.

ON BOARD THE ESMERALDA.

NOT much of a craft to look at, in a sailor's estimation at all events. Made to steam or to sail; to laze along the shores of the blue Levant; to creep up and down creeks and rivers; to hug shores where, half hidden among the glorious woods, Castle Indolence itself might well have been built; to glide past dreamy wee towns, where the people seemed to have nothing to do but strike quaint attitudes and look picturesque, apparently as quietly happy and contented as the sea-birds that floated on the waves; or to cast anchor at eventide—as the waters reflected the tints of sunset clouds—near to forts whose guns looked far too big for them, and whose soldiers looked too small for the guns—forts, however, that could not have been well spared out of this picture. To cast anchor oftentimes in company with other vessels more lazy-looking than even this; vessels manned by brown, swarthy blue-capped sailors, who at times were too indolent to furl their topsails or top-gallant sails, preferring to lounge around the bulwarks and smoke; vessels that possibly were bound for somewhere, sometime, next day, or next month, or a hundred years hence—there was nothing to indicate the "when," nor did it seem to matter.

Not much of a craft to look at was the Esmeralda; "the saucy Esmeralda," as Captain Fairbairn, her bold and handsome young commander, called her by way of a joke; yet there was comfort in every foot of her, from bowsprit to binnacle. There was luxury there as well, of a semi-oriental sort, that accorded perfectly with the climate and the weather.

The yacht belonged to Jack Fairbairn, and Jack was a thorough sailor. It is very unlikely, therefore, that he would have tolerated cushioned seats and cushions on his quarter-deck, had it not been for one thing: Jack was not altogether a free agent—Jack was married. He had not been in bonds for a great while, but little over six months indeed. I believe I am wrong in saying "in bonds." However, the bonds were silken ones, for his had been a love match—

"Two souls with but a single thought,

"Two hearts that beat as one."

That reads very romantic and pretty, but—had Jack been single, he would have drawn the line at cushions on the quarter-deck of this yacht of his.

Captain Fairbairn had been what is called "a smart officer" in the Royal Navy, a stickler for duty, one who would have things done his way—his own way, and no way else. He liked to walk the deck of a forenoon and see everything "ship-shape," as it is termed, not even the end of a rope left uncoiled, everything aloft taut and trim, everything on deck the acme of order and pink of regularity, the decks as white as ivory, the polished woodwork as sheeny as a mahogany work-box, the brass like burnished gold, while the men themselves must look as wholesome and healthy as mountain daisies, with hats worn with just the proper rake, and collars not one inch out of place. Although he had held the rank of commander in the service—captain by courtesy—this officer was not much over thirty.

It had been said by everyone, both ashore and afloat, that Jack Fairbairn had a splendid career before him, and that there was every chance of his becoming an admiral before he was five-and-forty. For he had done many smart things in his time, and proved over and over again that he had a head on his shoulders that could lead men, as well as hands to use sword and revolver, and that, moreover, he was quite as much at home on terra firma as on a battle-deck. Nor was he ever known to look far ahead, or hanker after or long for promotion. His plan was to do whatever he had to do in the present, to do it well and heartily, and leave his fate as well as his future to a Higher Power.

But we never do know and hardly can we guess what is in store for us in this world, and at the very time that Jack's service prospects were of the brightest, something occurred that altered the whole tenour of his life.

He met with an accident.

If I have succeeded in interesting you already in Jack Fairbairn, you will, I am sure, be quite prepared to pity him. But the pity may be reserved, for Jack's accident was not caused by firearms, nor by the bursting of a boiler, neither did he fall overboard, nor out of the maintop, but he fell in love, and this was equally as serious a matter.

Jack did not hesitate to tell his messmates of his accident soon after it had occurred. He told them at dinner one day, and many of them shook their heads and sighed and said, "Heigho!" and "Oh, dear!" "Another good man gone wrong," "Another promising young officer lost to the service," and so on and so forth.

But Jack only smiled, and said no more just then; but that same evening, when sitting in the screen-berth smoking-room, enjoying a cigar, as men will, in company with his friend, Lawrence Perry, the latter was bold enough to refer to the subj. et.

They had both been silent for some time, listening to the band perhaps; but it is evident enough that the thoughts of each were running in the same groove, for when Lieutenant Perry said quietly—

"And is it really true, Fairbairn —"

Fairbairn quickly replied—

"Yes, Perry, it is just as true as you are sitting on that gun."

"And is she —"

"Is she beautiful, rich, and well connected, you were going to say, weren't you?"

"Something that way."

"Well, Perry, she is all three. Though for the matter of that I do not value riches in the least."

"But tell me a little more about her, Jack."

It was not very often that Lawrence Perry called his friend "Jack." In the wardroom as on the quarter-deck etiquette and discipline were strictly respected, and Jack was addressed with the affix "sir," but in the smoking-room he was Fairbairn, or Jack—the latter when Perry solicited confidence as he did now.

"You know General O'More, don't you, Perry?"

"By sight, yes. A retired man, but still takes the field at the head of Volunteer brigades. Never spoke to him. Is it a daughter of his?"

"That is he. Undoubtedly one of the most distinguished-looking men I have ever seen, either on horseback or afoot. But his daughter Kathleen—oh, Lawrence, I—a—but, there! you shall see her yourself, first opportunity."

"Kathleen O'More! What a sweetly pretty name! It could only belong to a sweetly pretty girl. Let me see, there is a song about a Kathleen O'More, a song with a churchyard and a cockrobin in it."

And Lawrence began singing—

"The bird of all birds that my soul loves the best,
Is the robin that builds in the churchyard his nest,
For he seems to watch Kathleen;
Hops lightly o'er Kathleen. My Kathleen O'More."

"Hush, hush, Perry. Don't give us that doleful ditty, please. You've no idea how superstitious I am."

"Well, then, Jack, heave round with your story. Where did you meet Miss O'More? What were you doing? What was she doing? Who introduced you? What—?"

"Here," cried Jack, "do light another cigar, and listen."

"I was going to the country to spend my six weeks' spell of leave, you must know; in fact, I was about to take my ticket to Perth, when some awkward fellow tramped on my toes. I turned round smartly to knock him down, and found, just in time, that it was an old friend of mine, Nugent, a marine officer, with whom I had been shipmate in the Thunderer. No end of a good fellow is Nugent."

"Hullo, Nugent!" I said.

"What, Fairbairn!" Then we shook hands.

"Where away?" he asked.

"To Perth, to do nothing."

"And I'm going up the Thames to do the same thing. I've hired a house-boat. Come with me."

"As it did not matter much which way I went, I readily assented, and in a fortnight more we found ourselves up Great Marlow way. It was on the hotel lawn there we fell in with the O'Mores. My introduction was a strange one. Mrs. O'More's fat old Blenheim spaniel tumbled into the river, and being unable to swim—for you know it is a mistake to suppose all dogs can swim—was being rapidly borne onwards to destruction. Such screaming I never heard. 'Oh, my faithful Tootles! Will no one save him?'

"I daresay I did what any other man would have done, kicked off my shoes, threw off my coat and cap, and plunged in. I caught Tootles just as he was being washed over the weir, and carried him out in triumph."

"No more gallant action, the General's wife assured me, had ever been performed, and it was a shame there was no chance of my receiving the Albert medal. Well, Perry, there it was, you see, the ice was broken, and our two house-boats—the O'Mores' and Nugent's—kept together all the cruise; the O'Mores dined on board of us one night, and we with them the next. But I cannot describe the beauty and the fascinating, winning ways of Kathleen. And her sister, too, is charming."

"Oh, she has a sister, then?"

"Yes; a sister called Aileen."

"And I suppose that marine fell in love with her?"

"He did."

"Bother the fellow!"

"Why, Lawrence? You amuse me."

"I don't know why. It would have been so funny, you see, your marrying one sister and I the other."

"Never mind, Perry; I know Nugent would give three fingers off his right hand to win Aileen O'More, but Aileen told me that, like her sister, she preferred blue and gold to scarlet.* But I'll never forget that delightful cruise up the Thames; the moonlight rambles on the banks; the days we spent among the wild flowers, and the hours we passed on the deck in the calm twilight. Yes, Perry, neither father nor mother made any objection to my suit, and in a month's time I—er—I'll be a happy man, Perry."

"Have you really applied to be put on the retired list?"

"I have. My health seems ebbing away—and—"

But Perry laughed so loud that Jack could not get another word in.

Perry's opportunity of being introduced to the O'Mores came round soon, for a ball was given on board the flagship. As usual, it was held in a large marquee erected on the broad-beamed upper deck. The tent was beautifully decorated with flags and flowers, lamps, and stars of cutlasses and bayonets, while the band discoursed the most dreamy of waltzes. "None but the brave deserve the fair," says the poem. Well, here were both the brave and the fair, and it would have been difficult, perhaps, to have said which looked the better—the sailor officers in blue and gold, or those of the garrison in scarlet. My own opinion is that the sailors won the laurel wreath, but then I am myself a sailor, and may be prejudiced.

That night, or morning rather, when the guests had all gone, Jack went into his friend's cabin, and they leaned out of the port together to—I ought to whisper this, because though Royalty itself has done the same thing, it is against the rules of the ship—to smoke one little cigarette—well, perhaps two.

"What did you think of her, Perry?"

"Oh, she is charming! I'm in love with her myself, Jack, and I'll propose to her too, in spite of anyone."

"What!" cried Jack, "you'll propose to my Kathleen?"

"Who is talking about your Kathleen? There, don't be foolish, Jack, you've dropped your cigarette into the sea. I'm in love with Aileen. But bother Nugent, anyhow. I did not get within hail of her half a dozen times during the whole evening."

"Well, I saw you dancing with Aileen several times, didn't I?"

"Yes, oh, yes. Fact is, that red marine fellow, clever and all though he be, isn't the perpetual motion; he couldn't keep on for ever, and so once or twice I did have a chance."

"Well, and was your conversation very interesting?"

"N—no! I'm really afraid the soldier had the advantage over me in that particular. He has the gift of the gab, as it is called. I coached myself well too, for nearly an hour before I went to claim my dance. I went away out on the open deck, and walked about with my cap in my hand. One thinks so much better, you know, when one's head is cool."

"Yes, certainly."

"Well, I thought out a thousand different subjects for conversation, and a thousand pretty things to say to Miss Aileen, that I felt sure would interest and amuse her."

"To be sure: and did you say them?"

"Alas! no, Jack. They all seemed to dry up, and my remarks were the merest commonplace. It made me bite my lip to think of my inanity. Then I thought as silence was golden, it was better to hold my peace and—a—I did."

"Poor Perry!" said Jack, laughing.

"Jack, tell me this, candidly you know. You saw me dancing, did—a—did I look like a fool?"

"Well, 'pon my word, Perry, you didn't look very far off."

"And do you think that—that Miss Aileen noticed that—that I looked like a fool?"

"Oh, I should think she was sure to; Aileen is very clever, and has a very high and acute sense of the ridiculous."

Perry smoked viciously for a few minutes in silence, then he threw his cigarette angrily into the sea.

"I must say, Jack," he then remarked, dryly, "you don't mince matters."

"No; but you asked me to talk candidly. Good-night. Pleasant dreams to you, Perry."

At breakfast and luncheon next day there was nothing talked about except the ball. Nugent came off in the evening to dine with Jack, and even Perry had to be pleasant to him, though there were times when he looked as if he would much prefer to eat him.

Now, viewing the matter from a psychological point of view, I must say that I do not think Perry was really in love with Aileen. This "love at first sight" is a very rare thing indeed, and my opinion is that had there been no Nugent, Lieutenant Perry's equanimity would never have been disturbed by the presence of Aileen O'More, beautiful and accomplished though she was.

Perry perhaps held himself in far too little estimation, for though not so noble-looking in appearance as Jack, he really need not have scowled at himself in the looking-glass, nor called himself a rough, red-faced sailor. He was a manly one at all events, and it was admitted by all who knew him that a better or kindlier heart than Perry possessed never beat beneath a coat of blue and gold.

Jack, owing to ill-health, so it was said, was graciously permitted to retire on his laurels and his half-pay, and in the course of a few months married the eldest daughter of General O'More.

Perry was at the marriage as "best man," and was chiefly struck by two things: first, the bewitching beauty of the bride's sister Aileen, and secondly, by the extraordinary solemnity of the ceremonies. In fact, the latter almost frightened him, and he caught himself telling himself that he did not believe ever he could summon up enough courage to go through such an ordeal. But for all that, Perry had been in several engagements, and his captain had more than once taken official notice of his remarkable coolness and presence of mind when under fire, or when leading a charge on shore, with sword in hand.

* Blue and gold being the uniform of the sailor officer; scarlet that of Royal Marine Light Infantry.

It must be admitted, therefore, that Perry's character was a difficult one to read, and presented not a few anomalies, psychologically considered.

It was after Jack's marriage that Lieutenant Perry managed to get six months' leave, and go cruising in the Levant with his friend and wife, Aileen being also of the party.

Well, I have no need to describe the personal appearance of either of the young ladies; my artist has saved me the trouble.

There they sit among the quarter-deck cushions of the saucy Esmeralda, as she lies at anchor in a Riviera bay, on a quiet still summer's evening, Kathleen looking learned and logical, and apparently feeling a sailor's wife all over, as she points to places of interest on the chart, and Aileen listening, with those dreamy eyes of hers, full of genuine admiration for her sister.

But my artist has not sketched Jack and his friend. They are not there. They are for ward, leaning over the bows, and I am very much afraid they are smoking again. But this is no fault of mine.

What a delightful cruise that was to be sure, from beginning to end! No, not quite to the end though, at least as far as Perry was concerned, and for the following reason.

One beautiful day at Malta, Jack and his wife, with Aileen and Perry, had gone on shore to do a little shopping, for jewellery is cheap in that town, filigree gold work being purchasable for little over the price by weight of the precious metal. They were all labouring up one of those long streets of stairs, of which Byron makes mention in one of his poems. I ought not, however, to say that Perry was labouring. Indeed, he never felt in better "form and fettle," as he chose to describe it; he was very happy and buoyant, and was thinking how very delightful those streets of stairs were, simply because they gave him an opportunity of doing a service to Aileen by helping her along.

So happy was Perry to-day, that, in the intervals of conversation, he could not refrain from humming over snatches of songs from operas or bars of music from favourite waltzes.

There was not a single cloud on the blue sky of Perry's life to-day, until—the party suddenly turned a corner.

"Hullo, Nugent! Why, my dear old boy, who ever would have expected to meet you here?"

That was Jack's greeting to his friend.

Mrs. Fairbairn's and Aileen's were also very cordial. But I cannot say so much for Perry's. The sunshine of his existence was suddenly eclipsed; there seemed no blue sky anywhere now.

"I suppose," said Perry, "your ship is here? You are stationed at Malta?"

Perry was hoping against hope.

"Not I," replied Nugent, cheerily; "I'm free as the wind for the next three months."

"Oh, in that case," said Mrs. Fairbairn, "we shall claim you. You shall be our guest in the yacht for the next three months."

"Don't say no, old man." This from Jack.

"Say, no!" replied Nugent, with just one glance towards Aileen. "That is the very last thing I should think of. In fact, if you had not invited me, the probability is I should have come as a stowaway, and you would have found me hiding behind a beef cask a day or two after you had been at sea."

Everyone laughed, even Perry. But there was no laughing at Perry's heart.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK SERVES POULTRY.

POULTRY nearly always has a place in a French dinner in some form or other, consequently the ways of cooking it are very various, and I think superior to ours. It seems to me that the recipes for dressing fowls are numberless; I will begin with a few of them.

Poulet Roti (roast fowl).—When trussing the fowl put into the body a large pinch of salt and a lump of butter; sew up the opening, fasten a slice of fat bacon over the breast of the fowl; roast it, basting it well; sprinkle with salt when done (not before), and serve with watercresses over which you have squeezed the juice of a lemon, and put the gravy made in roasting the fowl.

Another way.—Prepare as above, with the salt and butter inside, then rub the fowl well all over with a cut lemon, and envelope it in a buttered paper; roast and serve with tomatoes or mushrooms, or à la ravigote or financière.

Poulet à l'Estragon (fowl with tarragon).—Blanch some tarragon leaves; chop them. Chop the liver of the fowl, add a lump of butter and some chopped bacon; to these put a quarter of the tarragon, salt, pepper, and nutmeg; put this forcemeat into the body of the fowl, cover the breast with a slice of bacon fat, put buttered paper over and roast. Melt a piece of butter in a stewpan, add a little flour and the remainder of the chopped tarragon; moisten with broth, add a few drops of vinegar, two yolks of eggs, salt, and pepper; let the sauce thicken, but not boil, and serve with the fowl.

Chapon au Gros Sel.—Rub a capon all over with a cut lemon, then cover the breast with slices of bacon fat; put it in a stewpan with the gizzard and neck, a little bacon fat, some trimmings of veal, an onion, a carrot, sweet herbs, parsley, salt, and sufficient broth to nearly cover the capon; cook slowly; it will take from one hour to one hour and a quarter. When done take a small portion of the broth, skim and strain it, and boil until it is brown; add a tablespoonful of water, and with a wooden spoon stir the brown well from the bottom of the saucepan; skim and strain some more of the broth, and add it to that you have browned; serve the capon with the gravy and a little salt sprinkled over it.

Chapon au Ris (capon with rice).—Put the capon in a stewpan with some parsley and mushroom trimmings, then add stock enough to nearly cover it (the stock should be strained, but have the fat left on it), cook gently; when done keep the capon hot, strain and skim the broth, let it boil, and add one-third the quantity of rice that there is broth; boil twenty-five minutes, finish with a little butter, serve round the capon.

Or Fowl with Rice, thus:—If you have no stock, put a fowl in a stewpan with some bacon; cook it five minutes. Boil two carrots, two onions, a piece of celery, parsley and herbs, in a quart of water for half an hour; put in the fowl and bacon, let them simmer ten minutes (or longer if it is not young), then throw in half a pint of rice, and season with pepper and salt; cook until done, remove the vegetables and herbs, and serve the fowl on the rice. Fowls that are not young are boiled gently in the stock-pot until tender, and then served in various ways, as—

Poule au Pot-au-feu en Coquilles.—Cut some cooked fowl in dice, add a third of the quantity of cooked mushrooms and a little cooked ham or tongue. Put a small quantity of white sauce in a stewpan, cook it a few minutes, add one or two tablespoonfuls of raw cream, add the chicken mixture, season, and thicken with the yolk of an egg. Put into scallop-shells, cover with breadcrumbs and a little oiled butter, brown the tops, and serve.

Poule au Pot-au-feu Sauce Tomate.—When the fowl is tender, but not boiled to rags, take it out of the stock and remove the skin, cut it up and put it in a stewpan with a little broth; let it get hot. Cut two ounces of raw ham into small squares, put it into a frying-pan with a little oil or butter, stir it and cook two minutes; add two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, let it reduce to one, add a purée of tomatoes, a clove of garlic, a bay leaf, and the broth in which the chicken has been warmed; boil, add sufficient flour to thicken it, pour all into the stewpan over the fowl, simmer twenty minutes, take out the garlic and bay leaf, and serve the stew.

Poule au Pot-au-feu aux Fines Herbes.—Let the fowl get cold after cooking it in the stock-pot, then cut it up. Chop a large onion and three or four shallots, cook them in butter; add some chopped mushrooms, cook a minute, sift in a little flour, add a small glass of white wine and some broth, stir and boil for ten minutes; add a little pepper, put in the fowl, simmer a quarter of an hour, and serve.

Poulet à la Tartare (fowl and Tartar sauce).—Choose a young fowl, prepare it, then split it down the back, flatten it with the side of the chopper, put it in a marinade of oil, pepper, salt, lemon juice, chopped onion, and parsley; leave it an hour, then grill it and serve with tartar sauce. Some cooks, instead of putting the fowl in the marinade, put it in a stewpan with a little butter and bacon fat for about a quarter of an hour, over a slow fire, then breadcrumb it and fry or grill it.

Poulet au Blanc.—Put the liver, a lump of butter, and a large pinch of salt, in the body of the fowl, then truss it. Put some water in a stewpan, with a small bunch of herbs and parsley; when the water boils add a large tablespoonful of flour mixed with good butter; stir, then put in the fowl, add salt, simmer gently; when done put it on a dish, and keep it hot. Boil the liquor fast, reduce it until it is moderately thick, remove the herbs and parsley, add three yolks of eggs mixed with cream, and a little pounded white sugar; let it thicken, but do not let it boil again; take from the fire and finish with a little lemon juice. Garnish the fowl with stewed mushrooms, artichoke bottoms, and very small onions cooked in butter; pour the sauce over the whole, and serve.

Fricassée de Poulet.—Proceed in exactly the same way as for "Poulet au Blanc," the only difference being that the fowl is cut up, and the appearance of the fricassée is improved if the skin is removed from the pieces of fowl, and they are rubbed over with cut lemon before being cooked.

Fricassée de Poulet à la Minute.—After having cut a fowl up, put it in a stewpan with a lump of butter, salt, mushrooms, bunch of sweet herbs and parsley; stir it over the fire for five minutes, dredge a tablespoonful of flour in, stir; add sufficient broth with a glass of white wine to make sauce, and finish cooking. Before serving remove the herbs and parsley, and add a squeeze of lemon juice.

Fricassée à la Bourguignonne.—Put the fowl (after cutting it up) into a stewpan with two ounces of butter, put it over the fire for about eight minutes, turning the pieces in the butter as they cook; add salt, pepper, nutmeg, and some white wine to moisten it; keep it over a brisk fire. When the fowl is done arrange the pieces on a dish, slightly thicken the sauce, finish it with some lemon juice and finely-chopped parsley, pour over the fowl, and serve.

Marinade de Poulet.—Remove the skin, and cut up a fowl (uncooked or cooked), place the pieces in a marinade of oil, lemon juice, herbs and parsley, and leave them for an hour or two; then dip them in batter (see pâte à frire), and cook in a pan of boiling fat; serve with fried parsley.

Filets au Suprême.—Take the white meat from one or two fowls, remove the skin, and separate the meat into small fillets, sprinkle them with salt, and cook in a stewpan in butter, without letting them get in the least brown; when done, arrange on a dish with pieces of fried bread, placing the fillets and the bread alternately: or the fillets are sometimes larded before being cooked, and are served with mushroom sauce, or sauce tournée aux truffes.

Poulet à la Marengo.—Cut up a fowl, put first the legs, then the remainder of the pieces in a stewpan, with some oil and a little salt, sweet herbs, parsley, mushrooms, and truffes; cook all until a nice pale brown. When the fowl is done serve it and the mushrooms and truffes with Italian sauce; add some stoned olives that have been cooked in butter, and some pear-shaped pieces of fried bread (fried eggs are sometimes added). The fowl should be neatly heaped in the centre of the dish, the mushrooms, olives, and truffes arranged round it, and good Italian sauce poured over all; then the fried pieces of bread are placed upright all round the heap of chicken, between that and the mushrooms.

Poulet à la Sainte-Menehould is made with the remains of fricassée fowl that has had a well-thickened sauce. Put the cold sauce well over the pieces, cover them with fine breadcrumbs, dip in egg, then crumb them again; fry a nice pale brown, or strain a little oil and butter over them and bake in a quick oven; serve dry, or with a clear, rather piquante gravy.

Before leaving the subject of fowls I must call the attention of the reader to the difference in the English and French way of dividing the legs of a fowl for cooking. Instead of separating the drumstick from the thigh, proceed thus:—push the skin and sinews at the end of the drumstick up a little way, then chop the bone off as short as possible; next chop the thigh bone across just half an inch beyond the joint with the drumstick; it is quite easy to do this with an ordinary table knife struck on the back with a second knife; you then have two nicely shaped pieces of chicken of about equal size to dish up, and no ugly bony piece. The breasts are divided in two, across not lengthways.

TURKEYS.

Dinde Truffée (truffled turkey).—Take some truffles, peel them; if small leave them whole, if large cut each truffle in two or three pieces, put them in a stewpan with butter, pepper, salt, and a little nutmeg; make them moderately hot, and stuff the turkey with them; sew the skin up, wrap the turkey in buttered paper, and leave it in a cool place until the next day. Then roast it; if about eight pounds in weight for two hours, baste it well; remove the paper a short time before it is done, so as to allow it to brown, and sprinkle it with salt. Serve the turkey plain or with truffle sauce.

Turkeys are also stuffed with raw sausage-meat and truffes; also with chestnuts. For this the chestnuts must be roasted slowly, the shell and skin carefully removed, the chestnuts seasoned with pepper and salt, and then put in the turkey with a little butter.

Dinde Piquée, Rotie (turkey larded and roasted).—Lard the breast and legs of a turkey, and cover it with buttered paper; roast, basting well with butter; remove the paper a quarter of an hour before the turkey is done, and sprinkle with salt. Skim, and strain the contents of the dripping-pan, and send it to table in a tureen.

Dinde en Galantine (galantine of turkey).—A turkey that is not young enough to roast will still make a good galantine. Open the turkey down the back, take out all the bones, being very careful not to tear or damage the skin, which must be gently separated from the meat. Cut the breast into slices, put them aside, then take the meat of the legs and all the pickings from the bones of the body and pinions, without the sinews, chop finely with an equal quantity of veal cutlet and bacon fat, season with pepper, salt, and a little spice, and pound in a mortar; cut some fat bacon, veal cutlet, the slices of turkey and some ham or pickled tongue in strips, spread the skin of the turkey on a linen cloth, place on it a layer of the forcemeat, and arrange the strips of meat, bacon, etc., on it; also some truffes cut in pieces and some pistachio nuts, then the remainder of the forcemeat; roll up the galantine, sew the skin, then sew the linen cloth over it, tie the two ends with string, and tie strings round at intervals of two inches, so as to keep the galantine in shape. Braise the turkey with the bones pounded and a little white wine added to the usual ingredients. Do not remove the cloth until the galantine is cold; then glaze it slightly. Clear the liquor in which the turkey is cooked, and serve cold as jelly on and round the galantine.

Turkey (legs or wings) à la Sauce Robert.—Make cuts across the legs of cold turkey, pepper, salt, and broil them, then serve on a sauce Robert.

Abatis de Dinde à la Bourgeoise (turkey giblets à la bourgeoise).—Soak the giblets in tepid water, then wash them, changing the water several times; put them all except the liver in some warm butter in a stewpan, add herbs, parsley, bay leaf, two cloves, and a clove of garlic; stir them about over the fire for some minutes, then stir in a large tablespoonful of flour; when the flour is gold colour add some hot water or broth, and stew for two hours. Cook the liver separately in butter, and add it to the other giblets. Brown some small onions and some turnips cut into dice in butter with a little white sugar; add these when the giblets have stewed two hours; season with pepper and salt, and let all simmer until tender; then remove the herbs, parsley, cloves, bay leaf and garlic, skim the gravy (of which there should not be too much) and serve, placing the giblets in the middle of the dish and the vegetables round them. Should be sent to table very hot.

Emincé de Dinde au Riz.—Put in a stewpan one ounce of butter and a finely-chopped onion, turn it about over the fire, but do not let it brown; add half a pint of rice, shake for a second or two, then add a pint and a half of broth; cover, and boil for twelve minutes, then add two cloves and three-quarters of a pound of cold turkey, cut in pieces and without skin; season, put the lid on the stewpan, and cook until the rice is done, then remove the cloves, stir in a small piece of butter, and serve immediately.

Croquettes de Dinde au Pommes de Terre (croquettes of turkey with potatoes).—Chop half a pound of cold turkey, put it in a stewpan with pepper, salt, and three-quarters of a pound of potatoes that have been boiled, passed through a sieve, and had butter, salt, and a little sugar added to them; add five yolks and one white of egg, a pinch of nutmeg, and about a teacupful of grated Parmesan cheese; stir over the fire to mix well, then turn on to a floured board, form into small rolls or balls, dip them in egg and then breadcrumb them. Fry in plenty of boiling fat, and serve with parsley.

Marinade de Dindon, Dindon à la Sainte-Menehould, Fricassée de Dindon, etc., are all prepared in the same way as the same dishes of fowl, and most of the recipes for cooking turkey are equally applicable for fowls.

GEESE.

Roast Goose with Chestnuts.—Take fifty large chestnuts, roast them very slowly, then remove the shells and skins, put half of them aside, chop the remainder with the liver of the goose, add half a pound of sausage-meat, a small clove of garlic, a little parsley, pepper, salt and nutmeg; put this into the body of the goose, mixing the twenty-five whole chestnuts with it, sew up the opening, and roast the goose. When done a goose should remain a short time before a fierce fire, so that the grease may run from it, and the skin get crisp.

Chestnut forcemeat made as above is also used for stuffing turkeys.

Geese are sometimes simply filled with small potatoes and a bunch of savory and roasted. For this, one takes the smallest potatoes, and after they are peeled, a round vegetable cutter is run through each of them to take a piece out of the middle. Goose with potatoes roasts best in an oven.

Oie à la Chipolata (goose à la chipolata).—Take a goose that is not fat, cut it up, cook the pieces in a stewpan in some brown roux. Add some sausages cut in pieces, some mushrooms, roasted chestnuts (skinned), bunch of herbs, parsley, seasoning, and a little gravy. When the goose is done enough, remove the herbs and parsley, skim the gravy, add a little lemon juice or a few drops of vinegar, and serve.

Goose Giblets are cooked like turkeys'.

DUCKS.

Canard aux Navets (duck with turnips).—Brown in a stewpan a tablespoonful of flour in butter or poultry fat, put the duck in and turn it about for a minute or two to brown it slightly, then moisten with half white wine and half broth; add a bunch of sweet herbs, parsley, a small onion, salt, pepper, and nutmeg; cut some turnips and shape them into balls all of the same size (the size of a large marble), brown them in butter with a little white sugar; when the duck is rather more than half done, add the turnips, and cook all together. When tender, remove the herbs, parsley, and onion, skim the broth, and serve the duck with the turnips and the gravy round it. The duck should be cooked in a stewpan that it will just fit, otherwise it is necessary to put too much broth.

Canard aux Olives.—Cook the duck as above, but pass the gravy through a sieve; add some mushrooms cut in pieces, stone some olives by passing a knife round them, put them in the sauce, boil a minute, pour over the duck, and serve immediately.

Canard aux Choux (duck and cabbage).—Throw a cabbage in boiling water and cook it for a few minutes, then press it, to get the water from it as much as possible. Put the duck in a stewpan and brown it slightly with some slices of bacon fat and a slice of ham; leave the bacon and the ham at the bottom of the stewpan and place a layer of cabbage on it, then put in the duck and the remainder of the cabbage over and round it. Tie sweet herbs, parsley, and a clove in muslin and put them in; add pepper and salt, and put small sausages on the top of the cabbage; cover closely and cook gently until tender. (Time according to size of duck.)

Canard aux Petits Pois (duck and green peas).—Cook the duck as for "aux navets," but instead of the turnips have ready some peas in a little very cold water into which some butter has been worked; when the duck is half done pour off the gravy, put some slices of bacon at the bottom of the stewpan, then put in the peas with a branch of parsley, a scallion, some small white onions, a lump of sugar and a little salt; place the duck in the middle, cover, and let it finish cooking over a slow fire. When done serve with the vegetables round. The duck to be dressed in this way should be young.

Salmis de Canard.—Roast a young duck with four or five thin slices of bread under it; let it get cold, then cut it up; chop up the backbone and the trimmings. Cook a chopped onion in butter, pound the slices of roast bread, and add them with the chopped duck, two shallots, pepper, mace, and a bay leaf; moisten with a tumbler of red wine and the same quantity of broth. Let the sauce reduce to one-half, pass it through a sieve, put it back in the stewpan, and warm the pieces of duck in it without allowing it to boil. Put the stew on a dish, and serve with fried sippets round. A salmi is generally made with a duck or part of a duck that has been roasted for table. It answers quite as well to fry the slices of bread a nice brown in some of the fat from the ducks.

Canard au Riz (duck with rice).—Take the remains of a roast duck, cut it up, remove the backbone, put the pieces of duck in a stewpan, pour a little gravy and a little tomato sauce over them; stand the stewpan in the bain-marie, so as to heat the duck thoroughly without letting it boil. Chop an onion and put it in a stewpan with a little butter; when it is a good gold colour (not in the least burnt) add to it one pint of broth or water and one-third of a pint of rice; cook with the lid on the saucepan (if water is used a little salt must be added); when done the rice should be dry; add two or three tablespoonfuls of tomato sauce, a little cayenne pepper, and a little butter to it, stir, cover the stewpan for a few minutes, then serve quite hot, with the pieces of duck arranged on the top. Sometimes grated Parmesan is added to the rice with the tomato sauce.

Ducks are roasted with a lump of butter and pepper and salt in them, and the juice of a lemon is put in the dripping-pan. They are served with their own gravy, and watercresses with a little of the contents of the dripping-pan on them.

Canard aux Truffes.—The same proceeding as for turkey. Legs of ducks grilled are served on a purée of potatoes, or with a sauce piquante.

Duck with Sour-cROUT is prepared in the same way as with cabbage, but the sour-cROUT must be washed in several waters.

PIGEONS.

Pigeon Roti.—Put in the body of the pigeon a small lump of butter and a pinch of salt, truss it, put a vine leaf over the breast, and tie a slice of bacon fat over that; roast from twenty to twenty-five minutes, basting with butter mixed with a few drops of vinegar. Serve with gravy.

Pigeons en Compote.—Truss two pigeons and put a lump of butter in each. Set a stewpan over the fire, with an ounce of butter in it, cut some slices of bacon in dice, cook them a few minutes in the butter, then put in the pigeons; turn them about and cook for five minutes, add a little flour, stir it until it is gold colour; continue stirring while you add some broth, a little white wine, a small lump of sugar, bunch of herbs, parsley, bay leaf, some grated nutmeg, pepper and salt; cover the stewpan, and let the pigeons cook slowly. Brown a dozen and a half very small onions in butter with a pinch of white sugar; when the pigeons are half cooked add the onions, and ten minutes after add one dozen small uncooked mushrooms. Before serving remove the herbs, parsley and bay leaf; skim the gravy, and serve the pigeons with the garniture and fried bread round and the sauce poured over.

Paté Chaud de Pigeons à la Bourgeoise.—Cut two or three pigeons in quarters, put them in a stewpan with butter or good lard, and a teaspoonful of finely-chopped onion. Cook a few minutes over a brisk fire, adding half a pound of pickled pork cut in small pieces, and some salsify, half cooked and thinly sliced, season with pepper and salt; when the pigeons are stiff remove from the fire. Line a pie-dish with a thin crust of "pâte brisée," fill it with the pigeons, pork, and salsify, pour in one-third of a pint of cold, good-thickened gravy, cover with a moderately thick crust of the same paste; brush the outside over with egg, and bake for one hour in a moderately hot oven.

Pigeons en Matelote.—Put the pigeons in a stewpan with a lump of butter and some thin pieces of bacon, sift in a little flour, stir until it is a pale brown, then moisten with half broth and half red wine; add some mushrooms, small onions that have been browned in butter, a lump of sugar, and a bunch of sweet herbs, in which is tied a clove of garlic and some parsley. When the pigeons are tender, remove the bunch of herbs, skim the gravy, put each pigeon on a small oval piece of fried bread, pour the sauce over, and serve.

Pigeons Farcis (stuffed pigeons).—Chop a quarter of a pound of calf's or sheep's kidney, add the livers of the pigeons and three ounces of chopped bacon, a teacupful of breadcrumbs, a tablespoonful of finely chopped onions and the same of chopped parsley, salt, pepper, and two yolks of eggs; with this forcemeat stuff two pigeons; truss them, fasten a slice of bacon over each, and either roast them before a fire or in a stewpan, basting them well.

Pigeons à la Minute.—Cut the pigeons in halves, fry them in a stewpan in butter; when they are coloured and half done, add mushrooms, parsley, and shallots (all chopped), pepper and salt; when the pigeons are done enough put them on a dish and keep them hot. Pour a little broth into the stewpan, and with a wooden spoon stir the brown from the bottom of it; add a little white wine and a very small lump of sugar, boil the sauce up, and pour it over the pigeons.

The French braise any kind of poultry; it is done the same way as meat; or poultry may be larded; fowls, turkeys, and pigeons are all good larded; but it makes ducks and geese too rich for most people.

Some readers will remark how much wine is used in French cooking. It is the light wine (vin ordinaire) of the country, and used I think more because it is plentiful than for any other reason; with well-made stock it is not necessary. At the same time, as I am not "Adapting French recipes for English cooks," but writing "How the French cook," I do not omit the wine, but I exclude all recipes requiring brandy, and also those in which wine is essential. A few drops of lemon juice or white vinegar and water, or water alone, can generally be substituted for wine.

FOR THE KING'S SAKE.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

By LADY MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Bessie's Sacrifice."

CHAPTER VI.

ABOUT five o'clock on that self-same morning Sir Michael Newport rode slowly home. He had slept at the distant house of a neighbour, and had started thus early on his way home, anticipating a long day of important and anxious business.

It was very cold; the early chill of dawn made him shiver; the wind whistled and wailed through the trees; in the distance some watch-dog kept up a constant monotonous barking.

No one was abroad as he passed through the gates, trotted across the wide park, and drew rein at the door of his house. But suddenly, quietly, like a grey shadow in the twilight, the figure of a woman emerged from the clump of trees, and with a straight, slow movement, the gait of one walking in her sleep, passed before him up the steps to the hall door. He hastily dismounted, left his horse to find his own way to the stables, and followed. Did his eyes deceive him? A terrible suspicion was growing on him. Could it be his wife?

She was waiting for him within, in front of the cold ashes of the great stone hearth, waiting for him with a look on her white rigid face that thrilled him with a nameless fear.

He strode forward and seized her by the wrist; her very torpor seemed to force him into violence.

"Eleanor!" he cried. "Whatever does this mean? Speak, you would not drive me mad!"

He recoiled with an exclamation of horror, for all down her riding-dress, on the torn lace of her jabot, there were dark red stains.

"What is it?" he cried.

She looked at him for one moment as if she could not speak, then her voice came back, a strained, strange voice not like her own.

"It is blood," she said. "He is dead."

"Good heavens! You have been with him? Captain Bob?"

She nodded.

"And he is—?"

"My Robbie—he is dead."

"My poor wife! I dreaded this."

He bent over her with a great yearning tenderness, putting his arms round her, drawing her to his breast.

"How can I comfort you?" he said, with the sharpest pang he had ever known at his impotence to comfort such a grief as this.

She looked up at him, and he read in that desolate look something just now beyond the reach of the closest human sympathy.

"Nellie," he said. "Nellie, teach me how to help you."

Through the dead coldness of her pain penetrated the longing of his words; it swept across her with one wave of passionate feeling; he could comfort her, she could rest on him, nestle to this heart of his, this great love that would warm and shelter her.

But suddenly between that haven and her suffering rose up, pitiless and stern, the shadow of her oath—the oath that must keep them apart for ever.

With a low cry, for this pang became intolerable, she drew herself from his arms, she staggered back, raising clasped hands to heaven in wild appeal for help, and then he caught her as she fell heavily forwards in a swoon.

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER VII.

"The spirit that inspires man and breathes in nature was playing through my spirit upon the obedient vibrating strings."

—The Fiddler of Lugau.

UNDER the head of strings and bow a wide field of interesting matter opens to our view, the fringe only of which we shall be able to touch, for it reaches far away into the most wonderful problems of nature.

There is, however, quite enough within our reach for the carrying out of our purpose, which is to endow our violin with life and joy and mystery.

The violin whose construction we have been watching, reminds us in its present stage of nature in the winter—it is silent, irresponsive, dull, unsympathetic.

The music is within it just as the seed is in the earth, but it awaits the vibrating strings, the bow, and the master hand to bring out its glory, just as the seed awaits the rain and the sun to burst forth into bud and flower.

The varnish of our violin is dry, and as we take it in our hand it looks more like a beautiful statue in its silence, grace, and exquisite proportions. It is difficult to believe that it is brimful of power and of sympathy; that at the first touch of the master's hand it will thrill with emotion and become a living thing.

It is our pleasant task to bring it to this stage of perfection.

We have shown how much patience, genius, and study are required to form and regulate the smallest detail of a violin, and in no point is care more necessary than in its stringing, for although it is left till last, it is almost as important as the construction itself. It is here, too, that you begin to prove the work already done, for if your violin be not perfectly formed, and if it be not made of wood of the utmost elasticity, the strings, however good, will not vibrate with any steady regularity.

Nor can you put on any strings you please. You must study the constitution of the instrument, you must humour it, and get an insight into its characteristics, and then, and not till then, you may string it.

If it be an old violin, mellow in wood and delicate in construction, the strings must be those capable of bringing out its richness of tone. If it be a brand new one, full of freshness and vigour, it will require taming, and strings of a larger size will suit it best, for the thicker the string the fewer its vibrations, and therefore the lower its note.

We must remember that the strings which please some violins, and agree with them in every particular, will torture others, and it is a pity to force them to associate with uncongenial companions; indeed, there is not the slightest necessity for it. There is a great variety from which to choose, and it is quite possible to suit the sweetest and the roughest, the oldest and the youngest of violins.

Again, when the violin is in working order and requires re-stringing, follow the advice of Heron Allen, which is on no account to take all the strings off at once and then put the new ones on, for by so doing you would cause the sudden relaxation of the pressure and working of the fibres of the wood, and the chances are that the violin would be out of temper for days. On the contrary, take off one at the time, and put on the new one and screw it up to pitch before changing the next.

But what are strings? Where do we get them? And what is their office?

One wonders why they should ever have been called cat-gut, for there is no record of their having ever been made of that animal. Had they been, what a profitable occupation the rearing of cats would have been! The error has, however, been widely spread and accepted without question. Even our writers have fallen into it. Cowper, for example, in referring to Charles Wesley's violin playing, says: "With wire and cat-gut he concludes the day."

Another writer, too, has described a violinist as "One who stretches the bowels of a cat over a wooden box, and rubs them with the tail of a horse."

Again—

"The musicians

Hover with nimble sticks over squeaking crowds (fiddles),

Tickling the dried guts of a mewling cat."

Making strings from the intestines of animals dates back to the Ancient Egyptians, who required them for their harps; and they were made then, as now, from the intestines of sheep. They would hardly have made them from the cat, which was with them a sacred animal.

Some interesting experiments were made by Baptist Porta in the sixteenth century, in order to find out the effect of using other intestines for strings than those of the sheep. He made some of half sheep and half of wolf gut, which produced no music whatever; nothing, indeed, but noise and discord. He made others of the intestines of the serpent, the effect of which was most painful.

Some strings were shown at the Paris Exhibition, made of human hair; but although they yielded a good sound, were by no means durable.

Shakespeare speaks of strings made of hair, viz.:

"Sweet and musical as bright Apollo's lute, Strung with his hair."

Experience proves that the best intestines of which to make strings are those of lambs about eight months old, those being preferred which have fed on dry mountain pasture.

The demand for strings of small size, which require to be made of the best material, is very great in September (the string-making month), indeed the demand far exceeds the supply.

As to the goodness of the strings, that depends almost entirely upon where they are made. The making of them is not confined to one country; but those of Italy bear off the palm, and there is a best even among these. For example, the Roman strings are the very best, being clear, transparent as glass, very elastic, and slightly rough.

Those of Padua are highly finished and durable, but not always true; and those made in Verona are softer and deeper in colour than the Paduan strings. In spite of these differences they are made of exactly the same material, but the process of manufacture varies.

Out of Italy the German strings, mostly made in Dresden, are best; they are white, smooth, and durable, but through being over bleached are somewhat faulty in sound. Those of French make stand next; the small strings, however, are not durable. In England we make all kinds of strings, good and bad, dear and cheap; but most of the last, which are dark and uneven.

It seems really that the further the seat of manufacture is from Italy, the worse the strings—a circumstance which is to be accounted for by variety of climate. The process of manufacture is carried on in the open air in Italy, a thing impossible in other countries, where the work is done by artificial means.

The first strings have but few threads in them, and therefore if they be not clear they must be of inferior material; the seconds and thirds, being spun with several threads, are never very clear.

To test a first string before putting it on the violin there is nothing better than to follow Spohr's plan of holding a portion of it between the finger and thumb of each hand, then set it in vibration; if only two lines be seen it is free from falseness, if a third line should show itself it is not true. My attention was called to this test by a student at the Royal Academy of Music.

There are several kinds of covered strings, some being closely enveloped in fine copper or silver wire; it is more difficult to obtain perfection in these than in those made of gut.

There have been great improvements in stringing violins during the last half century. Formerly those of very large size were used alike on violins and violoncellos, a practice which has passed away.

I daresay all violin players have noticed that after playing some time their breath makes the strings flat, in fact just as playing in a moist hot room will do; while on the other hand, if the heat of the room in which they are playing be dry and burning, the strings lose their natural moisture, and get sharp. This is explained by an experiment made by Dr. Arbuthnot about a hundred and fifty years ago, in order to find out the effect of air on human bodies. He says, "I have found that the single fibres both of animal and vegetable substances are lengthened by water and moist air. A fiddle string moistened with water will sink a note in a little time, which therefore proves that it has relaxed or lengthened 1-16th. The steam of hot water will sink it a note in five or six minutes."

And now for the characteristics of the strings. Their duties are by no means light. They convey the message of the bow to the sound-post. They must always be in so sweet and healthy a condition as to produce perfect fifths whenever called upon; that is to say, if two strings are stopped by the finger at any given point, both together and at the same moment, the interval known as a fifth must be produced.

The strings are highly nervous; if, when one is vibrating, you touch it ever so slightly with the finger, it suddenly ceases. They will not work alone, they must have sympathetic companions. If you stretch a string between your fingers in the open air, and pass the bow over it, you would scarcely hear the whisper of a sound; but if you attach the string at each end to a slab of thin wood, the sound increases in intensity as the particles of wood vibrate in sympathy with it. It is something like this which occurs in a violin. The wood vibrates not only with the strings, but also with the mass of air inside.

A string will not yield a musical note under all conditions, but simply under the influence of tension, and even then the tone of the note will depend upon the thickness of the strings and the force with which they are vibrated; for the more rapidly a string vibrates, the higher will be the note produced. The pressure of the four strings on the belly of the violin is enormous when one thinks that the weight of the whole body is but a pound.

More than a century and a half ago it was discovered that the pressure of the strings was equivalent to the weight of sixty-four pounds, and that the burden was borne thus:—First string nineteen pounds, second string seventeen pounds, third string fifteen pounds, fourth string thirteen pounds. Since then the pitch has been raised a whole tone higher, which necessarily increases the pressure to ninety pounds. Of this weight the bridge bears one-third of the burden, and even this it cannot be said to bear alone, for it shifts a good part of it to the sound-post, a little less to the bar, and retains the remainder for the equilibrium. The weight of the bow is extra, and adds to it by one pound.

An old writer speaking of the strings calls them cords of tissues and intestines of animals, and he continues: "they are held to their tension by a button and some pegs, ascending sufficiently high to charge the instrument with a weight of ninety pounds."

No violinist ever understood the character and power of the strings as did Paganini. He did not treat them tenderly, for his method was to smite them, and thus from a single chord brought out

"The voice of quires and weight Of the built organ."

He prided himself upon being able to dispense with the second and third, and to make the first and fourth strings only perform his commands, and draw tears or laughter at will from his listeners.

It was at Florence that he made these two strings convey a love scene between himself and a lady of the Court, whom he loved and by whom he was loved, and in such a marvellous manner was it performed that the audience almost lost their wits in wonder and delight. After this he frequently played on one only, the fourth, for which he had a great affection. It really seemed quite the same to him whether he played on one or four strings, as the following anecdote will show.

Having to play before a large audience at Leghorn, just after running a nail into his heel, he came on to the platform limping. At his odd appearance the audience could scarce restrain their laughter. He seemed not to notice it, but commenced the concert, when suddenly the candles fell out of his desk. At this the laugh was audible. He seemed neither to notice the darkness nor the laughter, and went on playing till the first string broke; at this the laugh was general, but when they saw that he played on to the end with only the three strings, their laughter changed to vociferous applause.

He rarely, if ever, stopped to mend his strings when they broke, which was of frequent occurrence; owing to his want of care of them, they were often quite ragged on the finger-board.

In dealing with the strings one could not help thinking of Paganini for a few moments, as he seemed to know all their secrets; but now we will return to our violin. The strings are on, and we look at it with admiration. Both we and it are in a state of expectancy: we are waiting for the something which is to bring out its hidden power and beauty; the something which is to have unbounded sway and influence over it; that something to which air and wood and strings will yield implicit obedience. We wait for the king and his magic wand, at whose touch the strings will vibrate and the song burst forth upon the air as though it had the wings of angels.

Such wonderful effects are produced by the sweep of this magic wand across the strings as to be sometimes beyond the power of words to express. At the exercise of its power the air becomes suddenly burdened with graceful, delicate, fascinating sounds; in a moment all is changed, and in their place arises a storm of vehement capricious appeals to our imagination; and even while these are vibrating in our ears comes a soft dreamy message from the magic wand, which fills our whole being with tenderness and love.

Magic wand, indeed! which can make the vibration of the strings over which it sweeps reach the strings of our hearts, the vibration of which shakes our whole being, and shows us at a glance how out of tune they are and how they need the master hand. Or it may be that the magic wand sets the strings of our hearts vibrating with a thrill of love and joy and peace.

If the magic wand draws us within its circle, we can no more resist laughing, crying, dancing in its command than the violin itself.

Strangely enough, this wand or bow has nothing in common with that over which it rules so absolutely. It is not made of the same wood; it is not shaped by the same maker; its work is directly opposite to that of the violin, which as a whole or in its individual members learns only to obey and act in harmony. The office of the bow is to command. The very air is under its orders—that is to say, the air which passes into the violin by the ff holes.

All who play the violin know that the body of the instrument encloses an empty space which, like everything belonging to a violin, has its duties. It must be ever on the alert when the bow is in action to receive and dismiss the masses of air driven in by the wand sweeping over the strings. There is no rest or abiding place for the air within this empty space, for as soon as it arrives it is chased out again by another mass of air driven in by the command of the bow.

We noticed in a former chapter that it was quite as impossible for the violin to live without air as for ourselves, and now that the bow is at work we shall understand better the truth of this remark.

The air, which enters and retires with a wonderful regularity, acts like a shuttle, and is the vehicle of all the sounds. The harder and firmer the driving bolt, so much the more elastic and rapid is the bound of the air; and the thinner the table the more it trembles under its excitement. The quantity which enters is nearly always the same, because it is under the orders of the bow, and that which comes out is in a measure independent, although it has to rush away very unceremoniously when the new arrival makes its appearance.

It is easy to understand now the necessity there was of exactness in the measurement of the bouts or sides; for the amount of space within must be capable of containing just so much and no more. If a globule of air too much be present it must be sustained; if it be lacking it must be supplied.

There can be no playing fast and loose with the air—it is a tyrant, notwithstanding that it is a slave of the magic wand; and if it be not exactly measured the sounds would be unequal, or rather they would be propelled with so much haste that they would get entangled and broken, and then adieu to the magic of the wand.

Savart made many experiments as to the relationship between the air and the sound, and the result was that the intensity of the sounds of a violin depended upon the mass of air contained within the instrument.

In consequence of this several violins of Stradivarius were tested, and in every case the space enclosed a mass of air which rendered a sound equal to five hundred and twelve vibrations in a second. And to obtain this is the aim of the violin maker, from the first moment when he sets about his work to that in which he places tools and compass on one side.

Our violin is finished, but it is a new one; and Mace, who lived two hundred and twenty-five years ago, says, "We chiefly value old instruments above the new, for by experience they are found to be the best, and they are so, probably, because that by extreme old age the wood, glue, linings, and above all the varnish, are by time dried, made gentle, and 'airified,' so that stiffness and stubbornness, which are natural to such bodies, are so debilitated that the pores of the wood have a greater liberty to move, stir, or secretly vibrate, by which means the air, which is the life of all things, has a more free and easy recourse to pass and re-pass." Other reasons are given for preferring an old violin to a new one by Oliver W. Holmes, who says there are fifty-eight pieces in a violin. These are strangers to one another, and it takes a century, more or less, to make them thoroughly acquainted. At last they become an organic whole, as if it were a great seed capsule which had grown from a garden in Cremona.

Let us not, however, be discontent with our new Mittenwald violin, for Otto, who is a great authority, says, "It is an established truth that an instrument acquires a beautiful and mellow tone not by age but by practice. Constant vibration shakes the resinous particles out of the wood, thereby rendering it more porous and better adapted for producing a good tone than it otherwise is."

The make and the makers of the bow we leave for another chapter.

Correspondence.

EDUCATIONAL.

FIREFLY.—We are sorry to hear of your non-success in your school. We advise you to stay where you are if you get a house rent free, and try to get someone to live with you and share expenses, which must be very moderate we should think. Try and get pupils, or perhaps you could start a Kindergarten. We doubt your making much money by painting cards. It is better to try and make your means answer, however small, and not try experiments. "Work for All" appeared in vol. v. of the "G.O.P.," and consisted of six articles—going through all the present-day employments for women and girls. The volumes always begin in November.

FLANNY.—We suppose you refer to the Zenana Mission. You would be obliged to come to England for training. The Zenana Medical College, 58, St. George's Road, S.W., is undenominational. Ladies are trained for Medical Missions in India and China—two years' course. There are three terms in the year, the fees being £17 10s. a term, for board, residence, and instruction.—Hon. Sec., Dr. Griffith. There is a Mission Training Home for Ladies—The Poplars, Addlestone, Surrey—in connection with the Women's Christian Union.—Hon. Sec., Miss Lloyd, 143, Clapham Road, S.W. Also the Deaconesses' Training Institution, 41, Ferntower Road, Mildmay Park, N.; and The Willows, Stoke Newington, N. You could write to any, or all, and inquire.

SNOWDROP.—If you want a list of the girls' educational and other clubs, you must order a copy of the small manual called a "Directory of Girls' Clubs," published by Griffith and Farran, St. Paul's Churchyard, E.C. As to getting orders for work at the repositories where ladies' fancy work is sold, you must go in person and show your work. This must be done in seeking for trade orders—which we should recommend in preference to the charity institution assistance. We do not give advertisements of wool shops, nor any other kind of trade establishment.

HEARTSEASE.—See our answer to "Snowdrop." The English Reading Society might suit you, as it is permitted to the reader to read three hours a week in lieu of half an hour daily, and to divide the half hours into ten minutes at a time, should other avocations render brief readings more feasible. Address—Miss Bayley, Beacon House, Handsworth, near Birmingham.

B. WINDER AND A. C. MOORE.—We are glad to oblige you by informing all inquirers that your girls' societies are now discontinued. Miss Winder's, of Bell Vue House, Ulverstone, Lancashire; and Miss Moore's, of Oakfield, Eltham. Of course they cannot be omitted in the "Directory of Girls' Clubs" until it reaches a second edition.

MUSIC.

N. C.—Students at the Royal College of Music, Kensington Gore, S.W., can go to a students' home, of which there are several; or else, upon inquiry at the college, lodgings will be recommended to them. Royal Alexandra Home, South Kensington; Kindergarten School, 38, Pen-y-Wern Road, Earls Court, S.W.; or Worthington House, 179, Finborough Road, S.W.; are all well-known residences.

A GREAT LOVER OF THE "G.O.P."—Try the Correspondence Classes of the Cambridge Examiner, published monthly by Bagster and Sons, 15, Paternoster Row. Usual fee, £2 2s. per course. Apply to the Editor, Falsled, Essex, for all particulars.

A BIDEFORD LASSIE.—The lyre was a kind of harp, and is one of the most ancient of stringed instruments. Nearly all the Greek music was written for it, and it was used as an accompaniment to poetry. It was the peculiar instrument of Apollo, the Greek god of Music and Poetry. It gave the name to the kind of poetry called lyric, to which it originally furnished an accompaniment. Pythagorus is said to have discovered the law on which the construction of stringed instruments depends, and Terpander, probably about 670 B.C., added three to the four strings of the lyre. In "Eadie's Bible Cyclopaedia," it is said that David probably used the lyre, and it might have been played by the hand or with a key.

ART.

HELENE STURMEY.—We are happy to draw attention to the Portfolio Sketch Society, to which you belong, and which you find so improving. Secretary, Miss W. E. Sharp, Hallwood, Ledsham, near Chester. Subscription, 2s. 6d. per annum, beginning April 1st (paid in advance).

G. E. B. could do much towards cleaning an oil painting by cutting a potato in half and gently applying the cut side to the picture and rubbing it. As the soap-like froth accumulates, use a very soft piece of sponge and a little tepid water to remove it. To clean gilt frames we can only say that if daily dusting with a very soft brush meant for the purpose be not sufficient, you must have them regilt with the proper gold leaf, or, if only gilded with common oil gold originally, you must procure a little bottle and camel's-hair brush, and paint them over yourself.

ELIA.—If you wish to paint the pebbles in water colour you must paint the surface with a mixture of water colour megilp and Chinese-white. If prepared for oil painting, flake-white (oil colour) and gold size will be required as a foundation. But after washing the tiny holes must be filled up with whiting and parchment size, applied with a knife, and then rubbed down to an even surface with sandpaper.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AN IMPETUOUS, TROUBLESOME GIRL would not, we think, have any chance of obtaining a situation as companion at her age, and had far better endeavour to get employment in a music shop, or else try and perfect her music and her education so that she may teach. There are examinations held by the Society of Arts in the practice of music at certain provincial centres once a year, and in London in June or July for 1st and 2nd class certificates; fee, 5s. Apply to the Secretary, H. Truman Wood, Esq., Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C. If you could obtain this certificate, and one of the College of Preceptors, you might try and get a situation in a year's time, but you must qualify.

NELL.—You have washed the Japan tray with hot water, which will always crack the varnish. If anything of a glutinous character should fall on it, and rubbing with a soft linen cloth fail to remove it, you may use a little cold water and a few tea-leaves stiff soft from use in the teapot. If streaky from grease, sprinkle a little flour or whiting on it, and rub off with the soft linen cloth.

BROCK DISH.—We admire your perseverance in educating yourself. You must inquire at musical instrument sellers for the instrument you need, and they will tell you if it could be obtained second-hand.

EISLIA.—Southey wrote a poem called "Modoc" in 1805. It is probable the autograph lines you have are a portion of the manuscript or a short study for the poem. We regret the story would not suit our columns.

ONE OF JACK FROG'S TRIBE (France).—We see no difficulty worth mention in the way of your own and your mother's visit to friends in England, as you are so well acquainted with the language. Indeed, so many speak French in this country, that it is not essential to speak anything else. Our metropolis is full of foreigners of all nationalities. As to the crossing between Calais and Dover, it is a matter of little moment, there are so many and fine steamers, and they cross three or four times a day. So we cannot see that your mother has any just cause for alarm.

PEARL.—You do not mention your age. Nurses must be twenty-five years of age, except at a children's hospital, when the age is eighteen to twenty-three. Try the London Hospital, Whitechapel Road, E. The matron sees candidates daily between 2 and 4 p.m., except on Saturdays, by appointment to be made by letter.

DCRA.—The bank you mention would invest any sum for you, and would advise a safe security, and tell you how to proceed. Write them a note and ask, or else go to them and see the cashier.

M. E. WATERS.—Do you mean the address of the head of the emigration department of the Girls' Friendly Society? It is the Hon. Mrs. Joyce, St. John's Croft, Winchester.

MAURITIUS.—The parcel for the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen duly received and forwarded to their office.

L. K.—As a rule a girl's name is put on her mother's card, or on that of her hostess, if she is on a visit. In the case you mention you do not say if S.'s sister and the lady on whom you called were acquainted; if they were, a card should have been left. But if not a number of other questions would arise, of what the etiquette in that part of the world was, who should call first, and whether they wanted to know each other.

TRUTH.—We regret that we do not know of any magazine that would be open for the publication of her verses. Her writing is too large and careless in character. We are glad to see that the sentiments she has expressed are good.

UGLY DUCKLING had better read and carefully note the construction of extracts from the best authors in prose. Dr. Angus, on the English tongue (published by the Religious Tract Society), would prove very useful to her in the art of composition.

INQUIRER.—A goitre is said to be cured by a long sea voyage, also by the use of some special decoction of the common dandelion. Also by what is called "lugol solution," which is a combination of iodine and iodide of potassium, which is to be taken three times a day to begin with, the dose being gradually increased. The swelling may be painted with iodine for three days at a time, and then the skin left to recover for as long a time. Avoid all water containing lime or magnesia. Rain or surface water is preferable. The disease is chiefly found in hilly and mountainous places, where there is no free passage for the air, but a valley is enclosed at one end, forming what is described as a cuv de sac. The swelling is in the thyroid gland.

L. WILSON.—You should have applied to our publisher, Mr. Tarn, for the index of every year as it was completed. Possibly you may obtain some of them even now.

SUFFERING MARGARET inquires, "What a varicose vein is like, and if a varicose vein is painful." We fancy she must be suffering from one or more herself, and ought to know all about it. If so, she should avoid standing, and keep the leg up, and procure an elastic stocking to wear over the vein which is swollen and runs in a zig-zag instead of a straight line. They would give her advice at any general hospital or dispensary gratis, and possibly give a stocking for the varicose vein.

A. S. R.—We should advise you to write to Miss Blake, Hon. Sec. of the Female Middle-class Emigration Society, 187, Fulham Road, S.W., who will furnish you with particulars and advice as to your outfit, and how you had better go on your long voyage. We think the nominated passages are stopped at present.

SONG OF THE SPRING.

My laughter has broke o'er the azure sky,
And the sombre clouds have arisen to fly;
My voice through the woods has again been heard,
And recalled to its haunt the exiled bird.

I've come to the haunts that I knew of yore—
To the rich man's lawn, to the cottage door;
But I see the gloom of the storm-cloud cast
O'er homes lit with love when I saw them last

I have made the earth like a fair young bride,
And now farewell, for I may not abide;
I go to the land that knows not of blight,
Where cometh no shadow of sorrow or night.

I shall see no graves of the lovely there,
For Death cannot breathe in celestial air;
I go where fadeth not blossom or tree:
Will ye come with me? will ye come with me?

"THE SOMBRE CLOUDS HAVE ARISEN TO FLY.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER II.

KITTY'S FIRST INTRODUCTION TO A KING AND QUEEN.

Lady Ottery was behind the times in retaining her widow's dress, the same could not be said of the crowd of fine company which gathered in her rooms. They came in accordance with the acknowledged facts that her windows commanded the best views of any windows in the High Street, and that she might be counted on giving in few words, but with all honesty, a welcome to every one who had the smallest claim on her friendship, to profit by her windows. Here were flowing trains, slashed sleeves, and, on men and women alike, not only falling collars of costly lace, but, hanging over the collars, long, scented, curled locks.

Kitty looked round in alarm lest Dr. Kettle and his shears should be anywhere near. Her brother had told her various schoolboy tales of the eccentric president of Trinity, whose objection to long hair in men and lads was so vehement that he was in the custom of carrying a pair of scissors in the muff which he commonly wore, and shearing the fleeces of his special flock as he passed behind their backs, in order to take his place at the raised table in the hall of Trinity.

This was not Charles's first visit to Oxford as King. The palace or manor-house of Woodstock, which was not far off, was a favourite residence with him, and especially with Henrietta Maria. An outbreak of the plague soon after Charles's accession (three years before Kitty was born) had caused a Parliament to be held at Oxford; and again four years later he had come with his young Queen.

It was well—Kitty heard her grown-up neighbours saying—that the chancellor, my Lord Archbishop, had got a letter from the council only the previous year, "warranting" the destruction of the poor cottages which had been allowed to accumulate on the town wall and in the town ditch, even in the middle of the street before Trinity; though for that matter the King and Queen might have come by water, and avoided all the offences and many of the fatigues of the road, since barges had begun to ply all the way from London to Oxford, and the Royal barge might have been among the number. It was understood that it was in compliment to the chancellor, who had made great presentations of books to the great library, and had erected the images of the Virgin and Child with the crucifix in the porch of St. Mary's, that their Majesties were now about to honour Oxford.

"My lord might have done the first and left out the last," said Lady Ottery, in her abrupt way. "Methought we had done with the exaltation of images in England."

Happily her words were drowned in the sound of the trumpets which heralded the procession; for there were many admirers of the archbishop and his views in the aristocratic company. It was the next thing to treason to find fault with them on this occasion. Notwithstanding all shades of opinion were to be found in the city of many towers, perhaps more so at that date than at any other, from the Papists who haunted the hostelry of the Mitre, to the Puritans who were tinging with their sentiments the scholars of Magdalen and New Colleges. But everybody was in too great haste to see the fine sight, to weigh passing words.

It was a magnificent spectacle, beginning with the town trumpeters, followed by "town" resplendent in satin doublets, the magistrates in scarlet. Then came "gown," led by the heads of the houses, also in scarlet, and preceded by their mace-bearers. The members of the colleges walked next, in their wide black gowns, wide sleeves, and trencher hats; the main body dwindling down to scholars of Jackie Dacre's age—small editions of their elders and betters. These gave way to the courtiers, a mass of waving plumes, satin and velvet of all the colours of the rainbow, and glittering sword-hilts. At last there was the great coach with its gilt leather curtains drawn back for the occasion, that the King and Queen might be freely seen by their loyal subjects.

Look hard, Kitty, that you may never forget these memorable faces, and may know them again if they ever recross your path in life. Never mind the momentary disillusion shaver by many another girl and boy, and gaping rustic twice your age, all down the generations, because the King wears a beaver hat and the Queen a plumed hat instead of crowns, and in place of either carrying a sceptre, Charles holds a roll of paper, possibly a programme, writ fair and large, of the play which is to be acted at Christ Church; and Henrietta Maria, who is talking and laughing, now to the King, now to the nearest member of her suite, who press close to the coach, while she sways her petite elegant person backwards and forwards, is moving her empty little hands incessantly in action corresponding to her speech. Look hard, Kitty, with round eyes of wonder and admiration; these are very notable personages, with or without crowns, whose like you may never see again.

King Charles was then thirty-six years of age, not very tall or muscular, but with a remarkably graceful figure, well-trained in all manly exercises. His one defect—a slight bandiness of the legs, the result of weakness in childhood—was not visible when he was seated, on the whole a most stately and dignified prince. The long oval of the face was accentuated by a peaked beard. The forehead was high but narrow. The brows above the somewhat weak but bright eyes had a decided arch. The nose and mouth were handsome, and the long, dark locks curling down on his shoulders were soft and wavy like a woman's. It was the face of an ardent lover of its own conception of goodness and beauty, the typical face of an artist—imaginative, unpractical, wedded to one idea, well-nigh incapable of seeing two sides to a question, deeply reverent yet inveterately sophistical, and on occasions vindictive to cruelty. Little Kitty Dacre saw only a gallant, most noble-seeming prince, with the pensiveness of a poet in his far-away glance and abstracted smile, as he sat listening to the lively prattle of his Queen. That look was remembered afterwards, and called a shadowy foreboding of his doom.

Henrietta Maria was a woman of twenty-seven, and had already been more than eleven years Queen of England, for she had come to the country in 1625, the year of Charles's accession, a lovely girl-bride between fifteen and sixteen. She was then little better than a fair, volatile, naughty child, to whose youth, lively temper, and budding charms much was forgiven. She was now the mother of two princes and two princesses, but though she had grown in stature since she came to England, the growth of her mind was hardly in proportion; she was a little less childishly passionate and perverse, perhaps, and a little better able to maintain the state of her high birth and queenly rank, but her confident temper and stubborn self-will remained what they were to begin with, and what they continued to the last of her tragically troubled days.

Henrietta Maria was at once the most frivolous and the most encroaching of English queens. She had been spoilt by the folly of a silly mother, and the adulation of a corrupt court, spoilt by the homage which every poet in England and France paid to her as a beautiful and charming woman, spoilt finally by the over-indulgent affection of a romantically forbearing and admiring husband, whom she loved after her fashion. Her best qualities—her quick wit, which had received no training from the superficial accomplishments that passed for her education, her frankness and sweetness, her fidelity—though it might be to a wrong principle—and her impulsive intrepidity in a mistaken cause, had little chance of correcting their excesses and blunders, and of overcoming her worst attributes. These were giddiness and thoughtlessness, restless meddling in affairs out of her province, incorrigible plotting and scheming to attain her ends. Unfortunately for her and for the King, her chief sense of duty expressed itself in what her mother had enjoined on her at parting—the rigid maintenance, and, if possible, the proselytising extension of that form of Christianity which was alien to the faith held by her husband and repugnant to the creed of the nation. The slightest attempt to induce her to pay the Church of England the small mark of tolerance and respect of being present at any of its ceremonies, provoked in her the utmost hostility. For this reason she had resolutely declined to be crowned along with her husband, or even to witness his coronation.

The last time the Queen was in Oxford she had been in the perfection of the personal charms which, their chroniclers and their possessor alike admitted, began to fade before her age had reached its noon. At twenty-seven the face Vandyck so often painted, which never, unless under his pencil, acquired the soft serenity, bountiful repose, and simple dignity of self-forgetful, beneficent matronhood, was just a little hard and sharp, with a suspicion of coming haggardness in its delicate lines. The auburn hair had darkened almost to black, forming a stronger contrast to the clear, warm complexion. The large dark eyes were as lustrous as ever, but a trifle strained in their ceaseless roving and sparkling. The mouth, always a little large, was becoming more pronounced from the increasing tendency to hollowness in the cheeks. The perpetual play of gesture was not only fatiguing, it was waxing more and more theatrical. Still Henrietta Maria was to most people what she was to little Kitty—a very pretty and very gay-looking young lady.

After the King and Queen, truth to tell, Kitty saw no figures so striking and absorbing in the cavalcade as in the first place Dr. Peter Dacre, walking in his doctor's gown and hat, with his long pale fingers linked together and his head bent as if his thoughts were straying from the scene, till he passed Lady Ottery's lodging, when he recalled them with a start, and looked up to the open window to pay his obeisance to the dame and send a flickering, half-bashful smile to his little girl who was watching him so intently. In the second place, Jackie, in his small gown, pretending not to see his sister at all, but glancing slyly up at her out of the corners of his eyes. Happily, Kitty had just sufficient modesty and judgment to keep her private opinion of the supreme importance of these two figures to herself, and rather to listen to the scraps of conversation around her than to proclaim this article of her faith.

There had been a great waving of handkerchiefs from the ladies and cheering from the gentlemen in Lady Ottery's room, and it seemed as if it was left for the hostess to remark, "They must have been mighty quiet down in the street there, and at some of the other windows, for us to hear our own voices so well."

Then it came home to everybody that their Majesties were being received with little shouting and huzzaing from the mass of the spectators, whether in frieze or broadcloth, or even in silk and velvet.

"It was not so the last time," someone ventured to say, in answer to Lady Ottery's observation. "Out upon the scurvy knaves! can they not make a little more din? They do be heavy with over-eating, or sullen with pets and whims."

"Nay, but of what value would the cheering be if it were not lusty and hearty? Men may take their minds about holding their tongues. At least, there be no seditious cries, or base charges brought against anointed heads, that I have heard," said another speaker, cautiously.

Then a third person, a lady, began to hint that the Queen's Majesty was a little too preoccupied with herself and her friends in the suite, a little too full of fidgets and tricks with her eyes and her shoulders—French fashion—for the king's consort, the mother of his children, riding by his side, entering his University city. A majestic smile and a slow bend of her body in return for the obeisances of the people would have been more in place.

"If little Kitty Dacre here did not bide more still," said Dame Tabitha, in her bluntness, "I should whip her down from that stool in a trice, and bid her woman, Pettit, put her to bed on bread and water, to see if that would tame her into quiet. But it is foreign breeding in part," she corrected herself with her usual fairness. "What is strange to us is second nature to her Grace, and the habits of youth do not only stick to us in strange places, we do stick to them with something of the impatient, unquestioning loyalty with which we stood up as children for the absolute perfection of our fathers and mothers."

"Kitty Dacre," said Lady Ottery, when all was over and the other guests had departed, "you have behaved so well that I mean to take you with me to-morrow to see the King and Queen's Majesties again, and witness the play with which they are to be diverted at St. John's. For myself I do not much affect plays, but neither am I so set against them as some be. It will be a little more for thee to see, hear, and remember when thou art an old woman like me."

"You are not an old woman, madam," said Kitty, earnestly, looking up fearlessly into the strong, somewhat sombre face.

"Do not fleech, little one; I cannot abide fleeching," said Lady Ottery, with a shade of severity; but even as she spoke she patted the small head which began to droop at her words, with a hand as large and bony as a man's. Indeed, her knuckles were a good deal more developed than those of Dr. Dacre.

But though Kitty went with much delight to this other gala, the scene had lost a little of its novelty. There was not such a good place found for her in the hall of St. John's, packed with University magnates and distinguished visitors, as the stool at her godmother's elbow in Lady Ottery's lodging.

Moreover, the child got confused—not merely with the splendid crowd, but with the acting of the Hospital of Lovers. She could not clearly distinguish the actors in their fantastic habits from the company they were entertaining. She mixed up their speeches in character with the scraps of conversation which she heard around her. Kitty may be the more readily forgiven for the jumble, when it is taken into account that the actors were all University men, some of whom she had heard of and seen when they came to visit her father. They were ready to mingle with their guests—save, indeed, those who were royal—on equal terms the moment the play was ended; and neither the costumes nor the rant of the stage was much more gorgeous and high-flown than were many of the dresses and remarks of the audience, especially to an inexperienced child. Kitty was more in the humour to carry away with her what belonged to the doublets and gowns which she had not got time to notice before, as that the King was in purple velvet, and that his lace collar was the very largest, with the deepest scallops she had ever beheld, while the Queen was in cherry colour, and wore pearls twisted in her hair.

For anything farther, Kitty heard people say that the handsome man in the tawny-coloured coat, stiff with gold lace, was Lord Holland, who used to be known as "the beautiful Earl of Kensington," when he was sent to France to make up their Majesties' marriage. The keen-faced doctor in the gown and hood, who seemed to be everywhere ordering everybody, since he was in a double sense responsible for everything, as chancellor of the University, and as an old member of the College of St. John's, where the play was given, was Archbishop Laud. Though somewhat stern in University discipline, as might have been expected from a devoted churchman, austere in his personal habits, he was a liberal benefactor to the schools. People said he was a another Wolsey, without Wolsey's sumptuous style of living. Dr. Laud was in high favour with the King and Queen, and it was to grace his chancellorship that they were now honouring Oxford with their company.

Doubtless another compliment to the chancellor was that the Prince of Wales, a little boy of six years of age, and his soldier cousin, Prince Rupert, had just been entered students of St. John's, where they were never destined to study.

But there was a gentleman there who did not scruple to take precedence of the chancellor on his own ground. He was a big, dark, haughty-looking courtier, with sombre heavy eyes and singularly finely-shapen nervous hands. Full of his own large ambitions and the weighty concerns of the State, he stalked into the hall and glanced rather disdainfully at the performance which was usurping so much time and attention. Kitty caught the respectful whisper of the bystanders when he brushed past, and retained its purport, as a child will sometimes unconsciously pick up and preserve information which it neither understands nor cares for. This gentleman was another man whom the King delighted to honour—Lord Wentworth, the Lord Deputy of Ireland, who came over this year on a brief visit from the country which he was ruling with a high hand and bringing into proper subjection to his Majesty. Who would lay odds that there would not be a tussle for power between Wentworth and Laud—that they would not jostle each other on the same road? They did jostle each other, though it was on a different road from that they had intended, before the world was many years older, long before Kitty was woman grown.

The play, to which Kitty did not attend, was a very good play, "merry and without offence," as those who profited by it were fain to proclaim. The same could not be said of the play called "The Floating Island," written by the public orator and played the day before at Christ Church in the presence of their Majesties, as a grand finish to the pageant of their entrance into the town. It had been full of ill-judged satire directed against those who were of Puritan principles, many of whom were then present. It had even contained unseemly jests about Master William Prynne's loss of his ears, in apparent forgetfulness of the facts that, however outrageous his fanaticism, he had been an able and esteemed scholar of Oriel in his day, and that if he was not in Oxford at the present time, he had certainly many friends and acquaintances still in the city.

Kitty prick'd her ears not merely at the mention of her father's college and her home, but because there are very few children, even of the gentler sex, who have not a shuddering appetite for terrible stories; and here was one with a vengeance, as she gradually gathered in an incoherent fragmentary form, from the murmured talk around her. Master William Prynne had writ a book, the name of which she could never hope to say, but its meaning was that it was to be the scourge of players, and in this book he had grossly attacked the Queen's Majesty—which was very wicked of him, no doubt—for playing in a pastoral before her Court at her palace of Hampton Court. It was strange of her to play, because, as Kitty had heard Lady Ottery say, before the Queen and her ladies did it, no woman had ever acted on a public stage in England. But somebody else said her tutor had recommended her to do it as a means of perfecting herself in the English language, and, of course, even a queen must obey her tutor. It was very bold and bad of Master Prynne to find fault with his Queen on so insufficient a cause; but oh! that was nothing to what the Council did to him in return. No wonder the Queen interceded on his behalf, only the King was so angry that for once he would not listen to her. Master Prynne was put in the pillory, where Kitty had seen, from a distance, wretched men and women stand to be hooted at and pelted with filth by furious mobs. But Master Prynne suffered worse, far, far worse, for both his ears were stripped off, and the places where they had been were seared with a red hot iron. Kitty felt her own ears burn, and the tears rush to her eyes at the dreadful tale.

The story was driven out of her thoughts for a time by a wonderful circumstance which befell her a little afterwards. As Lady Ottery was leading her out, the little girl caught the eye of the Queen, who was a young mother, and affectionate in her impulsive way.

"Pardon," she exclaimed, stopping in one of her lively sentences. "To whom is that pretty little girl?"

Her Majesty, though she had been eleven years Queen of England, still spoke broken English, with a French idiom and accent. In writing her grammar and spelling were more deplorable than can well be imagined. For that matter she had refused, in her youthful perversity, to speak or write the language at all during the first months she spent in the country.

When it was explained to the Queen that Kitty was the little daughter of a learned Dr. Dacre of Oriel, at her Majesty's command, and that the child had been brought there to enjoy the privilege of seeing their Majesties by her godmother, Dame Tabitha Ottery of Hayston, in this county of Oxford, her Majesty desired that both Kitty and her guardian should be brought up and presented to her. After speaking a few gracious words to Lady Ottery, who received them with due reverence, while she was not overwhelmed by being thus distinguished, Henrietta Maria turned to Kitty, who was curtsying with trembling profoundness. "Alignonne," the Queen said, "thou must come to my Court one of these days, and work havoc with these great blue eyes of thine."

"Yes, madam," answered Kitty, timidly; and her timidity was not dissipated by the laugh which her simplicity aroused.

The King heard it, and he turned with a quick, gentle instinct to comfort the child. "Nay, little heart; thou wilt have no such idle sin on thy conscience if I read thy looks aright. Thou wilt keep the light of thy blue eyes to cheer thy good father's hearth, and if thou shouldst carry it farther, it will be to gladden the dwelling of some honest fellow of a husband."

"Yes, sir," answered Kitty, with the same desparate acquiescence.

But through all the proud pleasure of being seen and spoken to by the King and Queen, with so many grand ladies and gentlemen standing by, of having such news to tell her father and Jackie, and repeat over and over again to Mrs. Judy, Kitty remembered, as if it were a sombre background to the rest, Master Prynne and his ears or no ears. The first thing she said to her father when she got home, after her prattle about the King and Queen, was, "Oh! father, how could the officers do such things to poor Master Prynne, though he had been ever so rude and scut—scar—I cannot find the word scurrilous. But to cut off his ears and burn the places where they had been with a hot iron! Why did people not prevent them? Father, did you know of it, and had you taught him when he was a boy like Jackie?"

"My little wench, what art thou prating about?" asked Dr. Peter Dacre, looking up with his grey bewildered face. For his flesh seemed to have taken the tint of what little hair was left to a bald-headed man, and he had always a bewildered air when he was suddenly disturbed in his reflections and recalled from some abstruse thought started in the past, to some common question belonging to the present. Then his lined face grew grave to sternness. "If I compass the matter aright, Kitty, you have been hearkening to discourse far beyond your years and your judgment. Moreover, it is not fit for your sex, even though you were a woman and not a child. What hath a child-lass like you to do with the sentences of councils, ay, or with the execution thereof? If thou wilt please me and do thy child's duty, thou wilt leave them to the older and wiser folk, whom they concern, from this time henceforth. But it passeth me to make out how you came to be listening to such pestilent gossip, in the royal presence, no less, instead of minding the ingenious play at St. John's and the grand spectacle of their Majesties in their chairs of state, to which you were taken by your and my good friend Lady Ottery, as I was informed, unless my memory play me false."

When she told him as far as she could the talk about the play which had led to the other talk about Master Prynne, Dr. Peter was mollified, still he laid a strict injunction on the speaker. "Daughter Kitty, never meddle with what is clean beyond thy province, an thou mindest my wishes. The powers that be are ordained of God—that is all we simple folk need care to apprehend. Yes," he added a moment afterwards, half speaking to himself, with a sigh of recollection, "I remember Will Prynne well enough. I did teach him when he was no more than your brother's age—a youth of fair promise but perilous disputatious, stiff-necked and narrow-minded, ruined, with so many more like him, by his disputatiousness."

BROKEN JOYS.

HEARD a child go singing down the street :
Merrily came the trill ;
When suddenly stopped the sound of her little feet,
And the voice was still.

Someone's sharp anger broke upon her song,
Chilling her with the shock ;
Her joy was dashed, as waves, that ripple along,
Are dashed upon the rock.

O Life, what hopes, what love-dreams and delights,
That men chant as they go,
Like that child's song, are stopped in sudden frights,
Never again to flow !

INTERESTING MONUMENTS OF DISTINGUISHED WOMEN.

TOMB OF QUEEN ELEANOR IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

EVERYTHING which either does, or ought to, interest girls comes within the province of this journal. Sometimes the subjects which we place before our readers are intended for their amusement, at others for their instruction, and oc-casasionally it is our duty to call their attention to matters which are serious, painful, or melancholy. The contemplation of death under any circumstances must be sad, even to those who are best prepared to meet it, and all things which remind us of mortality, such as cemeteries, churchyards, and memorials of the departed, must recall solemn thoughts and ideas ; but just as the most exquisite music and the noblest poetry have a touch of the sad and solemn in them, although they give us the most refined sentiments of pleasure, so the thoughts which come to us, when contemplating the memorials of the departed, ought to bring to our minds consoling feelings of joy mixed with this sadness, especially when we have a reasonable hope that those commemorated by the monuments we gaze upon have passed away from a life well spent, to reap an everlasting reward and wear an incorruptible crown.

Perhaps there are few monuments to the great and wealthy which encourage this hope more strongly than that of Eleanor of Castille, "The Queen of Good Memory," as she is sometimes called. Eleanor of Castille was daughter of Ferdinand III., King of Castille and Leon. She is said to have been singularly beautiful, and was possessed of great wealth, being, in right of her mother, heiress to the Earldom of Ponthieu. She was married to Edward I. while he was yet Prince of Wales, and, although she appears to have been rather delicate in health, she insisted upon sharing all the perils and dangers of his numerous campaigns. When Edward remonstrated with her against accompanying him to the Holy Land, she is reported to have answered : "The way to heaven is as near from Palestine as from England." Eleanor was crowned with her husband in Westminster Abbey in the year 1273, and she was his faithful wife and constant companion for thirty-six years. It is related that upon one occasion she saved his life by sucking the poison from a wound inflicted in his arm by the dagger of an assassin. When Eleanor first arrived in London she caused herself to be unpopular by what we should now consider a most innocent act. She was, as we have said, of a rather delicate constitution, and, coming from the sunny south to our colder clime, she attempted to keep out the draughts by hanging her chamber round with tapestry. The people regarded this as a kind of sacrilege, because they had never seen these hangings anywhere else except in churches, and the matter actually led to a serious riot. Our girls will, we feel quite sure, acquit this good queen of any irreligious act, and feel grateful to her for having introduced into this country the charming practice of hanging rooms with tapestry, which has such a beautiful effect in so many old English mansions.

The people of London, however, soon learned to appreciate Eleanor, and it is somewhat singular that the very heart of the metropolis should now bear a name derived from the affectionate memory of this good and gentle queen. "Charing Cross" is supposed to be only a corruption of "Chère Reine" Cross, because it was one of the crosses erected by Edward I. in commemoration of "The Dear Queen."

Edward seems to have been so impressed by the virtues of Eleanor that he not only erected three monuments to her memory, one at Lincoln, one at the Grey Friars Church in London, and one where she was interred at Westminster, but he also built memorial crosses wherever her body rested for the night, when bringing her from Hardby in Lincolnshire, where she died, to Westminster ; these crosses were erected at Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Stoney Stratford, Geddington, Northampton, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, and Charing. Of the three monuments one alone remains, that at Westminster Abbey, and of the ten memorial crosses only three, those of Northampton, Geddington, and Waltham. These crosses are singularly beautiful structures, and are amongst the most perfect examples of Gothic architecture. Waltham Cross is still fairly perfect.

The monument in Westminster Abbey was probably erected very shortly after Eleanor's death in 1291. It is an elegantly designed altar-tomb, the sides of which are adorned with small arches, each containing a shield carved with armorial bearings ; on the base-ment below is a large plain panel, upon which the marks of painting can be distinctly traced. The picture must, when perfect, have been intended to represent some kind of burial service or ceremonial, as there is an open sepulchre or raised grave in the centre of the composition. The figure of the person who was being laid in this tomb has been purposely obliterated, for what reason it is difficult to say, unless it was simple mischief !

The side of the monument towards the aisle is adorned with a most elegant iron guard or "hearse," which was made by a blacksmith of Leighton-Buzzard in the thirteenth century.

It is difficult to see the effigy of the good queen very well. It, however, represents a woman with a singularly modest and gentle face ; one hand rests upon her breast, and the other formerly held a sceptre, which has now disappeared. The figure is composed of copper very thickly gilt, and was cast by a London goldsmith. All the space on either side of the effigy is stamped with armorial bearings. The tomb itself is composed of a native marble which was brought from Petworth, and it is interesting to notice the laborious skill which the thirteenth century workmen must have bestowed upon it in fashioning the elegant little bunches of oak and vine leaves which form the finials and other adornments of the small canopies. Unfortunately the dampness and neglect to which the royal tombs in Westminster Abbey were for very many years subjected have caused the marble to disintegrate, and consequently many of these charming little examples of foliage carving are reduced to mere fragments, but enough remains to show the extreme delicacy and elegance of the original work.

Some of our girls who have given their time to the study of carving and modelling in clay might do well to copy these exquisite little groups of leaves, or what is still left of them ; for although every care is now taken of the monuments in Westminster Abbey, yet year by year the process of disintegration and decay goes on, and nothing appears to retard their progress. The late Sir Gilbert Scott imagined that he had discovered a solution which would arrest this process of decay in the Abbey, and it really did seem to have the desired effect, but it does not appear to have been altogether successful, and of course restoration, which is the process of replacing old work by modern, would in such a case as the present be simply out of the question.

TOMB OF QUEEN ELEANOR IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

The canopy which at present surmounts the monument of Queen Eleanor is not the original one, which it appears was removed when the tomb of Henry V. was erected.

There is a simple inscription on the copper-gilt border which runs round the effigy of the queen, giving her name and titles, and trusting that "God will have mercy upon her." A longer and far less simple epitaph, which has now entirely disappeared, was placed over the monument in the time of Henry VIII., composed by the poet Skelton; in it Eleanor was described as—"A woman both in counsel wise,

Religious, fruitful, meek;
Who did increase her husband's friends,
And 'larg'd his honour eke."

Adjoining the tomb of Queen Eleanor, to the left of our drawing, will be noticed an archway adorned with numerous statues, niches, coats of arms, etc. Immediately over this arch reposes the body of another English queen, Katherine, the wife of Henry V., daughter of the poor mad King of France, Charles VI., and the unhappy and much maligned Isabella of Bavaria. Henry V.'s courting of this princess is quaintly represented by Shakespeare in his play of Henry V. After the death of Henry she married Owen Tudor, and was the grandmother of Henry VII. That monarch, however, seems to have shown very little respect to her memory, because, when he built his own chapel, he not only destroyed her monument, but dug up her body and had it placed in an oak chest, which was deposited under the archway of Henry V.'s tomb, where it remained for many years. The chest appears to have been broken open in later times, and the body, reduced to the condition of a mummy, was actually exhibited in the 17th century. Pepys himself recalls having kissed the queen.* The body was afterwards removed, but did not find a proper resting-place until the late Dean Stanley, with good taste and judgment, had it very properly buried beneath the floor of the gallery which supports the chantry of Henry V.

BLUE AND GOLD.

A STORY OF THE SEA.

By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

CHAPTER II.

"MY SHIP SHALL BE MY BRIDE."

AFTER Nugent's arrival on board the Esmeralda, Perry did the very best he could to be happy under existing circumstances. He really was a good-hearted fellow, though now he accused himself fifty times a day of being a churl. What right had he—thus ran his thoughts—to feel aggrieved because Jack's friend and old shipmate had been invited to share the pleasures of the cruise with them? Was not the yacht Jack's own, his home upon the waters wide? And what was he, Perry, to him any more than anyone else? And on the other hand, what right had he, Perry again, to behave like a dog in the manger with regard to Aileen? Perhaps Nugent would propose to her some day soon, and she would accept him, and they would be married, then that would be an end of it, so far as the dog in the manger was concerned.

Probably the best thing after all that he could do would be to leave at Gibraltar, where the yacht would touch on its way to Teneriffe. What! leave the field while there was an enemy in it? No, this plan did not commend itself to Perry quite. He was a sailor, a British sailor, and British sailors are not in the habit of running away. He would stay, no matter what the consequences might be. Even moths find it pleasant to flutter round a candle. Sometimes they get their wings singed; well, his wings were singed already. Sometimes they die by the flame. So might he, and it would not matter a deal; no one would mourn; certainly not Aileen.

He had a peep into the glass again. He was not a bad-looking fellow for a sailor, but he had not the fine soldier-airs of a Nugent. But there—he would try not to be selfish. So he ran up on deck after this, singing to himself.

It was eventide, and he found his friends among the cushions, with Nugent reading aloud to them. Very charmingly Nugent did read too. How Perry wished just then that he only possessed a few accomplishments. If he could play the violin for example, or recite something from a tragedy, or even a farce, or—but look, Aileen with one of her kindest smiles makes room for him on the couch beside her, and holds up a finger to warn him that he must sit still and listen.

It was very pleasant sitting here beside Aileen. As to going on shore at Gib., why, he wondered now that he had ever tolerated the idea for a moment, or how he could have conceived it.

But a few minutes afterwards, when Nugent closed the book and received so many pretty and really sincere compliments from the ladies, leaving the yacht at Gib. did not seem such a bad notion after all.

It must be said here, at once, that there was nothing of the flirt about Nugent. His admiration for Miss O'More was evidently very real, and he so managed it that it was not at all obtrusive. But for all this, Perry could not help wishing at times that Nugent had not so many engaging ways with him, or such high-tone manners of talking, moving, and looking.

It will be perceived that Perry was really studying the "red marine," as he somewhat bitterly styled him in his secret thoughts, quite as much as he studied Aileen.

The yacht one morning early steamed quietly into the beautiful bay opposite Gibraltar, cast anchor, and in due time received the officer of health, and was declared free.

It was a very lovely day, and Perry's spirits, owing perhaps to the bracing and pure air, were much above par. He even caught himself saying really clever things at breakfast, and making everyone around the table laugh at his originality.

The forenoon was spent in "doing" the rock and the town. It was in doing the rock that Perry obtained his first real advantage over Nugent. On starting the red marine was full of life and fun, but alas! for him, those awful streets that constantly rose in front of them completely fagged him, so that his attempts to be of any real service in assisting Aileen were transparent failures. He grew quieter, and now, if he smiled at all, it was one of these manufactured smiles that may curl round the lips but seldom go dancing round the eyes.

And the rock was still before them. Here was a chance for Perry, so at least he thought, that he determined not to miss.

"You don't look over well this morning, Nugent," he said. "You are very pale, and seem out of form. Are you naturally weak?"

"Not in intellect," replied Nugent, with a meaning glance at Perry. "I believe," he added, "I can see as far through a millstone as the miller himself."

It was evident that Nugent knew Perry's secret, and Perry at that moment registered a vow that in future he would address his rival as Lieutenant Nugent, instead of the freer and more friendly patronymic.

"Well," he said, "I merely made the remark out of kindness, and I have a flask in my pocket."

"Thank you."

"But do you really feel out of sorts, Mr. Nugent?" This from Aileen, and her face was so full of anxious sympathy that Perry felt sorry he had spoken.

"I don't feel over bright, I assure you, Miss O'More; but," he added, "it is nothing, only a little heart debility that I suffer from at times."

"I don't think you ought to attempt to climb the rock," continued Aileen. "Pray don't."

"I shall take your advice then, and saunter about the town till you return."

"Do; we'll be so anxious, all of us, till we get back and find you recovered."

So Nugent was left. But had Perry gained a point? Quite the reverse, in my opinion. Nugent had fenced so prettily as positively to turn to his advantage what might otherwise have told against him. And he was certain of Aileen's sympathy and even pity.

True Perry now had the young lady all to himself for the rest of the forenoon, but her thoughts were absent elsewhere, or he imagined they were, which is much the same thing. So his spirits fell and fell to zero; he said no more bright or pretty things, and conversation between the two became very much forced indeed.

Once after a brief silence she turned to her companion—

"Do you think poor Mr. Nugent really is ill?" she said.

"I'm afraid, dear Miss O'More, I cannot tell you; I think, however, he ought to see a doctor."

"Miss O'More," he added presently, "would you be as anxious about me if I were ill?"

"Certainly," she replied, her eyes opening wide with wonder.

"Oh, Miss O'More, I should give ten years' service to be sure of that."

This was the boldest speech that Perry yet had made, and he felt astonished at his own courage.

"Mr. Perry, why?"

"Because, Miss O'More, because—Aileen, ever since we first met I have lo—"

The word never found vent; for at that moment there was the roar of a terrible explosion close beside and beneath them; the very mountain shook, and a shot or shell went hurtling away out seaward. It was only the men commencing practice, after all, but Aileen screamed and almost fell. She recovered herself quickly, far too quickly, indeed, to require any support from Perry's outstretched arm.

"I'm so stupid!" she exclaimed; "but list! I think I heard sister calling me."

Then away she bounded like a fawn, and poor Perry, with his sensitive nature and his shy sailor-heart, got no opportunity to renew the subject of conversation that day.

To tell the truth he did not feel sorry. He construed Aileen's flight into a hint for him to trouble her no more on such a subject as that which he had more than half broached.

"That was my congé," he said to himself. "Bless that old gun, anyhow! It has saved me from something infinitely worse—a rejection. So much for ambition! Nugent is a happy man. His heart, indeed! The old fraud smoked too much last night. Never mind; henceforth my ship shall be my bride. I was never cut out for a marrying man. But—Nugent, indeed! However, I'll let things slide."

Perry did let things slide. He seldom now made any attempts to get near Aileen, either on board or on shore. If at any time he found her walking on the quarter-deck with Nugent, or talking to him, he turned on his heel before reaching them, and pretended to find something to interest him in another direction.

Indeed, he appeared often to actually shun her. It was somewhat strange that Aileen should have remarked this—and she talked most sadly too—one evening to her sister.

It was strange, too, that next day Jack should have led up to a conversation about Aileen, while the pair were walking together in the ship's waist, smoking those naughty cigarettes.

"You'll excuse me, won't you, old man? but I thought you once told me you were in love with my little sister."

"Oh, Jack, so I was, and—and so I am, there! Now you've got the truth."

"I didn't expect to get anything else, Lawrence. You're too simple a soul to go much about the bush. But now it seems funny to me that you let Nugent, who is really an excellent fellow, escort Aileen everywhere."

"'Cause I've no hope, man. Can't you see?"

"Fiddlesticks! You know the old saying about a faint heart. Now, look here, Lawrence. Do you see the bridge, there?"

"I see the bridge? Yes."

"Well, if that bridge were an enemy's barracks, and I had to attack it, I should simply draw my sword and go straight for it, and—"

"Hold on, Jack. Do you see that bridge?"

"Certainly."

"Well, if that bridge were an enemy's barricade, and I were told to storm it, I'd draw my sword and go for it, and I'd take it or be tumbled over; but if that bridge, Jack, were a lady's heart, and I had received the slightest rebuff, I'd sheath my sword, and—there would be an end of the attack. Of course you and I are differently constituted, Jack."

"So it seems, old man."

"Now, Miss O'More prefers scarlet to blue and gold. Oh, bother it all, here comes Scarlet himself!"

"Good morning, you fellows. I say, Fairbairn, when do you expect we shall reach Teneriffe?"

"To-morrow night, Nugent, if all goes well."

"Are you going to do the Peak?" said Perry.

"Not I, lad; I value my heart's peace too much for that."

Perry's hopes had gone rushing up since he had that conversation with Jack, brief though it was.

"Is it possible," he asked himself, "I can have any chance? Well, I cannot deceive myself. The happiness of my life depends on—Aileen."

I need hardly say that Perry felt no very extraordinary degree of sorrow for Nugent's so-called weakness of heart. Had he done so I think he would have been somewhat more than human.

All, however, did not go quite so well with the saucy Esmeralda as Jack had expected, and instead of catching a glimpse of the rosy-headed peak of Teneriffe, as the sun's last rays lingered on it, the vessel must have been nearly a hundred miles away at nightfall.

Perry was awakened early next morning, nevertheless, by the shouting of orders and the rattling of the cable as the anchor was let go. It did not take him a very long time to turn out, dress, and go on deck.

This day was to be big with his fate. He was determined it should be. For ever and aye, he told himself, he should be off or on an engagement with Aileen, and even as he was dressing he kept repeating to himself the well-known lines—

"He either fears his fate too much,

Or his deserts are small,

Who dares not put it to the test

To gain or lose it all."

He was just putting the finishing touch to his toilet when he suddenly burst out laughing, for a strange conceit had occurred to him. It was this: suppose he proposed to Aileen on the top of Teneriffe. Was ever, he wondered, love made before at such an altitude above the sea? Was ever maiden wooed and won in the clouds before? And if not, why not?

Jack was on the quarter-deck.

"Why, how well you are looking this morning, Perry, old boy!"

Perry smiled.

"There isn't much the matter with your heart."

Perry looked serious all at once.

"Oh, isn't there, Jack. I tell you it is very much affected. Now there is Nugent, for instance; well, I do not believe he knows what it is to possess a heart. He is malin-gering."

Jack laughed heartily.

"What," he said, "you really think poor Nugent is a fraud?"

"Transparently so, and I hope he'll forgive me for saying this."

"Oh, he would forgive you. He is one of the best fellows alive, and—I really do believe his heart is touched."

The last part of the sentence was brought out with considerable naïveté, and Jack smiled as he spoke.

Perry looked at him half seriously for a moment, then said—

"Heigho! What a happy man you are,

Jack! Everything seems always to have gone well with you; you are wealthy, and easy-minded, and you are rich as well as wealthy, rich I mean in the possession of a heart that adores you. Why, it is only the other day that I overheard your wife telling her sister, with an air of pardonable and even charming pride, that you, Jack, were a 'man in a million.' A man in a million! Just think of that. I tell you what it is, Jack Fairbairn, I'd give six years' sea service for somebody that I know to call me a man in a million, even only once. Hallo! here is Nugent; speak of—angels, and they appear. How is the heart this morning, Lieutenant Nugent?"

"Better, thanks. But I do not mean to do that." He pointed to the huge cone-shaped mountain that towered high above them in the milky sky. "Only I shall enjoy seeing you all up there. I have one of the best telescopes ever made. I shall be able to see everything you do, and positively almost hear you speak."

He nodded significantly to Perry as he spoke, but kept on smiling.

The two men understood each other then, if they never had done so before.

As Aileen was going over the side he held her hand a moment longer than Perry thought he had any right to do.

"I shall be wretchedly lonely till you return," he said.

Horses and guides were all ready for the party when they landed at Orotava, and not only these, but tents and provisions also. For Jack Fairbairn was too fond of his wife to permit her to run the risk of over-fatigue. Besides, as he naturally argued, one cannot enjoy scenery when weary and tired.

To describe either the first or second day's journey would take up too much of my space, pleasant reading though I believe it could be made.

The view at first was magnificent; but as the day got hotter and hotter, and even the steeds grew tired, a kind of languidness stole over all hands, which considerably detracted from their capability of enjoyment.

No one was sorry, therefore, when the end of the first day's journey came.

But Jack was quite a treasure as a camp-former. The tents were most luxurious, and the dinner a complete success. So after a time, when all sense of fatigue had worn off, everybody felt quietly, dreamingly happy—it was the air, I suppose. Aileen said she would like to live here for a whole month.

"So should I," said Perry.

"Perry," said Jack, "you sing a good song—do give us something nice."

"It is about the only thing Perry can do," Jack explained to the ladies.

Perry laughed, but he sang all the same. He sang a glorious old sea song in real sailor fashion. The brine and the breeze seemed to run all through that song, and in its very notes as they rose and fell you might have imagined you heard the wail of the wind sweeping over storm-tossed seas by night.

One song followed another, and everyone was very happy. Perry was, and so was Aileen; and neither of them ever forgot that evening spent on the plains of Retama.

During the afternoon Perry had noticed growing near the white blossomed bushes that grew around here two flowers; one was a beautiful little scarlet convolvulus, the other a kind of violet of darkest blue striped with gold.

As he lay down in his tent that night Perry said to himself—

"To-morrow morning I shall cull a bouquet of each, and offer one to Aileen, letting her make her choice—blue and gold or scarlet."

Blue and gold or scarlet! I believe he fell asleep repeating those words to himself.

Blue and gold or scarlet.

MY WORK BASKET.

MONOGRAMS.

H. L. This monogram is suitable for embroidery in plumetis, and can be used for household linen, washstand tidies, or sideboard cloths. The work should be traced, and filled so as to keep the form correct. Either white or coloured embroidery cotton is best for articles constantly requiring washing. The washstand tidies, which are often made of sateen or canvas, are rendered more attractive by using some of the artistic colours in embroidery silks or filoselle, now to be purchased so reasonably, and so pleasant to work with.

S. E. Is another monogram for household linen, washstand tidies, etc.; but these letters are worked in two colours—the S in dark brown, with spots of gold colour, the E in pale blue, with a soft green for the floral ornaments.

M. C. Elegant monogram, worked in old gold-coloured and dark green or rich red silks. The outline of the C is in close satin stitch, enclosing the fancy stitches of small dots and graduated French spots. The M should be traced, and thickly filled in with fine filoselle the same shade as the silk used for the embroidery.

A. Z. A simple monogram for plain embroidery.

M. B., with coronet, is a monogram suitable for the display of colours. The work is easily done in the usual embroidery stitch, the design being carefully drawn.

K. S. Monogram for handkerchief.

W. G. Small monogram in plumetis stitch for gentleman's handkerchief.

B. P. If worked on velvet, the outlines look well in fine gold or coloured cords, filled in with small crystal beads and flat embroidery in white floss silk.

W. K. A bold, well-formed monogram, suitable for large blotting-case or portfolio.

O. S. Looks well worked in pale blue and soft pink crewels, on any thick material, such as cloth or furnishing satin.

E. O. For crewels or embroidery cotton, in plumetis stitch.

P. B. This is an elegant design for a sachet, and is worked with rich embroidery silk and fine gold cord or small gold or coloured beads. The letter B looks well in shaded pink silks; and the P in chestnut brown. The gold cord is only used as a framing to the letter B, and requires care in sewing it on, so that the edge is kept in form.

A. S. These letters, worked in fine flourishing cotton, in two colours, are suitable for tablecloths, or ends of chamber towels.

D. G. Another monogram easily worked from the illustration.

E. B. Quickly worked letters for handkerchiefs.

R. Z. Simple embroidery.

K. G. To be worked on open canvas in cross stitch, with wools or silks.

A. W. Good design for working, or pen and ink drawing.

C. H. Good letters for embroidery or painting on leather bags or paper racks.

M. K. Another monogram for cross-stitch or in beads.

L. B. The letter L is outlined with a thick raised embroidery, the inner part worked in close flat dots. The B should be worked with the most prominent colour.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

By LADY MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Bessie's Sacrifice."

CHAPTER VII.

THE days passed on, and all the world heard of Lady Newport's dangerous illness. Some heard that her senses had forsaken her, and that she was now insane; some whispered that a terrible quarrel had taken place between herself and her husband, and that he had shut her up and deprived her of her attendants.

The truth, as it appeared to Sir Michael and to her own relations, was sad enough without exaggeration.

Lady Newport had utterly broken down in health; she would see no one but her husband and her aunt for one short hour every day, and then she appeared so weak and oppressed, so ill, in the darkened rooms, that they could not but feel that it would be cruel to stay long.

She would not have any of her own attendants about her; she took a strong aversion to her own apartments; she chose the two large unused rooms on the ground floor, on the quiet side of the house, away from all other occupied rooms, and she begged for the sole attendance of her old nurse Rachel, who came to her and undertook all the management of her sick room with loving care.

All was conceded to her, all arranged with tender consideration to please her sick fancy. In this time of distress it would be difficult to imagine anything more wholly devoted than Sir Michael's treatment of his wife; his tenderness was unflinching, his gratitude great for the slightest kindness on her part. But he seemed to gain nothing more, only the permission to pay her one visit in the day, to sit by her couch watching her wistfully, and telling her the little news of the passing times.

As the days passed on, bringing no change, sometimes a great terror would come over him. What ailed his wife? What was the secret of this strange condition of life that she had adopted? He shared in utmost sympathy her sorrow for her brother's death; but it could not be that. He knew her to be strong—strong to act, and strong to suffer. Could it be that the long-strained nerves had altogether given way at last?

The doctor whom he questioned anxiously was a very kindly man. He spoke of patience, of time—always time and patience. There was not much amiss, he said; he found his patient's heart and pulse bounding with the force of fever; he saw her flushed, with shining eyes, and he would go away shaking his head, for though he did not confess it, he did not understand.

Sir Michael went for consolation to Mistress Betty, and she heard his story with a little impatience.

"Eleanor was always wilful," she said. "I had good reason to know that; this condition is due to perversity. If you like I will go to her and endeavour to arouse her to a sense of duty."

"You will be gentle with her," said Sir Michael, with hesitation.

"Unless I find it to be less a case for gentleness than reprimand," said Mistress Betty.

"I think she is very ill—and yet—and yet——"

"People may be ill reasonably or unreasonably," said Mistress Betty. Then quite suddenly her cheeks grew white. "There is an old story," she said, "that the life of twins is so closely bound together that the illness or failure of one will affect the other. I trust that nothing ails my nephew."

"Surely that is but an idle superstition," said Sir Michael, breathing short.

"I do not know; only their mother used to say that she felt assured that the lives that began on the self-same day would likewise so end."

"But it has not been so."

"Not yet; but—— What do you mean? Have you heard anything?" And a look of terror came into her face.

"Did not Eleanor tell you? Oh, this life! This terrible life of concealments and miserable divisions."

"You have news of Robbie?"

"He is dead, I regret to say. Shot by John Mowbray. Why should I not speak openly? My worst fears were realised. No, not the worst. That shot was more merciful than what the future might have brought forth."

"Dead! Our Robbie dead!"

"Poor lad! I never saw him; but they say his likeness to Eleanor was wonderful."

"Who told you? Are you sure? Ah me, how sad is this hard world!"

"She told me, my poor Eleanor. After all, Mistress Betty, perhaps I am too impatient; I should be content to let her lead her own life, and wait and trust in time; but yet—yet—it frightens me!"

He paced up and down the room.

Mistress Betty was too much stunned to speak for a few minutes, then suddenly the tears came like rain.

"My pretty ones," she wailed. "Our darlings; has it then come to this? Oh, what have we done that we should suffer thus? Dead! Robbie dead! Then before the year is out sweet Nell will have gone to him. They can never live apart."

"No, do not repeat that idle superstition," he exclaimed, almost roughly.

But she heeded not.

"They were so like; both the same large, dark eyes. Then father used to place Robbie's hat on Nellie's head sometimes to see whether I knew the difference. Another victim to the cause—another young life swallowed up in failure and ruin!"

"Had he been long in England?"

"They never told me," answered Mistress Betty. "They never trusted me; I would not know their secrets, it was better not; I always talked too much. I told Nellie so, and she took me at my word. When we came back from exile we left Robbie with the Prince. His Highness wished it so, but it was sorely against my will. He has always been in his service since; we have seen him very rarely. My boy, my darling! He was the very life of my eyes. Was Nellie with him? She might have told me."

"She was with him when he died. It was in——"

"Hush, hush! Do not tell me where. I seek no secrets."

"There are no secrets in the grave," said Sir Michael, solemnly. "Now all should be open between my young wife and myself."

"Time, you must give her time," said Mistress Betty, raising her face, which had grown old and haggard in five minutes. "You see you did not know our boy. Forgive me," and covering her face with her handkerchief, she left the room in a passion of weeping.

Sir Michael went home. It was a grey, gloomy day, dark swift clouds fleeting across the sky, heavy drops of rain now and then dropping from the trees.

He rode over the wide green park, approaching the house from the north, towards the wing in which Lady Newport had taken up her abode. As he passed the windows of the rooms (which were long and narrow and raised scarcely a foot from the ground), that dark north aspect seemed to him more gloomy than usual; the rank, harsh grass grew up to the house and under the windows of this wing.

He dismounted and began to trace out the ground, thinking of flower-beds and a terrace, something to make it brighter and more cheerful if his wife chose to remain in these apartments.

The curtains of her rooms were drawn, but the sound of his horse's hoofs must have been audible within, for they were cautiously put aside and old Rachel looked out.

The old woman's face had on it a look which made Sir Michael start; a look of fear, of one who lived in daily terror. That expression was unmistakable, and the thrill it shot through Sir Michael's heart drove every drop of blood from his face. What did it all mean?

NEWS FOR CITY GIRLS.

By ANNE BEALE.

On the 14th of May, 1886, we had the pleasure of seeing the Lord Mayor of that year open the new premises of the Finsbury Branch of the Young Women's Christian Association, at 14, Finsbury Square.

We gave a short account of the proceedings in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER.

As most people want more than they actually possess, the desire then expressed was for the acquisition of certain premises at the back of the new Institute. Great things were to be effected, if only we could obtain and utilise them. In less than three years they have been acquired, and on the 15th of January, 1889, another Lord Mayor came to declare a fine hall and gymnasium, with a variety of useful accessories, open to any of the twenty thousand girls at work round about who might like to use them.

In spite of deep snow, through which a way for the carriages had to be cut, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress arrived in state, accompanied and followed by numberless friends of young girls. We hope they will show their sense of the interest taken in them by leading Christian lives. It was a bitter day, and the red carpeting spread for the feet of the guests was well sprinkled with snow; still, they filled the large hall to overflowing. Its wooden walls were prettily adorned with red and white drapery, and a gigantic "Y.W.C.A." was amicably placed on their four sides; while a huge "Welcome" stood above the platform, and the words "Jehovah Nissi" faced it.

Many good wishes were expressed from this very platform for the girls, by the Lord Mayor, the Bishop of Bedford, and others; and speakers and audience rejoiced to hear that there were over 800 members belonging to this particular branch, while more than 1,400 names were on the books. We hope they will increase, and that "Our Girls" may become a power in the land by means of their good conduct and good example.

When the meeting was over, its members wandered through the new premises; and certainly much has been done for the enlargement of the Institute. In addition to the hall and gymnasium, which is a very important, lofty, and spacious place, there is a new classroom. Two hundred girls have joined the educational classes, of which a brief notice was given in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER not long since; and this apartment, fitted up with desks and other appliances, is appropriated to them. A refreshment bar, lavatory, cloak-room, and a quaint little place full of small private cupboards for gymnastic costumes, are also additions to the original Institute. Assuredly much pains has been taken to give our city girls opportunities for muscular development, as well as for that mental and spiritual improvement at which the Y.W.C.A. chiefly aims. Classes for gymnastics, musical drill, calisthenics, etc., are held on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, from 5.30 to 7.30, and from 8.0 to 9.30; while the large hall will be utilised for other purposes as time goes on.

On the opening day it was utilised by some hundreds of girls, who met to enjoy a happy evening beneath its high dome. Despite the inclement weather, many lady friends joined in their mirth, and it is pleasant to know that neither unseemly jest nor boisterous manners alloyed the assembly. The old members influenced the new and such guests as were non-members, and seemed to show by their conversation what "a week of consecration" meant. Previously to the opening, the premises had been consecrated to Almighty God by a week of prayer-meetings, and a building thus devoted to the Great Giver of all good gifts can scarcely be desecrated by unholy conduct.

We visited it a few days ago, and found Miss Baldwin—who has superintended the good work for twenty years, and is looked upon by the girls as their mother—hopeful if anxious. Any inquiries concerning it may be addressed to her; she will gladly give information about educational classes and gymnasium, which are open alike to members and non-members. She was pleased and thankful to have so many responses to the short appeal in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER of last year, and hopes for more from this brief notice. Fifty girls have already joined the gymnasium, and we write about a month after its opening. But what interested us still more was to see the large drawing-room prepared for the Sunday Bible Class, and the other rooms ready for the reception of the girls. It all looked homelike and restful. If any element were lacking it was supplied by a magnificent tom cat, who certainly was "at home," and followed us from room to room as if he were "monarch of all he surveyed." He is the pet of the establishment, and is called "The Mouse-trap of the Square," for although domestic when indoors, he is an inveterate sportsman outside, and if he does not exactly "bag" his game, he brings it in his mouth, to No. 14, from the neighbouring preserves. We felt much honoured by his taking us under his special protection, and ending his march through the rooms on our lap.

Any of our girl-workers in the City who have no home in London, would also find the Institute "a happy hunting-ground;" in other words, a refuge in the great London wilderness. Should they like to see for themselves, Miss Baldwin will gladly give them personal information any evening after six o'clock, or on Fridays after two p.m. We earnestly hope that the members of the Young Women's Christian Association may increase a hundredfold, both in town and country.

VARIETIES.

ETIQUETTE RUN MAD.

The etiquette observed in the royal palaces of Spain used to be carried to the point of absurdity, monarch and courtiers alike preferring to fall martyrs to their pride rather than break the rules of etiquette, and so lessen their grandeur. Philip III. being gravely seated by a chimney, where the firemaker of the Court had kindled so great a quantity of wood that the monarch was nearly suffocated with heat, his grandeur would not suffer him to rise from the chair, and the domestics could not presume to enter the apartment, because it was against the etiquette.

At length the Marquis de Potat appeared, and the King ordered him to damp the fire, but he excused himself, alleging that he was forbidden by the etiquette to perform such a function, for which the Duke d'Usseda ought to be called upon, as it was his business. The duke was gone out; the fire burned fiercer; and the King endured it rather than derogate from his dignity. But his blood became heated to such a degree that an erysipelas broke out in his head the next day, which being succeeded by a violent fever, carried him off in 1621, in the twenty-fourth year of his age.

CATS IN OLD ENGLAND.

Cats are supposed to have been brought into England from the Island of Cyprus by some foreign merchants who came hither for tin. In the old Welsh laws a kitten from its birth till it could see was valued at a penny, when it began to mouse at twopence, and after it had killed mice at fourpence, which was the price of a calf.

Wild cats were kept by our ancient kings for hunting. The officers who had charge of these cats seem to have had appointments of equal consequence with the masters of the king's hounds.

IN A DISCUSSION.—People are apt to mistake the strength of their feeling for the strength of their argument. The heated mind resents the chill touch and relentless scrutiny of logic.

HOAXING THE PUBLIC.—A successful hoax was practised by a wag in the reign of Queen Anne, and is thus noticed in the newspapers of that period: "A well-dressed man rode down the King's-road from Fulham at a most furious rate, commanding each turnpike to be immediately thrown open, as he was a messenger conveying the news of the Queen's sudden death. The alarm instantly spread into every corner of the city; the trained bands who were on parade furlled their colours, and returned home with their arms reversed; the shopkeepers displayed their sables; and many were desirous of purchasing mourning before the news should become more known." The author of the hoax was never discovered.

FAMILY LIFE.—The family is the miniature commonwealth upon whose integrity the safety of the larger commonwealth depends. It is the seed-plot of all morality. We express the noblest longings of the human heart when we speak of a time to come in which all mankind will be united as one family.—Felix Adler.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

COOKERY.

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER.—Parmesan cheese is manufactured in the neighbourhood of Parma and Pavia (Lombardy), and is made of skimmed cow's milk, and flavoured with saffron; but Gruyère—from the Canton de Fribourg—is made of a combination of goat's and sheep's milk. Roquefort is a French cheese, and is made altogether from sheep's milk. The Dutch cheeses are made from skimmed cow's milk—sometimes skimmed three times. The variety most esteemed is called Schapekase, or sheep's milk cheese. The Dutch cheeses called Gouda owe their flavour to the use of muriatic acid, which is employed in their making instead of rennet. The Camembert is a French cream cheese, and Gorgonzola is a fine Italian one, somewhat resembling one of our own rich Stiltons.

J. W.—The way to wash out vermin from celery or any kind of vegetable is to dissolve a small piece of soda in a wineglass of hot water, and pour this into the bowl of salt and water in which you have placed the vegetables to steep after they are washed. This will effectually get rid of all worms. Those in celery are so small and thread-like that they might easily be overlooked, and plain water, or even salt and water, does not suffice to expel them.

MISCELLANEOUS.

IGNORAMUS.—Certainly the lotus (Nymphaea lotus of Linnæus) is a real and existing flower. It is the water lily of the inundated land of Egypt, and is revered as a sacred plant in Hindostan, Thibet, and Nepaul. There are endless Buddhist and Hindu legends connected with it, as well as in Persian, Chinese, Japanese, Arabian, and Asiatic Russian sacred traditions. The collar of the Star of India is composed of the heraldic rose of England, two palm branches crossed, and a lotus flower, alternating one with another. 2. Paul Pry is the name of a comedy by John Poole, and it is likewise that of the hero of the story.

STUPIDITY.—St. Nicholas is the patron saint of boys, as St. Catherine of girls; he is otherwise known as Santa Claus. There is a legend that an Asiatic gentleman having sent his three boys to school at Athens, they were murdered by an innkeeper at Myra for the sake of their luggage. But their father having bidden them to call on St. Nicholas for his blessing, the good saint had a vision of the horrible tragedy, went to the inn, extracted a confession from the host, and raised the murdered boys to life again. He is also the patron saint of thieves, because he once induced a gang of them to restore their plunder.

BEE.—We regret that we could not insert your verses in our paper. We do not admit little girls of "sixteen" to be members of our staff of experienced writers. The verses are very incorrect in composition, and have no originality.

GERTIE H. complains that "all her double teeth have decayed within a few weeks and are hollow all through, and papa says he should think it was the scurvy!" This is a new and very original idea. What you could do for them we are unable to say, for if "all be decayed," to cure the cause now would be unavailing. Perhaps some might be stopped by a skilful dentist. Get your ears syringed by a doctor, and possibly the deafness may be cured.

DOVEDALE.—The word angel means "a messenger." The texts which appear to relate to the employment of them as guardian angels are Heb. i. 14, Matt. xviii. 10, Luke xv. 10, Acts xii. 15, and many others which you can look out for yourself. We must be guided by God's word, which says that in obedience to His will they are employed in carrying out His designs. They are not to be worshipped (Rev. xix. 10), and they are not intercessors, but yet they present the "prayers of all the saints"—Rev. viii. 3. Our knowledge of them is derived wholly from Revelation, and in Heb. xii. 22, 23, they are said to be the future companions of the heirs of salvation. See the article on "Angels" in "Eadie's Bible Cyclopædia."

A. GENERAL SERVANT, NORWICH.—We think a dark-blue serge would be a useful and pretty dress, and if you get a fairly good one it has endless wearing qualities. You could have blue, flat braid put on it for trimming, and all gowns are now made in the plainest manner.

A. B. C. will destroy her dog by so much over-feeding. A dog should be fed once a day; but an earthenware pan of water with a piece of brimstone in it should be always within his reach. Never give him meat; he may play with a bone, or he may have a few chicken bones occasionally. A plate of porridge, or some crusts of bread, with a little broth poured over them, or dog biscuits, would give him an excellent meal. "A. B. C." inquires, "What is the best way to cure a bad temper, caused by teasing when he was a baby?" If he were "a baby" when you got him, we must ask, in our turn, what did you do to change him into a terrier dog? Perhaps you are an Indian juggler, or it is all the bad effect of the meat, and the milk, and the three meals a day.

CROWDED AND CRUSHED allows her "very fat" dog to lie on her bed at night, and naturally she is "crowded and crushed." As it has a very loathsome disease, we are the more at a loss to comprehend how she can keep it in her room at all at night, not to speak of its lying on her bed. Let her see what we said to "A. B. C."

"Miss INQUISITIVE" is advised not to "risk any money" on studying phrenology with a view to making money by it. She should study spelling, and get instruction to render her efficient for household service, or as a shop-assistant.

NAILS.—Wear gloves in the house, or put some strong bitter, obtained from a chemist, on your finger ends, to remind you of abstaining from putting them to your mouth. Tell the chemist the purpose for which it is required. "Medicus" has given an article on the care of the nails.

VENUS.—There ought not to be any "confusion on arriving at the table at a dinner party." Each person's place should be indicated by his name, and the servants in attendance should guide him to his seat, then by the time all are placed the hostess will be in hers, and grace should be said before anyone sits down. Many are irreverent, and sit when they should be standing humbly when giving thanks to their Divine Master, who provided all, of which they were utterly undeserving. In paying a visit, let the lady of the house find you standing—certainly advance to meet her, and take the seat she proposes for you.

A. J. SCHOFIELD.—We are glad to hear of any homes for persons of small means, who desire change of air, and have pleasure in naming Oak Tree House, Matlock Bridge, Derbyshire. In this case the home is exclusively instituted for ladies, and the limit of residence to two months; terms, 15s. 6d. to £1 2s. 6d., inclusive, with the exception of a fire in the bedroom. Only six or seven ladies can be accommodated. The foundress will not allow her name to appear, and those who apply must direct to "The Lady Superintendent," and send a stamped envelope.

IRISH MOLL is quite free to print or embroider the verses she names, and frame them as a wedding present. To republish is quite a different matter. We thank her for her pleasant letter, and so far from thinking she would be ineligible for a secretary on account of her handwriting, we consider it exceptionally good—free, well-formed, legible, characteristic. She ought to be as capable with pencil as with pen.

CASHIER.—If you "sit at a desk all day" we do not know what to recommend you to wear on account of your projecting shoulder-blades; but you might correct the unnecessary habit of stooping over your desk by wearing a face-board. It has often been described by us, so we will only say that it is a flat, slight deal board, shaped like a battledore or lawn-tennis racquet, with the middle cut out to admit the eyes, nose, and mouth. This must be stuck into a waist belt.

LILLIE will probably improve herself more by reading history, literature, and good tales, writing from dictation, and copying some good handwriting, at her age, than by regular lessons. 2. We never advise any of our girls to try for Continental situations, unless under very exceptional circumstances. 3. The Order of Merit of "THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER" is described on page 8, vol. ix., Oct. 1st, 1887.

T. M.—We think you should pay half the rent of the house, as the furniture is your friend's, and share the profits of the letting of the room between you both.

EUPHORIA.—She would sign the register in her mother's real name, not the assumed one.

ETHEL MAY.—Cold hands and feet, if cold in the daytime, may be cured by putting them into hot water, and afterwards rubbing them briskly with a rough bath-towel or a coarse flannel. It is well also to wear woollen stockings and silk ones under them. Much can also be done by gymnastics, diligently practised every morning. See "G.O.P.," page 510, vol. v., "Physical Education of Girls."

HUMBLE SIXTEEN's poem is lacking in originality and poetic feeling.

PROFESSOR RUSKIN'S MAY-DAY FESTIVAL.

By THE REV. J. P. FAUNTHORPE, Principal of Whitelands College, Chelsea.

All rights reserved.]

THE PROCESSION LEAVING CHAPEL.

PERHAPS one of the most characteristic features of the art teaching of Professor Ruskin, founder and first master of the Guild of St. George, is that it is the duty of women and girls—of girls especially—to be as pretty, and as prettily useful, as ever they can. Like all men of great mind, he is an implicit and explicit believer in the Divine influence of girlhood, of womanhood, and wifehood. And in various ways he has let this appear—in his devotion to his own mother; in the personal pleasure he has taken with and for many of his pets; in his teaching; in many of his writings, notably "Queen of the Air," "Ethics of the Dust," and "Fors Clavigera"; and besides all these, in his May Queen Festival at Whitelands College, Chelsea, of which we are to say a few words for the amusement, edification, and, we hope too, the improvement of our girl readers.

The Professor's first attempt at having a May Queen was made in a village, through some rich young lady, and it failed, either because the parents of that young lady interfered, or because she got married and left the village, the would-be May Queen, and the Professor to look after themselves. But when the attempt was made at Whitelands, it turned out a complete success, and Mr. Ruskin was delighted with it in every way, or in every way but one, that one being the dress of the May Queen; which has never pleased him, not even when, as last year, it was designed by Miss Kate Greenaway, at his personal request, and carried out by the Ladies' Working Guild, with all the care and pains that Lady Eden could give to it. "She is," said the master, "like Madge Wildfire." That was the May Queen.

Chelsea is famed in many ways. It has been and is the residence of literary men and artists, and is now being rapidly converted into Queen Anne houses and flats; but it is long since it could furnish forth space for a Rural Queen of May, so the college May Queen has to be elected, and all the rites and mysteries thereto properly pertaining have to be performed within doors, but nevertheless flowers are sent up from all parts of the country. Flowers and evergreens are bought, and by the 1st of May the chapel, the college rooms, and the students present such an appearance of May, and May morning, and going a-Maying, as would do anyone's heart good, who likes flowers, and greenery, and pretty smiling faces, and white dresses, better than bricks and mortar, gas lamps and pavements.

Our first illustration shows the procession leaving the chapel after the bright and beautiful morning service. The students proceed at once to the class-room, and elect the May Queen. A balloting paper is given to every one, on which the name of the May Queen proposed by the voter is written. These are collected, and the governesses enter the votes on a prepared sheet, and the junior who has the majority of votes is Queen of May. Only once has there been a tie. The Queen elect is then taken to be robed, and with her maidens assigns to which of the senior students Mr. Ruskin's gift of about forty volumes of his books should be presented, one volume to each. The Queen herself has by right "The Queen of the Air." Each volume is given at the Queen's absolute will and pleasure, but always for good reason assigned, which reason is written in the book; and if by chance it express rather what the girl ought to be, than what she actually at present is, she has a life-long reminder of what she must strive to attain.

Each book contains a label, with the signatures of the Professor and the May Queen. During the assignment of these prizes or gifts, as they are to be called, the students sing various choice May Day songs, or recite passages from Shakespeare, or dance round the May pole; and the Principal makes an address, taking each year some topic connected with the sports, or derived from the Professor's books. Thus, last year he gave some account of "Merrie England" as it was once, and as it shall be again when the writings of Professor Ruskin are more widely known and his teachings more extensively followed.

The text, if we may say so, was this: "To please is woman's work." Women and girls can give and make pleasure. All right pleasure is praise and praiseworthy. They can give pleasure by making rooms clean and pretty, by kindly sympathy with all with whom they come in contact, and by carrying about the "Human face Divine" with a smile on it. "God has made you girls to take pleasure in the use of your eyes, and of your wits, and of your bodies. And foolish creatures are continually trying to live without looking at anything, without thinking about anything, and still more without doing anything," says Mr. Ruskin, and of course they fail, and become soured and discontented and miserable; and what is worse, they make everybody else miserable also.

The Principal pointed out how girls could, in their daily lives, not only be pleased themselves, but give pleasure—good and right pleasure—to others. And he concluded thus, almost in Mr. Ruskin's words:—

"The angel of beautiful life is sent to all of you, hidden in the simplicity of daily life, daily duty. The root of all the evil in the world is the diabolical hunt after pleasure, apart from its use and the necessary price that must be paid for the right thing. It is a hunt on phantom steeds after a phantom hare with phantom hounds; it is pursuing death and not life, and death can be overtaken."

The grand procession is now announced, and the Queen takes her place on the dais surrounded by her maidens; more songs are sung, all her subjects do obeisance, and then the fortunate ones whose names are called, come up to receive their gifts, which they do in the manner shown in our picture.

But we have omitted the giving of the gold cross and necklet to the May Queen, which is usually done by some personal friend of the Professor. Our illustration shows the cross which was given last year. It is of pure gold, and of unique design.

When all the books are given, the procession is re-formed and the students march out after the Queen has proclaimed a holiday. She and her maidens are then photographed.

In the afternoon a large number of students take down the wreaths, make them into bouquets; and as the large baskets are filled they are taken by two or more girls to all the hospitals in the neighbourhood, and distributed to the patients; so there is May Day also kept, with flowers at hundreds of bedsides.

All our readers who want to know more about Mr. Ruskin and his teaching should read some of his books.

Perhaps one of the happiest features of the Whitelands May Queen Festival is the fact that nearly every student tries to have a May Queen in her school; and to try is to succeed. No one knows what help she will have in giving pleasure to others until she begins. All our girl readers cannot be Queens of May, but they can all be queens in their own homes, diffusing brightness and joy and happiness.

A DAISY CHAIN.

By HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

A LARK upspringing from crimson clover,
Trilling his song at the morning's gate,
Where dew-wet blossoms and grasses cover
His cosy nest and his patient mate.

Young leaves dancing and kissing each other,
Brown bees humming young buds among,
Young lambs sporting beside their mother,
O fresh fair days when the world is young!

A baby beck in the hedgerow shadow,
A beck new born of the sweet spring rain;
And children out in the wide May meadow,
Gaily stringing a daisy chain.

Dear little voices! I hear them calling
Now and again in their childish glee;
Ripples of laughter, rising and falling,
Now and again float back to me.

Thoughtful Mary alone is straying
Along the beck by the meadow bars;
"Here's a big daisy!" I hear her saying,
"This is the moon, and the rest are stars!"

Then came towards me with laughing faces
Three little daughters, a goodly band,
Linked together by daisy traces,
Which wee Ted holds in his dimpled hand.

My daisy chain—yet a link is broken—
My eyes grow wet with a mist of tears,
For still I hold in my heart unspoken
A grief that fell in the bygone years—

One little daughter has long been growing
To girlhood fair beneath Eden's palms—
Where crystal streams through the meads are flowing,
In yon far Heaven's eternal calms.

Of her I think when I hear the others
Laugh and shout in their careless mirth,
For lost lambs live in the hearts of mothers,
Side by side with their lambs on earth

Despite the pain when the links are riven,
God's hand will gather them all again,
And He will help me to knit in Heaven
The broken strands of my daisy chain!

BLUE AND GOLD.

A STORY OF THE SEA.

BY GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

CHAPTER III.

"WHY, JACK, OLD MAN, THAT WAS POOR PERRY'S SHIP!"

ONE of the guides entered the tent in which Perry was sleeping very early next morning to wake him that he might see the sunrise.

He shook the gentleman once. The gentleman muttered "Blue and gold." He shook him a second time, and he murmured "Scarlet," but when he shook him a third time Perry grasped the situation at once, and was quickly up and dressed.

Early though it was, and dark, the ladies were waiting, and a brisk, somewhat fatiguing walk of half an hour brought them well up the hill, just as the first flush of dawn was spreading upwards over the sky.

All rested now to wait the coming of the sun, and watch one of the grandest transformation scenes to be beheld anywhere in this beautiful world of ours.

All were silent.

It was a time for silence, a time even for adoration. One feels under such circumstances as if he were indeed in the company of angels. He feels his own littleness; feels something of heaven's great majesty, gratitude that he is allowed to live; wonder that he ever doubted the goodness and wisdom of a Higher Power; thankfulness that it has been his lot to witness such a sight, and pity for those who live down yonder on the darksome earth, and have never had this wondrous experience.

The sky tints, the sea tints—who could paint, who describe them, or the thousand magical atmospheric effects, as day hunted night in her sable trailing garments, from hill and glen, from land and sea?

Blue and gold and scarlet! There the colours were, and a hundred shades besides, all blended into one marvellous but harmonious whole.

No one appeared much inclined to talk until the tents were reached once more, and they had sat down to breakfast.

They succeeded in reaching the summit of the peak that day—for what is it, I want to know, that healthy British maidens cannot do if they try?—and reached their camping-ground some time before sunset.

It would not have been difficult to get back to the ship that night, but Jack did not, he said, recognise the use of turning pleasure into pain.

Had Perry proposed on the peak?

Certainly not in a way that was either very wise or very whole-hearted.

He had culled his two bouquets of flowers before starting, and taken them with him. Just before leaving the summit of the mountain he took them from his button-hole. He was going to tempt his fate.

Did Aileen love flowers? Would she accept a bouquet? and which would be her favourite colour—blue and gold or scarlet?

Now Aileen O'More came of a good old Irish family; she was therefore a maid with a mind of her own. She probably knew what Perry meant as well as he did himself, if not better, but she somehow now felt a little piqued, and being a wilful girl determined to teach Lawrence a lesson.

"My favourite colour?" she said. "Oh, the little scarlet bouquet; I do love scarlet!"

She dared not look up though, or meet his gaze, as she fastened the wee crimson flowerets in her breast. So she did not observe that with a kind of despairing glance at her he crushed the other bouquet between his fingers and threw it on the ground.

Poor Perry! He did not converse a very great deal at dinner that day, and he never once permitted his eyes to rest on Aileen. Will it be believed that this wilful Irish maiden's pillow was damp with tears that night?

Before luncheon next day the party was back again in the ship, and the vessel ran round to Santa Cruz.

For the first time during the cruise Perry complained of feeling tired, and not his usual self. He elected, therefore, to remain on board next day, as did also Aileen, as well as the "invalid" Nugent. Jack, with his wife and her maid, went on shore, and were absent quite all day. About seven o'clock in the evening Perry got up from his sofa and, simply in dressing-gown and slippers, prepared to go on deck the better to see the moonlight effects on the water and town.

He was probably the last one in the world who would willingly have constituted himself eavesdropper, but walking quietly up the companion, even before his head was on a level with the deck, he became aware that Nugent was there by the bulwark couch, talking low and earnestly, pleading his cause with Miss O'More.

Having heard so much, most men would have listened a moment or two longer. What suffering it might have spared poor Perry!

But no, he took everything for granted.

Nugent had proposed to the only woman that ever he, Perry, could have made his wife. It went without saying, he argued, that she would accept him. Well, he would not remain on board to be in their way, to mar either their happiness or his own. He went quietly back to his cabin, lit his candle, and packed a few things. Then he wrote a letter to Jack, simply saying he had gone on shore, and would not return that night. This letter he placed on his friend's table, then as soon as Aileen, whom he dared not see again, had retired to dress for dinner, he slipped away up on deck and got a boat to row him on shore.

Half an hour afterwards he was on board the Polynesia steamer. When did she sail for England? "That very night," was the reply. That would suit. He would be a passenger.

So he remained on board. He wrote another letter now to Jack, which would not be delivered until he was far away at sea.

He wrote to Aileen too. And this letter was a kind though a very sad one. He told her all—all he had felt for her, all he still felt, and should feel while life did last. But he added he would ever pray for her and—on her account—for Lieutenant Nugent too.

He did not read it over, but simply sealed it and sent it.

Next morning both letters lay on the breakfast-table of the saucy Esmeralda.

Of late years it has become the fashion for men who not only possess wealth alone, but courage as well, to have large yachts built for themselves, and to sail away in quest of the adventurous and the picturesque to out-of-the-way corners of the world. I trust I may not be misunderstood; I do not refer to what are sarcastically called "globe trotters," your round the world in so many days men, who go to make a record to enable them to assume the airs of travellers in the drawing-room, but who have no more knowledge of the countries and people they have caught a hurried glimpse of than they have of the domestic economy of the man in the moon, and not half so much as a little boy gleams from his first visit to a panorama. For people of this class I have all a sailor's honest contempt.

But the men I refer to are heroes, in a manner of speaking, and if you are a traveller yourself you may find them anywhere toiling along in boats or sledges under the Northern Lights, far away in the dreary and dangerous seas of the Antarctic regions, in the wilds of Central America, the forests and woods of the Dark Continent, the mountainous regions of the Andes, or the Pampas of Patagonia or plains of Siberia, anywhere and everywhere even to the uttermost regions of the earth.

Need we marvel, then, at finding Lawrence Perry, whom we left at Santa Cruz, walking the decks of a "doubly fortified" brig bound for the Arctic circle and far beyond it?

Many months have passed since he left the Esmeralda. His languor the day after he returned from the hills, and his illness, were but the outposts of a strong attack of jungle fever, by which he was prostrated soon after the Polynesia had sailed for English shores.

Even after he had landed and was sent to a naval hospital, he lay for weeks in bed, literally hovering betwixt life and death. But as soon as he began to rally—thanks to his youth and a splendid constitution—his recovery was a very speedy one indeed.

He soon regained strength, but not spirits, for his memories of the cruise of the Esmeralda and of Aileen could not be quenched. He must do something; he must undergo some great "spell" of activity, far more exciting than he can meet with in the service in time of peace, else he feels that he will go mad or die. He was a man of intense sensitiveness and nerve, and to be idle now while in grief was more than he could bear.

Help came from a quarter least expected, and just at the right moment. An expedition was to sail away to Northern seas in search of that dream of the Arctic traveller—an open Polar ocean; an ocean which in some mysterious way or other is always warm, and in whose midst are lovely green and wooded islands, inhabited not only by strange flora and fauna, but by peoples and animals such as we dwellers in the south can form no conception of.

The whole force, three beautiful sailing brigs, belonged to a wealthy American millionaire, whom Perry had met in New York, and he was speedily installed as captain of the second best of the three.

On a beautiful morning, early in March, the three brigs cleared away from Brassy Sound, and stood northwards with every stitch of canvas set, even to st'unsails 'low and aloft, for the wind was light though blowing steadily from the south, with a slowly falling glass.

People who dwell in the midlands of merrie England, or in and around London, feel a difficulty in associating beauty of landscape, seascape, and cloudscape with the far-away lone islands of Scotland while winter still binds them in his icy grasp. They shudder as they think of the cold, and of the tearing and unsympathetic winds that go sweeping over the bare hills of the sea-girdled peat-mosses of Ultima Thule. And yet, truth to say, no greater mistake could be made. There are times, indeed, when wild winds roar, and mountain waves dash and clash against the strangely fantastic cliffs that guard the seashores—days, indeed, when literally birds can scarcely fly. There is a grandeur, however, in even such storms as these, and a spirit which engenders in the mind feelings that cannot be expressed, and cannot be experienced elsewhere in any part of the world where I have been. But, again, there are often long weeks of stillness and quiet beauty, weeks of sunshine and frost without so much wind as to lift a feathery snowflake, when the sea-birds float on the calm heaving waves as they do in the Indian Ocean, and the tiny seas break and lisp and gurgle among the rocks with barely force enough to crumble the rainbow-tinted icicles that make every rocky cavelet a fairy's bower.

In seasons such as these the glory of some of the sunsets, if witnessed but once, can never be forgotten while life lasts.

Those three bonnie brigs seemed loath to leave the land, and even when the sun was slowly sinking, there were islands far astern that borrowed his rosy-tinted rays.

But the glass went more quickly down towards midnight, and as the mercury sank the wind and the sea rose higher and higher, sail after sail was taken in, till at length scarce a stitch of cloth was left aloft, and the brigs went staggering on through the storm and the darkness, under all but bare poles.

Yes, three bonnie brigs, with bold and happy, hopeful crews in them had left the Shetland shores, and three days afterwards there were but two. Where was their mate? Go ask the waves that break and boom and leap high over the cliffs on one of the wildest norland capes of the bleak Norwegian shores. Go ask the sea-birds that flew shrieking and frightened away from the rocks as a mad, despairing cry rose from the decks of that foundering brig, as the moon cleared majestically up from the rifted clouds and silvered all the sea.

Life at Glen Lyon Towers was very pleasant in the sweet summer-time. Glen Lyon is nowhere in Scotland, though the name would lead one to suppose it was. It was the English residence of Captain Fairbairn, R.N., and stood away down among the waving woodlands of Berkshire. Jack's father—now dead and gone—had built the mansion, and, with fond memories of dear auld Scotia, had named it Glen Lyon. Its tall, red chimneys and rounded brick gables peeped upwards through the greenery of the trees in the prettiest way imaginable. There was a fine old park around the house, with a lake in its centre, in which beautifully coloured, wee foreign ducks played and paddled in the sunny season of the year, gorgeously-plumaged pink-billed mandarins, or fairy-like Li-chi-kies, and the brown-bosomed crested ducks of Carolina; a lake with boats on it, and a boat-house where a mermaid might have lived happily; a lake, however, that in winter, when the ducks were all frozen out, and the frogs asleep among the reeds, was given up to merry skating parties and games of curling, in the sunshine or even by torchlight.

In the more immediate vicinity of the house were spacious gardens and terraces, lawns, rosaries, and verandahs half hidden in a wealth of climbing plants, from which flowers seemed never absent, where even in winter the wee golden flowerets of Jasmina nudiflora peeped wondering through the snow.

Jack's carriage, with its pair of spanking blues, might have been met almost anywhere all over the country in summer, and it is not going too far to assert that the ladies—Jack's wife and her sister Aileen—were favourites wherever they went. Especially were they so among the humble village poor, for all unobtrusively they managed to do those people many a kindly turn, and bring quiet joy to many a fireside where pain and poverty had lingered before.

It was generally remarked by the villagers that "the young lady" was, although always pleasant, always somewhat sad.

Not much of company keepers were the Fairbairns, although friends dropped down many a time and oft to hunt or shoot or fish.

A frequent visitor to Glen Lyon was Nugent, the "red marine," as poor Perry used to call him. He was of a very irrepressible and sanguine nature, this Nugent, and though Aileen had refused to listen to him once, he never doubted for a single moment that she would eventually become his wife.

Nugent and no other guest was present one morning at breakfast in the east parlour, when the boy came round to the lawn window with the letter-bag. Taking the liberty of a favourite visitor, Nugent jumped up, and, receiving the key from Jack, shook out the contents upon the table. There was something for everyone to-day. Nugent put his letters carelessly in his pocket; they were only epistles from bachelors friends and his business agent, so they would keep. Aileen went presently and sat down behind the curtain in a cosy window-corner, and began to read an eight-page letter—crossed, so it is needless to say it was a lady's.

While Mrs. Fairbairn lounged in an easy chair, Jack stood by the casement manufacturing a little cigarette.

Suddenly Nugent, who had been reading the Times, sat erect in his chair.

"Here, Jack, listen," he exclaimed. "'Loss of an Arctic brig with all hands. News has reached us from Christiansand of the foundering of a brig with all on board, in a terrible gale of wind, off the coast of Norway. From wreckage subsequently swept on shore it has been discovered that the name of the unfortunate vessel was the Fortuna, and that she was bound for the Arctic seas on an exploring expedition.' Why, Jack, old man, that was poor Perry's ship!"

Just one short, frightened cry came from the window recess, a cry such as you may hear from someone in an ugly dream; and when Jack, springing forward, took Aileen in his arms, her head drooped backwards like a little dead bird's. She looked as pale and still as if life itself had fled.

(To be concluded.)

THE MICROSCOPE AND OURSELVES.

PART III.

WHEN last we interviewed our microscope we asked him a great many questions about various things, and amongst others our skin. He was giving us a faithful and true account of that structure when he was interrupted by the termination of the article. We learnt what was meant by epithelium, and we learnt that the surface part of our skin was made up of a variety of epithelium, arranged in rows, or "stratified." This only gave us a very limited knowledge of the structure of part of our skin; the most important part remains to be inquired after and examined into. Let us take up our specimen of skin, and proceed again to examine it, beginning where we last left off.

Our last inquiries were all directed to the subject of the upper layer of the skin, which is called the "epidermis," "cuticle," or "scarf skin." Passing this, and going further down in our specimen, we come across a series of elevated cones (Fig. 4a), consisting for the most part of white fibrous tissue; these constitute the uppermost part of the next skin to the cuticle, which is termed the "true skin" or "corium," and forms by far the greater portion of the skin. If you have a good specimen you will see, however, that there are other structures in this "true skin" besides that of white fibrous connective tissue. This part of the skin is the feeling, sensitive part, and therefore carries in it sensory nerves; these nerves end in a kind of bulbous enlargement in the "papillae," as the elevated cones of the corium are called, and these bulbous endings are called "tactile corpuscles," their special function being to receive the sensation of touch. In a specimen in which the blood-vessels have been injected you will see tufts of them in the papillae, and a great number in the true skin generally. And is it not a gloriously conceived idea, magnificently carried out, that this sensitive, delicate true skin should be protected by a layer of epithelium cells, and that that layer should be thickest on the points most exposed to incessant contact with foreign bodies —the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet? The whole skin rests in a cushion of fatty connective tissue, which preserves it in a great measure from the result of violence, and is called the "subcutaneous connective tissue."

You will be certain to have noticed in your specimen other things in the corium, the construction of which we will inquire into presently. Meanwhile, whilst the memory of the epidermis is still fresh in our minds, let us ask about our nails. Few things are so important to the pleasant appearance of anyone as nice nails, and while I shall presently describe the anatomy of these natural adornments, let me digress for a moment, to give a piece of general advice; that is, never swerve from your loyalty to the nail-brush, never let the penknife approach your nails for the purpose of cleaning them; when you do so your troubles begin. There is a little space between the finger tip and the free edge of the nail, and it is on the absolute cleanliness of this little space that the beauty or otherwise of the nail depends; now, the smaller and shallower that space is, the less easily does it allow dust or dirt of any kind to lodge in it. If you pass a penknife under the free edge of your nail, the probability is that you roughen the under surface of the nail, and the certainty is that you deepen the little space between the nail and finger. The nail-brush, however, cleans the little space without enlarging it or injuring the nail. Never forget this, as—in England at any rate—a good deal depends on it.

For the information of those of my girl readers who may not already know it, I will say that that part of the nail which is concealed in a groove by the skin is called the "root," the uncovered part is termed "the body" of the nail, and its termination "the free edge."

Every one of my readers must have noticed near the root a somewhat semicircular white patch in the nail; this is called very suitably the "lunula" (Lat. "little moon").

Let us now, having described roughly the nail, take a microscopic view of the state of things in its construction. Look at Fig. 1; here you see a section, including the nail and the subjacent part in which it lies. Here we have a corium (A) just as we have in ordinary skin, but the upper strata of epithelium are much hardened and condensed, and go to form the nail proper. The part of the corium in which the nail lies is naturally called its "bed," and the part of the corium which generates the nail is called the "matrix." The nail really consists of solidified epithelium, which is always being ultimately thrown off and replaced from behind.

The "matrix," if uninjured, has a wonderful power of reproducing a nail; and if through any misfortune a person loses his or her whole nail, as may result from a severe pinch, provided the "matrix" remains, he or she will have a new nail in the course of time. I daresay many of you have noticed, if you have injured a nail in any way, that the spot which bears the mark of injury gradually works its way to the surface, and at the end of a few weeks is at the "free edge" of the nail. It may be interesting to note that the average growth of a nail is 1-32nd of an inch in a week. One observer called Berthold found out some curious facts about the growth of the nails, amongst which were the following.

Nails grow rather more quickly in summer

FIG. 5. (a) HAIR. (b) HAIR-FOLLICLE.
(c) SEBACEOUS GLAND.

than in winter, and in the right hand than in the left; of the fingers the quickest growing nail was that on the middle finger, the slowest the nail of the thumb. From these facts the girl with a mathematical turn of mind will readily be able to calculate the time necessary to reach a standard of excellence in beauty in China. Our readers will see a curious picture of "A Chinese gentleman with long nails," on page 84, vol. i., G.O.P.

If you take your specimen of skin, and look carefully through it, your attention will almost certainly be arrested by the presence of one or more hairs which show their extremities at the surface. If you now focus a hair carefully, you will see that it consists of various parts. Raise the lens of the microscope till you can only just dimly make out the hair, you will then by slowly lowering the lens have an opportunity of seeing the surface of the hair, which will be the first part to come into focus; the appearance presented will be much the same as that portrayed in Fig. 2A, i.e., a number of scales like those on the skin of a fish; and indeed this part of the hair is called the skin of it, or "hair cuticle." Now focus down still further, and you will look deeper into the hair; this process of focussing deeper parts is called "optical section"; by this means you will realise that the hair is mainly made up of a fibrous substance which is faintly striated in a longitudinal direction, this part is called the "fibrous substance" of the hair, and in dark hairs especially is permeated with a colouring matter called "hair pigment." If the hair be a large one, you will find yet another structure forming the central part of the hair, and this is called the "hair-pith," or "hair-medulla"; this part, however, is not present in young small hairs, only in large hairs. This, then, is a general survey of the "stem" of the hair; the stem is that part which is above the surface, and it tapers gradually to the "point."

But a very important part of the hair remains for examination; that is the part which is below the surface, and which is called the "root." This terminates, as you see in Fig. 3, in a rounded extremity, which is embraced by the surrounding structures, and which itself receives a little conical elevation into its interior from below; the extremity of the hair is called the "hair-nob," the conical elevation is called the "hair papilla."

If you look at Fig. 3 you will see that the hair is received in a sort of fold, made for it in the skin; this fold constitutes the hair-follicle. The inner part of this hair-follicle is of the same construction as the Rete Malpighii of ordinary skin, the outer part is simply corium. The "papilla" is merely an ordinary cutaneous papilla, such as we have studied in skin; and in animals such as cats, who have tactile hairs, this papilla is very evident, and is remarkably well supplied with nerve fibres. From this papilla the hair grows and gets its nourishment.

As to other structures which one may see in skin, Figs. 4 and 5 show roughly their structure; they are both what are termed "glands." Fig. 4 shows a "sweat gland," i.e., an organ which secretes "the perspiration." Fig. 5 shows a sebaceous gland, which secretes a kind of natural oil for the hair; when one of these latter organs gets blocked it gives rise to one of those little nuisances called "comedones," of which Medicus has told you; so that you see there is a great deal to be seen in and learnt from a specimen of skin; and when you see the beauty and elegance of the structure of that skin, does it not prompt you to bestow all care and attention on one of the most beautiful blessings the great Creator has given you?

VARIETIES.

THE PICTURE AND THE ORIGINAL.

The question has been often asked whether painters should represent the persons who sit to them adorned with more charms than they really possess? The following anecdote may serve as an answer.

A young man in a country district of France received the picture of the lady whom his friends had destined for his future wife. Struck with the beauties which the portrait presented to his eyes, he hastened immediately to Paris, to see the enchanting original. He found, however, on arriving that the young lady was void of every grace, in short painfully plain-looking.

For that reason he wished to withdraw his pretensions. The parents of the lady became indignant, and pressed him to perform his promise.

"I will marry the picture you sent me, with all my heart," replied the disappointed swain.

CONTENTMENT, BUT NOT SLOTH.—Contentment is a good thing until it reaches the point where it sits in the shade and lets the weeds grow.

PROFITLESS.—What shall it profit anyone if she discover the origin of species and know exactly how earth worms and sundews conduct themselves, if all the while she grow blind to the loveliness of nature, and is unable to lift her soul to the Divine and Eternal?

BAPTISM IN HELIGOLAND.—A very pretty and interesting custom attends a baptism in Heligoland. While a psalm is being sung, from a side door a procession of little boys and girls troops in and passes in front of the altar. Each carries a little cup or pannikin of water, and pours the contents into the baptismal font. Thus the child's kindred and future playmates contribute the water with which it is admitted into the church.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SMALL THINGS.—No one need hope to rise above her present situation who suffers small things to pass by unimproved, or who neglects, metaphorically speaking, to pick up a farthing because it is not a shilling.

KIND WORDS.—There are never too many flowers in this world, and not one kind word too many has ever yet been spoken.

A PRUDENT ANSWER.

A little girl in Manchester had been corrected by a mild punishment, and was asked if she would do as her parents wanted her to in the future.

"Yes," replied the penitent, "but you mustn't ask me to do anything I don't want to do."

PRAY ALWAYS.—She prays without ceasing who suitably unites prayer with action: for active duty is an integral part of prayer. The whole life should express "Our Father who art in heaven."

HOW TO FIND OUT A PERSON'S AGE.

The age of any person and the month in which she was born may be found out as follows:—

Ask her to take a piece of paper and write so that you cannot see what she sets down. Then say, "Write down the number of the month in which you were born, multiply it by 2, add 5 to the sum, multiply the total now by 50, add your age to the result; then deduct 365, and after doing that add 115. Now tell me the answer." The answer will be in three or four figures. Of these the last two indicate the age, and the figure or figures preceding these the month in which she was born.

Suppose she is 17 years old and was born in May, the calculation will stand thus: $5 \times 2 = 10$, $+ 5 = 15$, $\times 50 = 750$, $+ 17 = 767$, $- 365 = 402$, $+ 115 = 517$. Here 5 indicates the number of the month of May, and 17 the age.

MURDER WILL OUT.

"I remember," says the famous Lord Eldon, "in one case where I was counsel, for a long time the evidence did not seem to touch the prisoner at all, and he looked about him with the most perfect unconcern, seeming to think himself quite safe. At last the surgeon was called, who stated that the murdered man had been killed by a shot, a gunshot in the head, and he produced the matted hair and stuff cut from and taken out of the wound. It was all hardened with blood. A basin of warm water was brought into court, and as the blood was gradually softened a piece of printed paper appeared, the wadding of the gun, and this proved to be the half of a ballad. The other half had been found in the pocket of the prisoner when he was taken. He was hanged."

PRUDENT COUNSEL.—No one can hurry through early and middle life, filling her days with exciting work, and much of her nights with exciting pleasures, and hope to enjoy a vigorous and valuable old age. Moderation, temperance, a calm mind, and an unburdened conscience are the first essentials.

HOW TO OVERCOME SIN.—Sin is to be overcome not so much by maintaining a direct opposition to it as by cultivating the opposite principle.

"THE LIGHT FELL WHITE AND PITILESSLY ON A WOMAN'S FACE."

KATIE AND ANNIE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM COWAN, M.A.

I KNOW them and love them, and tell
Of their goodness wherever I go;
And all in the parish as well
The squire's two fair daughters well know.
They live to do good, and to cheer
Lives lonely and sad in their gloom,
To weep with them sympathy's tear,
And tell of the sorrowless home.

To the young they are idols of love,
In the school, in the playground, and hall,
So brightly amongst them they move,
With a smile and kind word for them all.
And the old at their coming rejoice,
For sunshine encircles their way,
And whisper with quivering voice—
"May blessings go with them each day."

In the life which they live, lives their creed—
No mere "form of words," howe'er true—
Trust in God, love of man, and the deed
Which the generous soul loves to do;
Self-forgetting their service of love,
Their thought only how to please God,
And so blest and blessing they move,
Unresting o'er life's dusty road.

Dear girls, your ambition be this,
As through life you move joyously on,
To do good, and shed some rays of bliss
Into hearts that are dreary and lone.
There are many around who but wait
For the touch of love's finger to rise
From earth's sin and defilement and fret,
To the brightness and calm of the skies.

FOR THE KING'S SAKE.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

BY LADY MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Bessie's Sacrifice."

CHAPTER VIII.

THROUGH the length and breadth of Bartonshire fresh rumours began to arise, rumours that kept everyone on the alert and made tongues wag eagerly, half in excitement, half in terror. People said that Captain Bob, the boldest, most daring gentleman of the road that had ever travelled for the King beyond the sea, had been seen again, that he had made a daring onslaught on a party of travellers, and had this time taken from them a large sum of money.

The usual exaggeration was afloat; the stories grew and grew till the consternation in the neighbourhood amounted to panic. It was further rumoured that John Mowbray was losing the nerve that had stood him in such good stead for many years of cunning espionage, and that such was the dread that the very name of Captain Bob inspired that he dared not proceed to London with the papers he had collected.

Sir Michael heard it all, but paid not overmuch heed; he knew better, he knew that the gallant young leader's short stormy career was over, that somewhere, he knew not where, he was lying deep in mother earth, and his twin-sister was breaking her heart for lack of him. Some spurious impostor had no doubt arisen, probably one of his old followers who knew his ways, and the trick of his manner and dress, even to the short black plume that always marked his hat.

He took every precaution in his power to prevent the rumour from reaching the ears of his wife, but in vain.

One day when Sir Michael was sitting as usual with his sad eyes resting on Eleanor, she half rose on her couch suddenly, and said—

"What are they saying about him? I heard my nurse last night when she thought I was asleep; they spoke of Captain Bob."

"She must be admonished not to speak so loud," said Sir Michael, severely.

"But what was it? What do they say?" cried Eleanor, feverishly.

"The old panic has revived again; someone is doubtless personating him who is no more. Let it rest, sweet-heart."

"And this pretender, what do they say of him?" she asked, eagerly.

"What has he done?"

"He has succeeded in one bold attempt. John Mowbray has lost his nerve, he moves nowhere but with an escort; he is a special object of distrust just now to all the gentlemen who still have a leaning to the old cause. However, knowing the truth, I will not give in to his fears. On his ride to London to-morrow night I shall but allow him two men; it is a foolish terror. Dead men cannot return."

He spoke hastily, but started at the effect of his words on Eleanor; she sat up, the colour glowing in her cheeks.

"For a good cause," she cried, "the dead have indeed sometimes come back."

Sir Michael was startled by his wife's strange words, and for the first time a thrill of suspicion passed through him. Was she deceiving him? Was it all a lie to account for the strange plight in which he had found her on that miserable night? Was her brother alive? and did she know it?"

For an instant his gentleness forsook him, and he seized her arm in a grip of steel.

"Woman!" he exclaimed, "was it all a lie? I insist upon the truth."

She gave a faint cry, and the tears poured down her cheeks.

"Why do you hurt me so?" she cried. "Is it not enough that I have lost him? Why do you drive home the steel? Robbie is dead—dead! Would God this life were over for me, too!"

He was on his knees, passionately kissing the white arm his fingers had pressed so harshly, and pouring out broken words of love and remorse.

She seemed exhausted, and before long he went away, torn with regret for having wounded her, and with a kind of passionate rebellion in his breast against the fate which ever seemed to stand betwixt himself and his suffering wife.

The days passed and nothing was heard of Captain Bob. John Mowbray, who, with timidity quite new to him, had postponed his journey from day to day, at last mustered up courage to set out.

The time was kept a secret from everyone except Sir Michael, who ordered out two armed men to act as his escort, and mounted them from his own stables.

John Mowbray was to travel by night, and as the night drew on, a stern resolution came upon Sir Michael Newport. He thought of the little party of three men riding through the dark, over-shadowed road in Black Jan Wood, and a conviction came upon him that there would occur a fight for life and death, for the outlaws seemed to possess most strange and unaccountable knowledge of every movement of John Mowbray's.

Sir Michael took with him four or five men, mounted and armed, and rode out in all authority of the law to guard the king's highway.

It was a moonlight night, not clear and brilliant, but over-cast and stormy; the pale moon sailed through mighty banks of clouds, now emerging suddenly in a burst of wild, white light, now passing fretfully out of sight, leaving the world in darkness.

Black Jan Wood was thick with foliage; the leaves rustled and whispered together; the silence was so profound that at a great distance could be heard the measured trot of the travellers approaching and the champ of their horses' bits.

They rode in absolute silence, the three men close abreast, going at a good round trot, with right hand each on the pistol at the holster of his saddle, and with watchful, wary eyes peering into the dense thickets on all sides.

The moon passed behind a cloud; it was very dark, so dark that the three men drew rein to ride more cautiously, when suddenly, with a rush as if of a whirlwind, they found themselves attacked.

It was too dark to distinguish the number of their assailants, and the rapidity of the onslaught gave no time. John Mowbray's horse lay weltering in his blood, and two dismounted men were fighting over his body.

The struggle waxed fiercer; this would be no easy victory for the gentlemen of the road; both assailants and assailed were desperate.

Now, full on the ear came the measured tread of disciplined men, a hoarse voice shouted "In the King's name!" and Sir Michael Newport and his men rode up at full trot.

The outlaws saw themselves surrounded, but they fought on as men only fight when hope is extinct.

At the very moment of his triumph a cold fear was in Sir Michael's heart. What if after all his terrible suspicion should be justified, and Captain Bob yet lived! How could he face his wife with her brother's blood upon his hands?

Duty first, the duty that he owed to his country and her laws, he would not allow himself to pause or think.

The moon came out once more, and poured her light on men struggling for dear life. Sir Michael's eyes lit on one of them, a slender figure closely masked; he saw that on his hat he wore the short black plume of Captain Bob.

"God help me!" he cried, with a bitter groan as he fired and shot him through the heart. One bound, not a sigh, not a gasp—the pistol had done its work surely.

Sir Michael returned it to his saddle-bow, and sat grimly waiting on his horse till the mêlée should be at an end.

It was over; two shot, two fled; the still, slender form lying flat on the sward, with one hand thrown outwards from which the pistol had dropped, was the body of the leader who had been the terror of the roads.

They would have shown it no tenderness, would have torn off the mask relentlessly, had not Sir Michael interposed.

"Be gentle," he said, hoarsely. "He was a gallant fellow; perhaps some spark of life yet lingers."

"Better not," growled John Mowbray, fiercely. "If you feel compassion for him, the pistol is kinder than the cord."

Sir Michael did not answer; he was off his horse, and was kneeling now beside the dead man.

The moon shone out brilliantly, remorselessly; the clouds rolled away in two great curtains, parting right and left; the light was strong, implacable, stern as truth.

Sir Michael on his knees undid the dead man's mask, shrinking from the blood that stained his hand. The ribbon was twice knotted, and he was uncertain in his movements; he stooped and cut it; the ribbon divided and a mass of long dark hair fell loosened on his hands. Shuddering, he shrank back on his knees.

All the spectators had gathered round, struck with awe. No one spoke, only Sir Michael breathed heavily like a man hissing through his teeth. The long hair hung about his hands, he could not disentangle it.

John Mowbray did not understand, but he felt some instinctive deep compassion; he stooped forward and with a reverent hand drew off the mask.

Then all drew back with a muffled cry, for the light fell white and pitilessly on a woman's face. Only Sir Michael fell forwards, face downwards, on the body of his wife.

POETS OVER-SEA.

A GOSSIP ON THE RECENT POETRY OF AMERICA.

By GLEESON WHITE, Author of "Some Poetry we Read," "Ballades and Rondeaux," etc.

PART II.

THE YOUNGER MEN.

ALTHOUGH in the previous chapter full apology was offered for its desultory arrangement and arbitrary quotation from the authors noted therein, yet before proceeding to glance at the work of the younger men in the same fashion, it is needful to reiterate the purport of this gossip. In selecting names to be included, a certain number chose themselves, as it were, and could not be omitted. But of the crowd of those termed "Minor Poets," whether that disdainful adjective applies to the quality or quantity of their work, there is little definite reason to offer in explanation of the choice of one in preference to another. Accident and opportunity, the parents of so many events in this world, must be responsible for this selection. The easy refuge of alphabetical sequence too lightly scorned before, is now welcomed, for the schools into which the groups must otherwise have been sorted so interlace and subdivide, that in the limited space no such classification seemed practicable. The extracts quoted, however, are by no means at haphazard, but the result of some years of study of the volumes; yet it dare not be claimed that they are in each case the best example of the poet, or the finest specimen of his work; all sorts of reasons, the mechanical limits of the space required (for it was held best to show a complete poem rather than extracts deprived of their context), being powerful factors in the choice. Again, in the columns of a journal devoted to home-life, many subjects admissible enough in the general reading of the day were not quite in harmony with its mission.

These reservations are stated in justice to the authors represented, all of whom have given me the most helpful aid in the matter, so that the inadequate fulfilment of a scheme that involved years of preparatory work must be blamed to the writer, not to his subject.

The in-gathering here makes a poor show when the mighty crop to be reaped is considered; but the field is very wide and the granary all too small for even the choicest ears of that vast harvest, and the reaper knows only too well how scanty the results of his store.

The definite purpose being to include only the less known men, Holmes, Lowell, Whittier, and the rest of those who are as household words, were at once set aside, otherwise the space would have been filled by the first half-dozen. Mr. E. C. Stedman's "Poets of America" (Chatto and Windus, 1885) gives a very full account of these, and a list well nigh exhaustive of the minor poets. From this book the date of birth following the author's name has in each case been taken. Had space allowed, a short biography of each would have been interesting, especially would it have been valuable in judging how far the habitat of the poet's home influenced his work. For America is not, as we sometimes think and speak of it, all New York and Boston. Nor is its literary outpour from those two centres alone, any more than London and Edinburgh are our only sources of book production. In a country spreading from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and almost from the Tropics to the North Pole itself, the locality of each poet might be expected to influence his work more definitely, than the evidence the majority of the poems actually prove.

It is rather to be suspected that the poet's true influence is the work of former singers, and that his study is not dissimilar wherever the English tongue is spoken. It would be hard to say that the want of local colour forbids the poetry itself to be ranked as pure inspiration, since the work of so many great men is full of subtle and open allusions to their surroundings. The truth is, probably, that the Anglo-Saxon character is much the same everywhere; the mere introduction of whip-poor-will, or katydid, in place of English wild birds, is not enough to change the song into an exotic melody. The evidence of loyalty to the poets we enshrine as our greatest is rather another proof of the intimate relationship between the old country and its cousins over sea. In face of the fellowship and brotherhood, that in all its literature shows a mood responsive to our own, and a heart that is moved by just the same feelings, and has its standard of right and wrong identical with our own, a happy omen of the united future of the whole English-speaking race may be found. Dreamers, poets, and such feeble folk have a knack of swaying the destiny of nations, in spite of statesmen and armies, and if the great band of those who write and sing are true to a common purpose and work side by side, the most brilliant future for the whole world may be found in the onward march of the two great divisions who speak our common tongue.

But to proceed to the subject. The first on the list of those to be noticed is Aldrich. Yet, to include Thomas Bailey Aldrich among either the "younger men" or the "minor poets" of America would be absurd. For, although born in 1836, and still, as his friend Edmund Clarence Stedman, the poet and historian par excellence of poets, phrases it, "in his sunny prime," his reputation is not young; for years past his poetry has been published and loved in England. Still less could he be accounted a minor poet. His works may be small, but they are little masterpieces. Like one who fashioned a Greek gem, he brings to an intaglio of exquisite finish all the best qualities of colossal work. Within his self-prescribed limits the ideas and thoughts are as large and the execution as free as though an epic were being wrought. Yet with rare lyrical faculty and exquisite restraint he obtains "infinite riches in small room." His "Thirty-two Lyrics and Twelve Sonnets" (Sampson Low, 1881) might be each quoted in proof of this assertion, and one is included in defence, should it be needed, of the praise that is ungrudgingly bestowed on his work by all who are familiar with it.

IDENTITY.

Somewhere—in desolate wind-swept space—
In Twilight land—in No-man's land—
Two hurrying Shapes met face to face,
And bade each other stand.

"And who are you?" cried one, agape,
Shuddering in the gloaming light.
"I know not," said the second Shape,
"I only died last night!"

Oscar Fay Adams, the author of handbooks to English and American poetry, and editor of a delightful series of booklets, "Through the Year with the Poets," is also familiar as a frequent contributor to those Transatlantic magazines that are in every English home. His one volume yet published, "Poet Laureate Idylls," takes the stories of the old nursery rhymes, and re-tells them in happy imitation of the cadences of Tennyson. These are gracefully wrought and entirely charming, but too lengthy for quotation. From a group of sonnets and lyrics in the same work a dozen might be culled, yet one must suffice—a rondeau that has graver thought within its bonds than most rondeau writers attempt, although it has no hint of the humour and fancy of the lighter work of the pieces that entitle the book.

WITH A PRAYER BOOK.

In Common Prayer our hearts ascend
To that white throne where angels bend.
Now grant, O Lord, that those who call Themselves by Thy dear name may all Show forth Thy praise in lives that tend
To noble purpose, lofty end,
And unto us Thy blessing lend,
As low upon our knees we fall
In Common Prayer.

In this dear book past ages blend
Their voice with ours; we do commend
Our souls, in doubt and sin held thrall,
To His fond care, and cot and hall Alike to him petitions send
In Common Prayer.

Mr. Oscar Fay Adams must not be confused with Charles Follen Adams, the author of "Leetle Yawcob Strauss," and "Dialect Ballads," that by their homely pathos and quaint humour have won friends all over the world. They are hardly within the limits of this chapter, discursive and catholic though it be. But for lovers of cleverly reproduced dialect, and the fun of homely life, they are, in their way, worthy of very high praise.

The two volumes, "Berries from the Briar" and "Sonnets in Shadow," by Arlo Bates, are marked by many of the characteristics of the best modern work. Each number has its central idea, and the thought is expressed in cleanly wrought, delicate lines; they are perfectly successful so far as they essay; and in this hurried, overloaded day there is need for such easily-grasped poems, in place of the dull epic or long-spun ode of an earlier fashion. The danger is that the public who judge by mere quantity of material may not observe the excellence of the work of this school of poets, whose aim is to give a complete work of art in a tiny space. Here is a little "impression" that surely has the light and colour of nature with a human touch that makes it no mere instantaneous photograph, but a poem.

A WINDY DAY.

As silver 'neath the smith's quick beat
Gleam the reflections in the bay,
Pale, trampled fires that have no heat
By the wind crushed from gold to gray.

The volume, "Sonnets in Shadow," contains a stately sequence of sonnets that are in memory of a lost one, and, in their sad despairing sorrow recall Tennyson's "In Memoriam," but the gloom of this poem is almost unpierced by the hope that lights the earlier elegy. To extract one from its rightful place would fail to do justice to the well-thought-out plan of the whole group. Yet since Mr. Bates uses the sonnet form so frequently, here is an example from his "Berries of the Briar."

CONTENT.

Contented lie the noontime resting herd;
Content are dotards, nodding heads of snow;
Content are prattling babes, too young to know
The hopes by which the mother's heart is stirred.
But strong men, fired with zeal unswerving, gird
Their loins with patience, and to battle go;
Their souls with yearning filled, little they know
Of lotus-fed content! The soaring bird
Sees still new deeps above, and longing sends
Her song aspiring toward those loftier skies
She may not reach; and heroes, unto ends
Beyond attaining, strive with eager eyes
In godlike effort that as far transcends
Poor dull content as heaven an earthly prize.

The one volume of collected poems by H. C. Bunner ("Airs from Arcady," Charles Scribner & Sons, 1884) has found an English edition, but is yet not so well known as it deserves to be, although, thanks to the inconsistency of international copyright, much of it has been familiar in the corners of our provincial newspapers and journals that exist for the sake of collecting the flotsam and jetsam cast on the shores by the great ocean of literature.

The poems are lightly touched, and have a vein of bright humour that is distinctly original, and well within the limits of the most rigorously exact taste. Like all true humorists, the singer has pathos in equal degree, and to quote but the one side of his verse is hardly fair. Yet while many are sad in this world, and can convey their sadness in expressive lines, it is given to fewer to be able to impart their humour in as scholarly a fashion. And just because the refined fancy and fun that infuses Mr. Bunner's rhymes is so far beyond the highest average, some of it must be quoted in proof of the bold assertion.

CANDOR.

(October.—A Wood.)

"I know what you are going to say," she said;
And she stood up, looking uncommonly tall.
"You are going to speak of the hectic Fall,
And say you're sorry the summer's dead,
And no other summer was like it, you know,
And can I imagine what made it so.
Now, aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," I said.

"I know what you are going to say," she said.
"You are going to ask if I forget
That day in June when the woods were wet,
And you carried me"—here she dropped her head—
"Over the creek; you are going to say,
Do I remember that horrid day.
Now, aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," I said.

"I know what you're going to say," she said,
"You are going to say that since that time
You have rather tended to run in rhyme,
And"—her clear glance fell, and her cheek grew red—
"And have I noticed your tone was queer?
Why, everybody has seen it here!—
Now, aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," I said.

"I know what you're going to say," I said;
"You're going to say, you've been much annoyed,
And I'm short of tact—you will say devoid—
And I'm clumsy and awkward, and call me Ted,
And I bear abuse like a dear old lamb,
And you'll have me, anyway, just as I am.
Now, aren't you, honestly?" "Ye-es," she said.

The volume has some charming examples of rondels and other forms; some very dainty pathetic verse of an exceedingly high order. Among its lighter things in "The Wail of the Personally Conducted," a very clever burlesque in an exceedingly difficult rhythm, are some extremely happy stanzas that plead for quotation.

Integral were we in our old existence,
Separate beings, individually;
Now are our entities, blended, fused, and founded—
We are one person.

We are not mortals, we are not celestials,
We are not birds, the upper ether cleaving;
We are a retrogression toward the monad—
We are Cook's Tourists.

All ways we follow him who holds the guide book,
All things we look at with bedazzled optics;
Sad are our hearts, because the vulgar rabble

Call us the Cookies.

* * * * *

Mr. Bunner's tour de force of the Chant Royal, "Mrs. Jones" is an unparalleled flight in modern burlesque art, and may outlive even the historic form it parodies—possibly hand down the legend of its existence to antiquarians of the remote future.

In "The King's Garden," by James Berry Bensell (Lothrop), there are some poems notable for their fancy, and instinct with the subtle essence of true poetry; but although the initial poem, and others—"The Statue in the Wood," "About Myself"—might well be quoted here, inexorable restrictions of space forbid. So, too, of "Clover Leaves," by Ella Baker, a posthumous volume of collected verse, with much of the fervour and graceful feeling that have made Miss Havergal's poetry so popular; yet it is hardly correct to attribute such a result to the poet's art alone, for when a subject dear to the writer and reader is set forth in easy lines, the art is overlooked, and the subject alone fascinates readers who do not analyse the source of their emotions.

"Point Lace and Diamonds," by George A. Baker, jun., is, as its name suggests, a volume of lighter verse, done in neat graceful way with much of the local colour required by vers de société. As an example of a happy treatment of a subject that might in its handling easily offend the prejudice of worthy people, the following may be quoted as characteristic of the author's work, which it may be said is more distinctly American in its tone than many others of the same school; its slang is the slang of the States, and its society allusions redolent of customs and fashions that we only know by hearsay.

THOUGHTS ON THE COMMANDMENTS.

Love your neighbour as yourself,
So the parson preaches;
That's one-half the Decalogue
So the Prayer Book teaches.

Half my duty I can do
With but little labour,
For with all my heart and soul
I do love my neighbour.

Mighty little credit then
To my self-denial;
Not to love her, though, might be Something of a trial.
Why, the rosy light that peeps
Through the glass above her Lingers round her lips:—you see E'en the sunbeams love her.

So to make my merit more,
I'll go beyond the letter;
Love my neighbour as myself?
Yes, and ten times better.
For she's sweeter than the breath
Of the Spring, that passes
Through the fragrant, budding woods,
O'er the meadow grasses.

And I've preached the word, I know,
For it was my duty
To convert the stubborn heart
Of the little beauty.
Once again success has crowned
Missionary labour,
For her sweet eyes own that she
Also loves her neighbour.

John Vance Cheney (1840) is a familiar signature to dainty poems in the American magazines. In his volume, "Thistle Drift," there are many lyrics felicitously turned, and spontaneous in their clear, easy expression, Light as the thistle drift he so aptly christens them they are, but the art is there although concealed. There are a dozen that might be quoted, any one of which would show the same careless grace and facile movement. "The Way of It" has a delicious lilt in it, that yearns for musical setting; and one a shade more serious, showing how a new treatment of a theme so well worn as "The Arrow and the Song" may yet shape a distinctly fresh lyric.

THE WAY OF IT.

The wind is awake; little leaves, little leaves, Heed not what he says—he deceives, he deceives;

Over and over
To the lowly clover
He has lisped the same love (and forgotten it, too)
That he'll soon be lisping and pledging to you.

The boy is abroad; dainty maid, dainty maid,
Beware his soft words—I'm afraid, I'm afraid,
He's said them before
Times many a score

Ay, he died for a dozen ere his beard pricked through,
As he'll soon be dying, my pretty, for you.

The way of the boy is the way of the wind;
As light as the leaves is dainty maid-kind;
One to deceive
And one to believe,
That is the way of it year by year,
But I know you will learn it too late, my dear.

THE LOST SONG.

Upon a summer day
I sang a little song,
And something soft did say,
"It won't, it won't go wrong."

I sang it high and clear,
Right cheery to the last;
But freighted with a tear,
It down the summer passed.

I sang it brave and loud,
The tear quenched not its flame;
'Twas caroled to the crowd
In long applause of fame.

Now many years had gone,
The heralds went and came;
Alas! it was not on
The mighty wings of fame.

"Well, let it go," I said,
"The idle little song;
The tear was foolish shed—
It did, it did go wrong."

Then, sweet with love's own art,
A mother sang and smiled:
She'd kept it in her heart
To sing it to my child.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER III.

FRITILLARY GATHERING. KITTY LEARNS BETIMES THE SERIOUSNESS OF LIFE.

THE years which were so full of growing excitement and coming strife to the English nation passed gently over Kitty Dacre in the calm retreat of Oriel, and changed her from a child of ten to a girl between fourteen and fifteen. Her father never talked, if he could help it, on the political troubles which already had the country in their grip, and least of all would he have dreamt of speaking of them to Kitty, as has been seen.

Mrs. Judy, if she attended to much beyond her household economy, did not confide what rough inking she had of the brewing storm to her charge.

Lady Ottery, taught by bitter experience, was equally reticent.

Nay, "Jackie," who had attained the promotion of becoming, after the example of his cousin Anthony Walton, of Islip Barnes, who was as much older than John Dacre as John was older than his sister Kitty, a demy or scholar of Magdalen College, had suddenly developed a similar silence. Yet the subject on which he was silent unquestionably deeply interested and rent into two opposing parties all the young scholars of Oxford of the time, just as it kept surging up in the minds of the greater proportion of their seniors, engrossing their thoughts to the detriment of art and letters.

The four years difference of age between John and Kitty Dacre had assumed, for the moment, what would probably be the most prominent aspect it would bear throughout their lives. For when is there a greater gap between a boy and a girl than when a boy is an intelligent, precocious lad between eighteen and nineteen, fired with the desire to assert his independence of thought, and claim his heritage of action, and the girl has not long entered her teens, is kept back by the retirement and subjection in which she has lived, and finds her daily tasks and amusements quite sufficient for her latent powers; in short, when she is a docile, simple creature, if neither silly nor trifling?

Somehow Kitty and her old Jackie, whom she was tutoring her tongue to style Jack or John, had slipped a little apart, and she was conscious, with a dull pain at her contented, cheerful, yet most affectionate heart, that they were not so much to each other as they had been. This was not merely because they no longer lived in the same house, as Kitty sometimes tried to tell herself, for not even when they met, which of course was frequently, did her brother tell her his stories as he used to do, or find leisure to listen to her stories in return. He did not fail in kindness, but he was more or less occupied with his books or his college friends, which after all was natural enough, if Kitty had understood human nature. It seemed as if he preferred their cousin Anthony, a young man of two and twenty, to whom Jack Dacre had attached himself with the enthusiastic regard which some lads feel for their chum, or mate, among their school or college companions.

Kitty did not like to be superseded in her brother's friendship even by their cousin Anthony. She was hurt, and inclined in consequence to look coldly on Anthony, though the eclipse which she had suffered might be no fault of his. But she did not yield to her indignation more than she could help. She even tried to be satisfied when she heard her father praise Jack's diligence at his books, commend his gravity for his age, and say that he owed some of his steadiness and industry to Anthony Walton, who was a sensible fellow, and a zealous, indefatigable student.

What appeared to Kitty to be the greatest work of the last year was the rebuilding of Oriel, with its ogee battlements and square tower.

A pleasant custom which still survives at Oxford was already in force when Kitty Dacre was growing up. It was the gathering baskets full of the dusky crimson and white fritillaries or snake's-head lilies, which are largely peculiar to the meadows, and in their subtle beauty not without a mysticism of its own, exert a fascination over their spoilers.

Kitty was gathering fritillaries in the Merton meadows on a sweet spring day in 1640. She was not alone, of course, for in spite of all the chancellor's efforts, Oxford was still too much beset by idle evil-doers, dissolute refractory students, and their hangers-on at the colleges, tramps, disbanded straggling soldiers, for any young maid of Kitty's degree to be suffered to venture so far afield unattended. She was accompanied by her two cousins, Prissy and Alice Walton, sisters of Anthony Walton, from Islip Barnes, while a man-servant, whom the Waltons had brought with them into Oxford, kept at a respectful distance behind the girls as they filled their baskets.

Kitty had learnt to love her cousins like elder sisters in those visits to Islip Barnes, where she was made much of by them, and duly introduced to the denizens of the stable, the cow-house, and the poultry-yard. Prissy and Alice, rather than their half-invalid mother, had tried to teach little Kitty notable country habits and ways. When Jackie would attend Anthony to the harvest field and the barn, the sheep-washing and the horse-shoeing, Kitty would join in the cheese-making, the fruit-picking, the apple-storing, and the pastry-baking. The brother and sister were growing too old for such pursuits to be unmingled delights, and without stopping to ask the reason why, had been less at Islip Barnes during the last year and a half. John Dacre had been elected a demy at Magdalen like Anthony Walton, and dwelt in college. Kitty had been kept, according to Lady Ottery's and Mrs. Judy's sense of propriety, more strictly at her embroidery frame and at the practice of reading the many-volumed French romances aloud to an inattentive listener in the person of Dame Tabitha.

But what did it signify though the dame's wits went wool-gathering and she did not hear, so far as the sense went, a single word of the interminable histories of Cleopâtre or Praximène, when the exercise was solely for the purpose of Kitty's learning to pronounce and understand French, that she might grow up a gently nurtured young lady according to the ideas of the day! For Lady Ottery was determined that her god-daughter should "be bred virtuously, modestly, civilly, and honourably." Dame Tabitha took care that her wits should stay at home when Kitty read her a lesson out of the Bible and the prayer-book, or from one of Dr. Jeremy Taylor's sermons, but it would be a waste of wits to give more heed than was necessary for the sound to the French romances. Still, though Kitty had gone less to Islip Barnes than formerly, she continued to love all the family there with the exception of the delinquent Anthony, who had lost her good graces for the present, and to welcome every occasion like this visit of the Waltons to Oxford, of being with them. Later in the day the girls were to be met by their respective brothers, who knew what was in the wind, but in the meantime they found each other excellent company.

Kitty had no crow to pluck with Prissy and Alice as she had with Anthony. They and their mother were the only near female kindred she had known. The sisters were just the two or three years older than their cousin, which enabled her to look up to them with the respect and admiration which a very young girl feels for nearly grown up companions of her own sex, who are, as she is ready to believe, so much better informed and fitter to act in the world than she is, while they still condescend to receive her into their friendship, and are yet young enough themselves to share her occupations and amusements, and the disproportion of cause and effect in her gladness or sadness—when she is sad. Of the sisters, Kitty was fonder of the elder, Prissy, though she had a big enough heart for both. Alice was certainly the prettier, but there were other people besides Kitty who thought there was something in Prissy's dark-haired, dark-eyed, kindly, intelligent face, granted that the complexion was pale, and the features irregular, like her brother Anthony's, which had an attraction, at least, equal to that of Alice's beauty. Alice had a straight, clearly-cut profile, and a fine colour, which in its owner's private opinion was only too fresh and bright. Alice had a secret hankering after an interesting delicacy of complexion and an equally interesting fragility of constitution, knowing nothing about either, happy girl! She was well-disposed and good-natured, but much more pre-occupied and self-conscious than Prissy, and for that reason just a little silly. She was tempted to cultivate airs and graces, to which her mother was over-indulgent. For Madam Walton was a gentle-natured woman, subdued betimes by her widowed state and by her suffering in reality from those invalid weaknesses which Alice in her ignorance and dash of folly coveted.

Prissy, too, indulged Alice, who was the youngest of the family. It was only her brother who laughed at her and put his foot down relentlessly on her various absurdities.

The Waltons were dressed as became young gentlewomen, the daughters and sisters of squires of a moderate, though not large, estate. In Alice's case there was some little coquetry of ribands and lace, very natural to her sixteen years; but the sisters' toilets were on the whole plainer and graver, with less of the silken embroidery, and nothing of the gold or silver braid which was to be seen on Kitty's dress. For Lady Ottery and Mrs. Judy both entertained a fancy for its being rich in texture and bright in colour. Even Dr. Dacre liked Kitty to be girlishly gay. "I wot my little bird should have as pretty feathers as the other birds," he would say, when his attention was called to the subject. But either because there were two girls instead of one to dress at Islip Barnes, and Madam Walton was a prudent as well as an indulgent mother, or because Prissy's taste insensibly influenced her younger sister's, there was the difference described, which Kitty for one person scarcely noticed in the clothes of the cousins. Kitty could not put less weight on the distinction than Prissy put. Her sweetly serious cast of character, and the degree to which she was engrossed with promoting the happiness of others, left her little inclination or leisure to pay more attention to dress than harmonious suitability and scrupulous neatness required.

The Oxford which existed before the great rebellion was not less beautiful than it is now. Nay, its walls with their occasional bastions, its fortified gates and high narrow bridges, in one or two instances surmounted by bridge-houses—the Grand Pont bearing the old tower known as Friar Bacon's Study—gave it additional quaintness. The many-towered city showed its crowd of stately towers and spires, like trees in a forest, then as now. The square tower of Magdalen beyond the walls, the pinnaled tower of Merton, the crowned twin towers of All Souls, the towers of St. Michael and the Castle, the mass of buildings at Christ Church, the spire of St. Mary the Virgin, were conspicuous.

The heron-haunted Cherwell met the broad sweep of the Isis, and the two rivers more than half girdled the meadows and colleges with their brimming waters. The river walks and groves were already the shadiest and sweetest of scholarly haunts, though the Magdalen walks were yet unmade, and Addison's foot had still to tread them. "The Bonnie Christ Church Bells" were waiting for Big Tom and their poet, but as it was, they broke ever and anon on the stillness.

It was too early in the year for even the first summer outburst of blossoming may and budding roses, and such wealth of greenery as could not be surpassed in England. For all around Oxford the remnants of the great forest in which the town once stood—of which the Nuneham, Blenheim, and Wych Woods, with the Wytham and Bagley Woods are detached fragments—lingered in coppice and hanger, in rows of elms here, and groups of oaks and beeches there, and osier beds every where.

But in anticipation of later May and June, there was perhaps a still tenderer more exquisite light on the powdering of green on bush and tree, with the purple tinge marking the swelling of the bourgeons. There was a like charm in the grass under foot beginning to grow longer and more vivid in its green, as if to hide the swaying golden kingcups, the knots of pale primroses and freckled cowslips, the drooping bells of the dimly-red or greenish-white fritillaries, which the seekers came to find.

"Mother says it is a little like mere gadding to bring the coach into Oxford just to pick a basket full of such useless things as snake's-head lilies. We could have plenty of cowslips for the gathering at home, and after we were tired of looking at the best bunches, we might make the rest into cowslip wine, which would be a useful way of spending our time," said Prissy; she gave a little sigh, in a sensitive conscience's remorse for being so idle and so happy in a world which needed all its work, and was sadly often a suffering world to boot.

"Ay," chimed in Alice, who was a trifle lazy, and inclined to sink down among the fritillaries, doing nothing more than hold a long, slender flower-stalk by the tip and tickle her nose with the bell, while Kitty Dacre was hunting as ardently as ever, and collecting a greater sheaf each moment, "and brother Anthony says we might chance to find fritillaries at Islip if we looked narrowly enough for them; but I know not, and I care not to take the trouble. It is wearisome enough driving over a road that hath not been mended since last spring, without wading through all the boggy places in the meadows at home. Cousin, dost mean to leave one lily for the unfortunate creatures who are to come after us?"

Kitty stopped in consternation.

"Oh! am I taking them all? I did not mean to be greedy. But no, cousin Alice, thou art twitting me for thine own amusement. There are ever so many more yonder, and yonder, and there are heaps just springing. But I am sorry if Aunt Walton grudged your coming, for you know I should not have had you, which is such a pleasure to me, if you had either contented yourselves with cowslips, or found fritillaries out at Islip. It is like cousin Anthony to think of such a thing," she ended, with a sudden flash of hardly-repressed exasperation.

"But mother did not grudge us our visit," interposed Prissy, always the peacemaker, and quick to explain away a misconception. "She never grudges us anything if it be not absolutely wrong, and she wearies to hear news of you and Dr. Dacre."

"And why should it be like Tony to seek to keep us away?" inquired Alice, half inquisitively, half lazily. "Sure he may be glad we've come, for we've brought in such a basket of the best mutton, hams, and cream cheeses, and home-made cakes, as no college cook could think to equal. He and Master Jackie will have a treat; but they don't deserve it if either is so wedded to his books as not to hurry forth to welcome a sight of his kindred."

"The lads will be pleased enough to seek us here," said Prissy, with her pretty sedateness and precocious motherliness, for she was her mother's deputy and the chief housekeeper out at Islip Barnes. "And I writ and promised beforehand that we should go back with them to their rooms and rest and try what they could provide for our entertainment. I hope your father and Mrs. Judy will not expect you back much before supper-time, Kitty, since we went first to your house and paid our respects to our uncle."

In spite of her grievance against her cousin Anthony, Kitty was nothing loth to beat up what was also her brother's quarters at Magdalen, in the privileged company of her cousins Prissy and Alice. She was pleased to spend a merry afternoon among young people like herself, instead of drowsily stitching beside Mrs. Judy, or stumbling through French romances to Lady Ottery.

"It is all so nice," said Prissy, in her thoughtful, half-dreamy way, letting some of the fritillaries drop through her slender fingers as she spoke. "The grass and the water and the sky so clear and warm to-day, and you, Kitty, in the meadows with us, and the happy meeting with our brothers anon. Who would think that the times are so out of joint, and that there are such heavy clouds hanging over this poor country of England, which ought to be happy and prosperous if men would but do their duty?"

"But how are the times out of joint?" asked Kitty, wonderingly. "And what men are refusing to do their duty?"

"Why, cousin Kitty, do you know nought of the troubles that are abroad and are threatening more and more to swallow up all our pleasant days and quiet nights?" questioned Prissy, surprised in her turn. "Maybe thou art full young for such considerations, but Alice here is only two years and I three thy senior."

"And I have heard enough and to spare of tiresome politics," put in Alice, with an assumption of a pout, as she tore a fritillary bell to pieces. "Thou art younger than I, at the same time thou art not a baby neither. There now, have you good people in Oxford not learnt from the news letters that little Princess Mary is to be married in a year's time to her cousin, the Prince of Orange? Fie upon thee, Mrs. Kitty! she is five years younger than thou art; and as for Prissy and me, we are regular old maids beside her, and ought to be leading apes in chains presently. Aren't you interested to hear what the little bride will wear, and how she will behave herself? Will they give her a few pinafores, think you, among her bridal suits?"

"I did hear of that, Alice," Prissy defended herself from the accusation of crass ignorance. "My Lady Ottery did tell me, and I was very entertained and interested. But I agreed with my lady that it was a pity, and a very bad thing for the poor Princess. What sort of wife and helpmeet to a man should I make? So how can a child like her be wise enough to marry?"

"Good lack! an it need such stores of wisdom, then I had better make up my mind to living and dying single," said Alice, in mock humility.

"You are as good as an only child among grown-up people," answered Prissy, still in bewilderment. "And you have always been old-fashioned and noticing. Have you not hearkened to the talk of your father and Lady Ottery?"

Poor Kitty looked as if she had been guilty of heedless omission.

"I never meant not to listen, cousin, when I was by, for sometimes they have sent me out of the way, but I cannot call to mind that they have ever talked of anything lately beyond ordinary talk—what is happening to their friends in Oxford here, and about my lady's leases, or concerning the roguery of her last bailiff, for I am sorry to tell you Giles Crossley hath proved a rogue, though my lady was unwilling to believe it at first. If she speaks of anything further to my father, it is of how she saw things managed in France and the Low Countries when she was in exile with Sir Jasper."

"Ah! then, Kitty, there is much for thee to learn before thou art many years older, which will grieve thee to hear," said Prissy, shaking her womanly head. "Perchance it is kinder to leave you in ignorance."

"No, no," cried Kitty, with all the eager, healthful interest of a child who has been kept out of a secret, with which she has at last an opportunity of becoming acquainted. "Tell me what bad fortune is looked for; unless, indeed, you have been forbidden to speak to me," she added, reluctantly.

"Nobody did tell us to hold our tongues," said Prissy, hesitatingly.

"And they would be very clever an they could make us," put in Alice.

"Be quiet, Alice. You are not doing yourself justice; you know you could be as silent as most, if you thought your speech would bewray your friends," said Prissy, smiling kindly at her sister, as if the two were mother and daughter at least, and not sisters with but a year between them.

"I don't know where to begin, cousin Kitty," went on Prissy. "I am frightened that I may say things which will startle you. People who do know maintain that the King is going beyond his prerogative, and ruling unconstitutionally. They say that the Star Chamber and the Council, which are High Courts up in London, are both abuses that have crept into the Government. Many of the King's true friends and faithful servants as well as his enemies say so, and that he doth quite wrong to assemble Parliaments, and then dismiss them because the members will not vote according to his pleasure, and to levy taxes and exact loans without the consent of the Lords and Commons. He hath also sought to make the Scots worship against their consciences, as he, or my Lord the Archbishop for him, hath tried to force thousands of the English to do ever since the King's accession."

"I thought His Majesty knew best, and that whatever he did was sure to be right," said Kitty, simply.

"Not right if he should break his coronation oath, and violate the law of the country," said Prissy, solemnly.

"But he will not do that," protested Kitty, stoutly; "he will think better of it, and everything will come right forthwith. He is not a wicked tyrant, such as one reads about; everyone says he is good and kind."

"He may think no evil, and yet have bad councillors," said Prissy, shaking her head again. "The Petition of Right to set matters straight hath come to nought. Master Hampden hath been arrested and tried for non-payment of ship-money, which he had no call to pay. If he had been thrown into the Tower like Sir John Eliot, he might have died there. Master Prynne has again been had up for another of his violent books; and, oh, the horror of it, Kitty! he hath had the stumps—all that was left of his poor ears—cut off afresh, been branded on the cheeks with the letters S T., short for 'Seditious Traitor,' been fined anew to his utter impoverishment, and sentenced to lie in prison for the rest of his days."

Kitty stood aghast. She still remembered the terrible tale by which her childish pulses had been stirred, when she heard it incidentally as a running commentary on "the merry play without offence," acted before the King and Queen in the hall of St. John's.

"But the Chancellor will not suffer such cruel deeds to be done again, and the King and everybody will be sorry, and it will all come right soon," persisted Kitty, wistfully.

"Alas, Kitty, my Lord the Archbishop is known to be fully consenting to such work, not because he doth not seek to serve God in his own way, but because he desires uniformity of creed and worship. And my Lord Strafford—didst ever see or hear of him, cousin?" the speaker paused to ascertain.

"Yes," said Kitty, hastily; "he was a swarthy man, who, as I heard tell, only scowled when other people praised the play at St. John's—that grand time the King and Queen were there, you know, Prissy."

"Well, though he spoke powerfully in favour of the Petition of Right when it was first presented, he is all against the Commons now. He hath been sent by the King to meet the Scots, who are up in arms for the defence of their form of the Protestant religion. If he fail to beat them and trample them down as he hath treated the Irish, the whisper goes that his head is not safe on his shoulders. He will be impeached the moment he returns, and men think he will be brought to the block without fail."

"I am very sorry," said Kitty, with scared eyes, "and I spoke ill of the poor gentleman not a moment gone. But it is no business of ours," protested the girl, standing at bay, as it were, in defence of her happy, untroubled girlhood, which was in danger of passing away from her. "Father says we are bound to leave it to those whom it doth concern, and content ourselves with doing our little duty, which is none too easy even for the youngest of us, as Alice and I can testify. It is the King's matter and his Ministers. He loves his people, as nobody will deny, and if he hath made mistakes, or other people have made them for him, he will amend them—trust him for it. Oh, yes, and it will all come right without our troubling our foolish heads, even if father had not laid his charge upon me long ago, not to be meddlesome. It is neither loyal nor safe," insisted Kitty. "Of course we are only girls, and could do nought; it would be a deal worse if we were boys. Still, it do sound hateful and high treasonable, and not in the least like you, cousin Prissy, to speak thus, so, if it please you, we'll have no more on't," ended Kitty, with considerable spirit and independence considering her fourteen years, and her admiration for her cousins, especially Prissy.

"You may say that, Kitty," acquiesced Alice, with a "heigho!" between a sigh and a yawn. "Mind, I believe as I have been taught, and that sister Prissy speaks true, but I don't see that girls who can do nought should mope and run the risk of a fit of the spleen, because men, with Tony and Jack among them, get into scrapes. I daresay, as cousin Kitty thinks, they will scramble out of them again."

"I protest I had no desire to spoil your pleasure," said Prissy, hastily, with the tears coming into her soft, dark eyes; "but I cannot help it. Will it not be our business, everybody's business, saving Dr Dacre's opinion, when our men, our boys, too—Anthony and John among them, as thou sayst—are driven to draw their swords, every man against his neighbour and brother, and to drench England in blood?"

"Oh, that can never be," cried Kitty, shivering, and drawing back appalled. As she did so her glance chanced to fall on some of the fritillary flowers which were past their bloom, and beginning to wither and shrink. She caught the fantastic resemblance to the head of the snake, which gives the plant its popular name. There were the projecting tongue and the fangs, with the quick, stealthy movement, as the wind fluttered the thin petals. The flower looked for a second as if it were a living creature grinning and mocking at her, and Kitty recoiled anew.

"Well," said Alice, speaking in a voice of awe in spite of her late inclination to side with Kitty in making light of Prissy's concern at the signs of the times, "they do say that my Lady Eleanor Davys, who hath the gift of seeing into the future, predicted six years ago that the Queen would have but sixteen more years of greatness and happiness, and that the Lady Eleanor did spy scores and hundreds of men uncoffined, in bloody armour, looking up with unseeing eyes at the sky from trodden-down battlefields, and that not across the sea, but here in England."

"I pay no heed to my Lady Eleanor's ravings," asserted Prissy, with girlish dignity. "It is what I have gathered from the edifying conversation of such scholarly and wise men as brother Anthony bringeth about the house when he is at home. They are all older than he, and some have attained middle life, but they do not despise his youth, or decline to take up with him. There is Master George Wither, who was himself a demy of Magdalen; and little Master Robert Blake, who was of Wadham, which he visits when he can spare time, for he was recalled to Bridgewater to look after his mother's affairs. It was a shame that he had not the Fellowship in Merton for which he tried, but the Warden liked not such little men, as if a man's brains had aught to do with his stature! If he had ever heard Master Blake speak against the national backslidings, he would have known that the little man hath the eye of an eagle and the courage of a lion. Even Master Hampden has deigned to come and see Anthony, though he is a man of far greater estate than ours of Islip Barnes, and he is a distinguished statesman to boot. He is frank and genial in speech, and as it happens, he also was a demy of Magdalen. But mercy on me! What am I doing, mentioning names?" broke off Prissy, in lively distress. "You will forget them, Kitty, for my sake, for all our sakes."

"You have not spoken one name, sister Prissy," Alice interrupted Kitty's willing promise to do her best to forget what she had no mind to remember. In spite of the impression which the last part of the conversation had made on Alice, she could not refrain from a piece of private girlish mischief. "Why not give Frank Windebank's name along with the others? Dost keep it back out of a slight or of a compliment? I warrant he merits mention, for I am certain if it were not for the long, doleful discourses you and he hold together on the unhappy state of the country, you would not take it so much to heart."

Prissy coloured crimson, and was more put out than ever.

"Oh, Alice, how canst thou be so rash," she reproached her sister, "when thou art well aware that Colonel Windebank holds a commission in his Majesty's army, in which he has always comported himself like a gallant soldier and an honest gentleman," she added proudly. "But if the smallest suspicion of disaffection to the Government were to attach to him, not only would his whole prospects be jeopardised, he would be in danger of being tried by court-martial."

"Oh, but Kitty will keep her own counsel," asserted Alice, evidently a little frightened at what she had done. "If she decline to damage the reputation of Master Blake and Master Wither, and her own cousin Tony, she will not, sure, employ herself in blackening the military character of your friend Colonel Windebank."

"Why persist in calling him my friend?" asked Prissy, tremulously.

The situation was getting a little strained, but just then the two brothers arrived and made a welcome diversion.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

FARMER'S DAUGHTER.—We are always happy to answer suitable questions from our girls. Your first step is to apply to the secretary of the Civil Service Commissioners, Westminster, S.W., for the papers issued. Bad spelling is the cause of the failure of the majority of candidates at the preliminary examination. Arithmetic, handwriting, spelling, English composition, geography, and English history are the subjects in which you will have to pass.

MISS FRANCES sent us, some time ago, a request to notice her correspondence classes, connected with her Society for the Study of Algebra, French, and English; and we may observe that prizes are given annually in each department. She must be addressed, "Care of Mr. Howard, 62, Green Lanes, N." From extracts of letters from members of this society it seems to be a popular one.

ISABEL.—Write to our publisher for the illustrated volume brought out by the Religious Tract Society, "The Midnight Sky," price seven shillings and sixpence; he will give you information about the "Handbook of the English Tongue," by Dr. Angus, price five shillings. Ours is the editorial, not the publishing, department.

EARNEST INQUIRER.—We have given a considerable series of articles on good breeding, the "Art of Conversing Agreeably," and how you should conduct yourself under every circumstance of life, and the special duties devolving on you in its various relations; read these. Writing fairly good and legible.

LYDIA.—There are many correspondence classes for preparing students for University exams. For the London University, Cambridge Higher, Durham, etc., write to the secretary, E. S. Weymouth, Esq., 38, Christchurch Road, Brondesbury, N.W. For Newnham College, Cambridge, write to Mrs. Peile, Trumpington, Cambridge. For a similar scheme of instruction by correspondence there are St. George's Hall Oral and Correspondence Classes, giving also assistance in home study to those who do not wish to become candidates for the exams. Apply to Miss M. R. Walker, secretary, St. George's Hall, 7, Randolph Place, Edinburgh. 2. Your English needs attention; for example, in the use of "would" and "should." Also, you confound the conjunctions "if" and "whether"; and again, you cannot say "I am twenty years," nor "I am twelve months," but you may be twenty years of age. We wish you all success, and thank you for your kind letter.

HASSIE.—No hospital would receive you at your age. At the Children's Hospital the age is upwards of twenty-one years; at others the age is twenty-five. Uniform, board, lodging, and washing, together with a small rising salary, are granted from the first at nearly all the hospitals. If you want a little cheap manual to prepare you for such a vocation, you had better obtain one entitled "Sick Nursing at Home" (Upcott Gill, 170, Strand, W.C.).

C. M. R.—No, we do not think you could learn to read the Greek Testament without a master, you having no previous knowledge of the language.

KATHLEEN GRAHAM.—In the first place you are not eligible for admission as a "probationer" (either as lady pupil or ordinary nurse) at your age, nor for five years to come. In the second place, are you planning the leaving of your home with the full sanction of your parents? If not, a little girl of "sixteen," not yet fit to be out of the schoolroom, and dependent on her parents for bread, home, education, and protection, should be ashamed of herself! "Things are not going smoothly" indeed! Probably your parents have had to reprove you. You forget the duty you owe to them.

WORK.

MICROSCOPE will, we fear, be disappointed at the results of our inquiries for her. There is no demand for such drawings unless they be done to illustrate some book or periodical; and the only way of getting such work would be by taking a series of drawings to some London publisher, who is in that line of publishing; or of becoming acquainted with some scientific man, or with a society which would give you such work to do.

DUM SPIRO SPERO writes to say, with reference to answer on page 192, vol. x., that the stalk of the sunflower even may be utilised, as they may be placed, when stripped, in the bed of a running stream, and allowed to remain till the vegetable pulp has partly decayed. This will be accomplished in about a fortnight. The fibrous portion remaining, after being well beaten and cleaned, may be used as a substitute for flax or hemp, in the making of coarse cloths and cordages.

M. H.—We think you must mean the knitted method of doing rugs, patented some time ago, for which you may inquire at any fancy work and wool shop.

ANNIE SAUNDERS.—In sending verses for criticism, writers are required to name their respective ages. This you failed to do, so that we are unable to judge of the merit of yours. At least they are in themselves superior to the great majority sent to us by our correspondents, and the sentiments expressed are fully in accord with our own.

MATILDA.—It is quite impossible for us to suggest a means by which a delicate girl could make money, being utterly ignorant of her acquirements and her family circumstances.

J. R. TAYLOR.—We thank you for giving your experience in regard to certain instruments sold for the use of deaf persons, and they may be glad to have your warning that such appliances are not lent for trial, but must be purchased.

ROSEMARY.—You might give the new-looking brooch an old appearance by having it oxydised, and given a dull grey shade. Ask to see some oxydised silver ornaments, and judge for yourself.

LUCY JORDAN and MOLLY K.—Your respective letters and verses show very good feeling. We thank you both for the former, and regret we cannot avail ourselves of the latter for our magazine.

AN AFFLICTED ONE (General Servant).—We do not recommend you to make the experiment of going through an operation. The chances of success are too few, and injury to both eyes might result, such is the connection and sympathy between them. Some good result may be obtained in very early childhood by putting a bandage over the good eye, and by leaving all the work to the one that is tied; it is forced to turn, and the facility increases with the continual effort. Your letter does you much credit; well expressed, well spelt, and well written.

"MISS E. CORNER."—You need a good tonic; "Coca wine" might do you service, procured at a chemist's. Your health and strength seem generally run down, and you should avoid fatigue. Perhaps magnetic baths might be tried with advantage. Your complaint seems of the same character as that of a friend of ours, and she was told it was temporary paralysis of the glands of the throat, and was ordered champagne. She recovered.

MAUDE and AUGUSTA.—We thank your father for his proposed contribution to the Religious Tract Society. We are pleased with his approval of our paper. The 11th of February fell on a Saturday in 1871.

B. R.—Your cat appears to have the mange. Do not touch her, or you may become mangy yourself. Go to a chemist and ask him what you should give her. If a bad case, you had better pay him to get rid of her for you. MRS. BLANCHARD.—We were much gratified by your very kind letter, and assurance that our paper has been of service in your family. We regret to hear of your husband's serious accident, and trust he may soon recover. The picture would travel safely if a sheet of white paper were laid over the face of it, and on that a piece of flat pasteboard, or the back of an old book, and then all well wrapped up in a piece of brown parcel-paper, and tied. Write "per Parcel Post," and direct to the Editor, "Girl's Own Paper Office," 56, Paternoster Row, London, E.C. No favour will be shown; the best work will win the prizes.

78TH HIGHLANDERS.—We have just given the best advice and prescription we possibly could for the cure of gout. A change of residence might benefit you, especially to the seaside. If you had any seafaring relative who could take you for a voyage, or if you could pay for a long passage out somewhere, and back again, it might be of some use. Look for our answer already given. It is very bad for boys to smoke.

ALINE.—Your question has been so often answered we hesitate to reply again. No; the bride provides nothing. Her father gives her a trousseau, consisting of her own clothing and toilet essentials, either in money or kind; but none of this is designed for the new home. No man has any business to propose to a girl if he have not a suitably furnished home prepared for her reception. It is the custom of the poor but thrifty French peasantry for the woman to provide such house-linen as she can afford to procure, while the man provides furniture and everything else. But this rule does not obtain in England amongst our peasantry, any more than the rule that the husband is selected by the girl's parents, and he himself cannot be legally married without the consent of both his own.

SAMMO may recite any of the poetry published in this magazine. You were right in inquiring.

RULES.

- I. No charge is made for answering questions.*
- II. All correspondents to give initials or pseudonym.*
- III. The Editor reserves the right of declining to reply to any of the questions.*
- IV. No direct answers can be sent by the Editor through the post.*

V. No more than two questions may be asked in one letter, which must be addressed to the Editor of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, 56, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

VI. No addresses of firms, tradesmen, or any other matter of the nature of an advertisement will be inserted.

A WORKER with a great quantity of pieces of silk of the same size, colour, and shape, is advised to purchase several yards of various colours, suitable for mixing with them, and to make a quilt, using the box or some other pattern of the sort. See our article on patchwork, illustrated, at page 207, vol. i.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MURIEL.—Your sister's case is not one either for a lunatic or an idiot asylum. They would make her worse by the surroundings. It would be better to remove with her, say to the sea, under the care of a special "nurse for mental cases," who could be obtained for you by your medical man. She would then have a good prospect of ultimate recovery, when away from all painful associations. Of course we understand that her condition is the result of mental shock from the grievous family affliction, and that there is no disease of the brain.

ELSPETH would find the water employed for washing very much improved and softened by putting a little oatmeal into it.

CHAPTER IX.

WHEN the night was over, and the grey dawn was beginning to break in the eastern sky, they were able to rouse Sir Michael from the terrible lethargy in which he had been kneeling, and take him home. Two men had to walk, one on each side of his horse, for now and then he swayed in the saddle, and would have fallen but for their prompt assistance. But when they reached Beckenham he dismounted without help, and went at once with a firm step to his wife's rooms.

His knock and shaking of the carefully locked door produced a shrill answer from the old nurse within—

"Who is there? None can come in; my lady sleeps."

A yet louder summons producing only the same querulous answer, he put his shoulder to the door, and with a strange, almost superhuman strength, burst it open.

Old Rachel was waiting within, her hands clasped, her grey hair flying in an abject state of terror. She clung to her master with desperate fingers.

"For heaven's sake, Sir Michael, do not enter my lady's room; she sleeps at last, and to wake her would be most dangerous. Think, sir, it is her reason that is in danger, her precious reason, more precious than her life!"

But he never noticed her words or heeded them, but thrust her aside and went straight on without a pause.

The men who had followed him to the door hung back and waited with awe in their faces.

He went alone into his wife's room, a horrible misty dreaminess stealing over him, a kind of wonder whether he should find her there.

The shutters were closed, a night-lamp was flickering out its small remnant of life; as the draught from the opening door rushed in, it flared up and went out.

Sir Michael went to the window and opened it; the cold, grey light stole in. He dared not turn round, dared not glance at her bed. Was she there? He did not know, he could not tell.

He crouched down on a chair by her toilet table and pressed his fingers on his head. Was he going mad? This frightful uncertainty of what was real and what false brought the cold drops out on his brow. Once he started up; he did not know that the mirror was before him, and his eyes rested on his own face, so haggard, so grey, so full of horror that he did not know himself, and shrank back shivering with fear.

The room was in dainty delicate order; the coverlet on her bed had not been displaced; on the table lay glittering diamond rings.

What was it that had happened? He sat motionless, trying to disentangle his thoughts, growing ever more puzzled. A breeze came in at the open window and circled round him; it was bitterly cold.

The men waited outside, waited long and patiently, then they grew impatient, then anxious.

They went in at last; he was sitting looking at his right hand, with a look on his face that froze their blood.

The full horror of the situation had not struck them till that moment. His own hand had destroyed his wife.

For many long weeks reason and madness battled hard for their prey, but the least kind prevailed, and Sir Michael Newport returned to the full agony of reality.

One of Captain Bob's men who had been captured was tried for his life, and before expiating his sins upon the gallows he shed some light on the strange story.

He told of Lady Newport's oath to her dying brother to do his work, and of the marvellous skill with which she had evaded discovery. Old Abel's name was fortunately concealed, but the man told how a horse used to be concealed in a thicket not far from the house, and Lady Newport, dressed in her brother's clothes, used to steal out through the long windows of her room. Twice she had been actually present at a fray, and had behaved with desperate courage and coolness; her brother's men had almost the same superstitious faith in her that they had had in their lost leader.

The great anxiety was to obtain John Mowbray's papers—nothing else signified. They were obliged to take money and jewels sometimes, so as to keep up the story that they were common highwaymen; but it was but a feint.

John Mowbray had papers of the utmost value, and to save those Captain Bob had lingered on in daily increasing danger, and had at last sacrificed, not only his own life, but that of his twin-sister.

The papers were not saved. The roads were safe again, and when John Mowbray reached London, many a trusty gentleman expiated in exile and on the gallows his trust in the invincibility of the cause.

People said of Sir Michael Newport that he never lifted up his head again. He never spoke of his short married life, never alluded to the past, and when Mistress Betty, in paroxysms of weeping, would fain have consoled with him, he would leave the room.

No one knew when Lady Newport was carried to the grave; it was done secretly, in fear of the law. She was laid by her brother in a spot hastily consecrated in the depths of the woods; beech trees hung over it, tall bracken unrolled its delicate fronds, wild hyacinths scented the air. Half concealed in tangled grass and flowers, her husband placed a small stone cross bearing the Christian names of the twins, the date of their birth, and these words: "Died May the fourth, and August the twentieth—For the King's sake."

BLUE AND GOLD.

A STORY OF THE SEA.

By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

CHAPTER IV.

NORTHWARDS WENT THE "STAR OF HOPE."

ARE you a believer in the reality of dreams, reader? I do not mean of all dreams, but of some rare and particular dreams? I myself am.

Such a confession from a medical man may savour of the romantic. I do not care if it does. I do not mind even ridicule. I can live even after being laughed at, but from experiences of my own, which I cannot here relate, I am driven to the conclusion that there are times when, the body being wrapped in slumber, the soul may tread with silent footsteps the boundaries of another world.

A whole year passed by after the incident related at the conclusion of last chapter. The year passed slowly to all concerned in this tale, for Aileen was ill. For a time she had come home to her father's house. Not improving there, she came back to live with her sister. To speak about what she called "old, old times" was to Aileen the only pleasure left; to speak of old times, but never of Nugent. She was of too kindly a disposition to hate anyone, but somehow she connected this man with all her grief and trouble, and she never let her mind rest upon him.

Doctors were consulted as to the girl's complaint. But what could doctors do? Only look wise, talk scientific gibberish, choke anxiously inquiring friends off by bringing out big words, which they were supposed to know the meaning of, and pretended to in order to screen their ignorance; send that ubiquitous boy in buttons, with his basket of bottles; and finally, as a last resource, recommend change.

Then Jack with his wife and poor Aileen went away to the Continent, and kept wandering hither and thither like the dove first put out of the Ark, but finding no rest for the sole of the foot, though plenty of din, dust, and glare, obsequiousness everywhere, bedrooms with no home look about them, jargon round the dinner tables, and dinners evolved from—the chef alone could tell.

But one autumn evening at Cannes, Aileen sat by her open bedroom window for a short time before retiring. It was still, and almost sultry, and the sea, asleep yonder under the starlight, was very calm and still, only it seemed to be telling the beach its own beautiful name in the Greek—Θαλασσης (thalassais).

Yes "Θαλασσης!" that was all the sea said to-night. But it was a sweet and soothing sound.

Aileen slept; slept there in her easy chair, the lightest of breezes fanning her brow and toying with her bonnie hair.

When her eyes closed she had been gazing southwards across the waters, on which here and there lights were twinkling from boats, perhaps returning from pleasant little voyages and filled with merry, thoughtless passengers.

She hardly knew her eyes had closed till she awoke again, though it was a good hour afterwards, for the seascape had faded away, only for another of a different sort to take its place.

She thought she was alone on a vast level icefield, and wearily toiling on and on and on, seeking something she knew not what, seeking something that it appeared impossible to find. High overhead was a vast belt across the sky, a belt of aurora through which even the stars shone with lessened splendour, the belt itself quivering and flickering and dancing like a gigantic fringe of many-tinted lights.

But the field of ice all around was as silent as the grave itself. It was a silence unspeakable, a silence that cannot be described, a silence in which one might hear a snow-flake fall.

She has no other wish except to keep walking wearily onwards. Someone or something seems to be guiding her footsteps westwards, ever westwards. After a time that feels interminable she comes in sight of two ice-bound ships, dark against the background of snow, looking like ghost ships in the glimmering light of the aurora.

And now she sees figures on the ice. They are lying quiet and still and helpless. Perhaps they are dead figures. She cannot tell at first. But see, one disengages himself, and rising slowly, as if in pain, totters towards her with outstretched hands. It is he! It is Lawrence Perry!

But how weak and worn he looks—and how old!

She takes his damp, cold hands in hers, though they cause a shudder to steal through her frame. Perry points to the ships, and he points to those recumbent figures in the snow. "Can you save us?" he whispers. "Can you save us?"

She awakes with a start, and the vision slowly fades; but "Θαλασσης! Θαλασσης!" still sings the sea to the sandy beach. To Aileen's ear, however, the waves are saying something else with a similar sibilant sound: "Can you s—save us—s?" "Can you s—save us—s?" thus, runs the sound. Was it this lisping whisper, I wonder, that caused her strange, strange dream! Physiologists would tell us so, but psychologists would read the riddle in a different light.

Jack and his wife were sitting in their room quietly talking, when, after a little premonitory tap, poor Aileen entered in her dressing-gown, her hair somewhat dishevelled, and looking pale and scared withal. She knelt beside her sister near the fire of wood, and, placing her head on her lap, burst into tears. It was some time before she could speak, but she got out the words at last—

"Oh, Katie, I've had—such—a terrible dream; and he lives—Lawrence Perry lives—I know it. Oh, Katie, I know it!"

Then in brief but graphic sentences she told them all the dream.

Long after his wife and Aileen had retired that night, Jack strolled up and down the verandah, smoking and thinking. He was a strange being this Jack, and, like most sailors, just a trifle restless when on shore.

"Why shouldn't I?" he said half-aloud to himself at last, as he stopped and gazed longingly away over the darkling sea. "Yes, why shouldn't I? I really am tired of terra firma. I'm getting a regular old landsman, and a voyage towards the Pole, as they call it, would do me a world of good. Poor little Kathleen, she wouldn't hear from me for a bit, but reunion would be like the commencement of another honeymoon. Then, though there isn't the ghost of a chance of Perry's being alive, seeing that it was his ship the Fortuna that foundered in that terrible gale, and seeing that, according to the newspapers, the other two vessels belonging to what they are pleased to call 'a foolhardy private expedition' have been crushed in the ice, nothing is likely to come of my voyage. Never mind, I can afford it, and it will tend to restore the health of that poor child Aileen. Yes, I'll do it."

He pitched away his cigarette and strode into the house.

Next morning he broached the subject to his wife at breakfast. She smiled a pleased and happy smile, and something akin to the old glad sparkle came back to Aileen's eyes.

"Of course," she said, with a little flush on her cheeks, "of course you'll take us."

"Take you, child! An English girl in the Arctic Ocean! Why, it sounds like a romance!"

"Ah! but, brother, Katie and I are Irish. And whatever an Irish girl dares she can do."

Aileen could laugh now, but she looked very self-willed.

"Aileen is right enough," said Mrs. Fairbairn, with a quiet smile. "We'll go."

"Well 'pon my word, here's a pretty kettle of fish! I am almost sorry that I spoke."

"But I am not, brother," said Aileen; "and mind this, I should die if you left me behind."

"Dear sissie," returned Jack. "Your going with me or your staying behind if I do go, is but a small matter compared to your building hopes on a silly dream. It is sad to think, and I am grieved to say, that not a doubt remains that poor Lawrence went down in his brig, for oh! Aileen, not a soul was saved. Nor could there be on such a night as that, and in such a fearful sea."

"Perhaps," said Aileen, after a pause, "there may be other poor suffering creatures on the ice that we may be in time to save, and at the least, dear brother, I shall know the very, very worst."

"Well, Aileen, as I've always been given to believe that there is no use arguing with a woman, I must bow my head and give in. We cannot start till spring, and I trust you'll be stronger before that time."

Then impulsive little Aileen must needs jump up and kiss her brother, and assure him that from this very day she should begin to get well.

And, strangely enough, she did too.

Jack went north to Dundee a month or two after this, and bought a schooner, and had a regular Greenland-going skipper to see to all alterations, and have her thoroughly fortified around the bows for ice work.

He had also powerful engines put in her, and a beautiful and most comfortable saloon constructed, in which the most tender lady might feel as much at home as if sitting in her boudoir at home.

Then there was a crew of experienced hands to be got, and special boats and sledges to be built, and all the stores and extra canvas and spare spars to be put in her, so that, one way or another, it was well on in February before the Star of Hope found her way into the basin.

The power the mind exerts over the body during either health or infirmity is little short of miraculous. When Aileen arrived at Dundee with her sister and Jack, no one who had last seen her sad, pale, and wasted form at Cannes would have known her. The roses had come back to her cheeks, the carmine to her lips, and her eyes carried now a happy instead of a driven and haunted look. She it was who took the principal part in naming the ship. In her dress of snowy white, with flowers bedecking her sunny hair, she stood there on the platform the observed and admired of all observers.

Northwards went the Star of Hope, northwards and past the beetling cliffs of Mearns, northwards along the sand-dunne shores of Aberdeen, then steamed away and away into the wide wild Northern Ocean.

And no more land would be visible now for months and months to come.

So early in the season was it that the vessel seemed to be heading for the regions of perpetual night. The days grew shorter and shorter, till for barely two hours did the sun gleam angrily across the waters.

Colder and colder, stormier and still more stormy grew the weather too, and the wind blew strong and bitterly from the north and east, but still the ship kept on. Often the green seas leapt high over the bows and made a clean sweep along the ice-clad decks; at times the vessel dived headlong down a hill of water into a black and yawning chasm from which it appeared impossible she e'er could rise again, while the screw went rattling round in empty air; at other times she heeled to the stern till her jibboom pointed high above the silver aurora, and the swirling waves came rushing up the screw well, and washed around the legs of the two sturdy seamen who held the wheel.

The head-way she made now was painfully nominal. If the officer of the watch succeeded in making a knot an hour he felt he was doing well. When the good ship left Dundee she was as pretty as a yacht. See her now, she looks a water-logged Dutchman. Her bows are so laden with ice that she is down by the head, every rope and stay seems made of glass; the funnel itself is a pillar of salt, formed from the dashing spray.

Ah! but better days and longer days came in time; the sun shone in a sky of vivid blue, and the winds went back to their caves, and now all day the men were employed overboard and inboard with picks and other tools of iron, clearing the bows of ice.

And now, too, both Aileen and her sister could walk the decks, well muffled up in furs, and enjoy to the full the marvellous seascape that stretched all around them from horizon to horizon.

Then came fields of slush and half-melted snow, through which the Star could scarcely force her way.

Then streams of baby icebergs of all shapes imaginable, with at times a seal asleep on a green transparent couch, on which surely a mermaid even might have rested.

The ice-streams got more numerous and still more numerous, and the individual bergs grew bigger and bigger, and settled and cannonaded along the ship's sides with a noise like hurtling thunder.

It was time now to send aloft the crow's-nest, a barrel attached to the main truck and near it, in which some outlook must stand and shiver all day long.

Porpoises and narwhals came up to stare at the stranger, and at times the sea for miles around them would be covered with round black heads and wondering eyes, for no animal that swims or floats is half so inquisitive as the Greenland seal.

Then one morning, when Aileen came up before breakfast, lo and behold! she found that the Star of Hope was close beside the great ice-pack itself, the waters that laved it looking inky-black by comparison.

At her own request, Jack assisted her a little distance into the rigging, and she gazed anxiously away towards the west. Ice—ice—ice, snow-clad, level ice, with here and there a little hill or hummock as far as the eye could reach.

"Oh, Jack," she said, "it does so remind me of my dream!"

The Star went northwards and eastwards, now steaming along the pack edge, till the ice grew higher and more dangerous-looking, and at last the silver cliffs of Spitzbergen were sighted miles ahead.

"There is something black lying just in there, sir," said the mate one day, entering Captain's Fairbairn's cabin. "It may be a walrus, sir, but I think it is a boat."

The ship was stopped, and presently away went the whaler, Jack himself holding the rudder ropes. They soon reached the ice, and leaping on shore made their way to that something black.

It was a boat, and sad and ghastly was the sight that met their gaze when they came alongside it. Two corpses—sadly attenuated ones they were—lay dead and frozen just as they had fallen off the thwarts. That they were English sailors who had died of starvation was evident at the first glance, and the name on the boat's bows was that of one of the missing ships—the Leander. The frozen hands of one still clutched a little notebook, with a morsel of lead pencil attached to it by a string. The poor fellow must have died as he was writing.

This notebook Jack took charge of, and after the men had been accorded a sailor's burial, he went alone into his cabin to read.

What a mournful tale it was! A story of shipwreck and sufferings, such as no one who has not been down to the sea in ships, in regions round the Pole, could have any notion of. There was heart-rending simplicity in every detail. Indeed, the very matter-of-fact language in which the brief entries were couched gave them a graphicness which no imagination could have supplied.

The writer, however, had not been dead a week, this was evident from the dates. He and seven others—all gone somewhere—had left the far interior of the ice-pack, where probably their other shipmates now lay dying; intending if possible to drag their boat to open water, but had failed and fallen, where Jack had found them, even in sight of the sea they had suffered so much to seek.

As nearly as possible—making every allowance for the drifting of the ice-pack—the latitude was given of the ships beset.

All was bustle and stir on board now, all was hard work too for a while, but hope beat high in every heart. A kind of harbour was made for the Star among the heavy ice, and here she was fixed for a time.

Then sledges were got out and provisioned, and one sunny morning, with the thermometer standing unpleasantly near to zero, the party went over the side, and the journey westwards across the ice was commenced.

Both Aileen and Kathleen had insisted on coming, and Jack had not the heart to say them nay.

A description of that long and toilsome march and drag across the pack, with its numerous attendant dangers, would form a story in itself, and one that could not fail to be read with interest.

Suffice it here to say that early one day they sighted the standing masts of a brig, and that soon after noon they were near enough to shout and cheer.

To their joy they now saw smoke, and a sadly faint echo of their own wild "Hurrah!" was borne back to them on the light ice air.

And see yonder comes a dark figure to meet the advancing sledge. How slowly he walks, how feeble seems every movement.

Aileen clutched at her sister, else she would have fallen, for the advancing figure was that of Lawrence Perry. It had not been his ship after all that had gone down in the gale off the Norwegian coast.

Of all the brave fellows who had gone to sea on that foolhardy and ill-fated expedition, eleven only remained alive, and careful indeed was the nursing they required to woo them back to health. One of the ships had been nipped flat in the ice, her masts still left standing; the other was burned to the pack edge so quickly that hardly provisions enough to last for three months had been saved.

In three weeks time Jack was something like his former self again, but he appeared still to require Aileen's support to aid him in walking along the decks. I say he appeared to require it, and doubtless he enjoyed it. But there was a perfect understanding now between happy Aileen and him, though he often referred to that day on the Peak of Teneriffe, when in wilful wantonness she chose the scarlet bouquet rather than the blue and gold.

And here let my story end, for the simplest of all reasons: the reader can easily imagine the rest.

[THE END.]

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER IV.

A YOUTHFUL COMPANY.

THE first thing Anthony Walton did was to catch his sister Alice by the arm and pull her up from the not over-dry grass.

"Are you working for a fit of the ague, Alice? What will your mother say to you, or to Prissy there, for suffering you to be so imprudent?"

"As if I could not take care of myself! As if I were at Prissy's beck and call; or at yours either, Tony!" protested Alice, in laughing defiance, shaking herself from his unceremonious grasp.

"I must say, madam, that you do not give a promising example of your powers of self-government, and as I am your elder brother and guardian, I summon you by the word of command to repair to yonder stile, and perch yourself on the topmost bar, supposing you still have an inclination for a seat. It will afford you a better view, if the question of views enters into your limited reasons for your behaviour; per-adventure the gain may make up for the loss of that precious jewel, your free will."

"Sit like a bird on the highest perch," cried Alice, "when the least height maketh me dizzy, you cruel fellow! I have a singing in my ears, and a fluttering at my heart at the bare thought." And Alice began to favour the company with some of her languishing affectations.

"Nay, don't think to take us in, sister; I'm thankful to see your colour is as good as a milkmaid's, and the last time you and I tried a race together, you beat me hollow," declared the incredulous, unflattering brother.

Although he spoke laughingly there was a certain masterfulness about Anthony Walton which, if it had not been combined with great kindness of nature, would have gone far to render him a tyrant of the first water; as it was, he could never see wrong done without interposing and striving to set it right, incurring many a grudge for his dogmatism and officiousness. "Wrong is wrong, and right is right," said Anthony, stoutly. "There cannot be two opinions by any save wrong-minded persons on the point. If I am persuaded at any time that a particular course of conduct is right, how am I to refrain from enforcing it to the best of my power? Beshrew me, if I do not think I should deserve the worst to happen to me if I did otherwise."

The words, "the liberty of the subject," in the sense of a man being permitted to do such evil as was not outrageous if he chose, were not so often spoken in Anthony's day; yet he had a burning love of liberty in the light of a man's freedom to do what he saw to be right, and was ready to support the principle with his life if need were.

Anthony Walton was like his sister Prissy on a much larger scale—not exactly handsome, but very manly, as she was very womanly. His scholar's gown and cap became him, lending dignity to his size and strength, to the breadth of the brow and the depth of the eyes under the square cap.

John Dacre, four years Anthony Walton's junior, was fair-haired, with a sanguine complexion, such as Kitty had, but the resemblance between the brother and sister ended there. People were wont to say that he ought to have been the girl and she the boy; not that Kitty was masculine or John feminine in the respective traits which characterised the two. But even as a very young girl she gave indication of the happy balance of intellectual qualities, the calmness of judgment, the very cheerfulness of nature which all make for sound moderation of mind and for reason's having its due in being heard in its turn, when the voice of passion is in danger of drowning every other.

As a matter of fact, John Dacre was not only cleverer than Kitty, his ideas were already far better trained and developed than hers had any chance of being. But, like his father, he was exceedingly, even morbidly, sensitive, and apt to be carried away by the feeling of the moment. He was tall and slight, not very strong, though brave to rashness, and restlessly impatient of any bodily impediment to whatever pursuit he had in hand. Anthony Walton wore his dark hair cut short, in a new fashion, which Kitty did not like; but John Dacre had not copied his friend in this detail. His light brown hair was left long, except where it was cut straight across his forehead, and was apt to get dishevelled and to stream rather wildly over his beardless, girlish, blooming cheeks, and on his shoulders. In other respects there was an extreme daintiness, a sort of scholarly elegance about his person. He was really glad to see his sister with his cousins, as Kitty felt, and she would fain have taken him aside to ask him about the violent headaches to which he was subject, and to tell him her home news. But she knew he would hate to have any physical weakness of his brought forward; and he was at once pounced upon by Alice, who always claimed his company, on the ground that if they two were not the nearest in age of the cousins, they ought to be, for she was certain they had the most in common. Alice had a girlish admiration for Master Jackie, instinctively recognising in him an intangible something, which she vainly aimed at for herself. She was disposed to exhibit, for his benefit, the little fancies and caprices at which her brother Anthony openly laughed. John Dacre did not laugh at them, though they wearied him a little. He could not hurt any person's feelings by turning that person into ridicule, however well deserved, for his own feelings would be rather the more hurt of the two in the process.

The young men would have the girls go at once to Magdalen in order to have the longer time for them to rest and be refreshed. Kitty, with her private grudge against Anthony Walton, had to walk with him, let him carry her basket, and listen to his good-natured kinsmanly questions. Why had she not been to Islip Barnes lately? Whether she did not grieve to lose all the country sights and sounds, the rooks beginning to build and the little birds to seek their mates, lambs on the uplands, and calves on the lea? Was she not forced to confess that even Oxford, with its grey colleges and their choristers, some of whom sang well-nigh as sweetly as the birds, could not be compared to one hour on the open pasture or in the dim recesses of the woods?

Magdalen was familiar ground to the girls. They had not to stop to examine the echoing cloisters with their quaint little figures, the ivy-hung Founder's Tower, or the stone pulpit from which a sermon was preached each Midsummer Day in honour of St. John the Baptist, when the quadrangle was strewn with grass and rushes, in fanciful imitation of a wilderness. Prissy, indeed, would have lingered to recall the devotion and skill which had called the beautiful college into being, but the others were already entering one of the doorways and ascending a narrow, steep stair not particularly distinguished by cleanliness or savouriness, which took them to their destination.

Anthony Walton's room had been selected as larger than John Dacre's, though in the matter of plainness it left nothing to be desired. But who thought of plainness where a generous banquet had been prepared of all that the two caterers could get together on short notice—trout from the river and wild duck from the neighbouring fens, caught and shot by the hosts for the grand occasion, a pasty and a capon in considerable excess of the day's "battels" from the college larder, a special cake for which the college cook was famous, in rivalry of the homemade bread and cream cheese which the Walton girls had brought from Islip Barnes, mild ale and mulled claret, in addition to French chocolate and Turkish coffee?

The talk had no lack of animation, turning as it did for the most part on such Oxford customs and traditions as were likely to amuse the visitors. The men of Queen's were summoned each day to dinner by a trumpet, in order to keep them in constant remembrance of the last trump on the Day of Judgment. At their Christmas festival their chief dish was a boar's head in honour of the scholar who slew the great wild boar at Cowpath by the might of his single arm wielding his copy of Aristotle. On New Year's Day each fellow was presented by the burser with a needle and thread, accompanied by the significant injunction, "Take this! and be thrifty." At All Souls there was a mallard, or drake "gaudy," in commemoration of the monster drake found in digging the foundation; but there was no attempt made to preserve the fame of the cat slyly said to have been discovered starved to death in the library. At Lincoln College, on Shrove Tuesday, each freshman had to deliver a humorous speech or lecture. If he pleased his audience he was rewarded with caudle cup; if he displeased them he was punished with "salt drink"—beer well salted, and "tucks," or sharp pinches, with the finger and the thumb, of the chin, just beneath the under lip. The founder of St. John's had been advised in a dream that he was to build his college where he should see three elm trees growing from one root, and there sure enough he came on the triple trees and the single root in the ruined court of old St. Barnard's College, and if the girls would go to St. John's they would see the triune tree flourishing in the gardens to this day. As for the Latin hymn sung at sunrise on May morning on Magdalen Tower, or that other ancient carol in mingled Latin and English, beginning

"In dulci jubilo,"

"Let us our homage show," given in Magdalen Hall on Christmas Eve, there was no occasion to mention them, since both Anthony's sisters and Jack's sister had heard often of these ceremonies, and even assisted at the first.

Nor did the young men fail altogether in time-out-of-mind students' tales of light-hearted pranks and simple practical jokes; of how this lad had emptied a secret store of flour, and that lad of feathers over the staircase on a conclave in hot dispute on the landing below; how this wag had smuggled a couple of toads into his companion's riding-boots, and that dressed up a travelling bear in the college proctor's gown.

It was all so happy and bright, and even Prissy looked so gay for the moment, that fourteen-year-old Kitty could but recall the grave talk in the meadows as a bad dream; and always her cousin Anthony would not see that she was displeased with him, but would pet and tease her by turns. Nay, she must own the superiority of this his College of Magdalen over all the other colleges, and admit that Oriel was nowhere in comparison.

"No, I will not, cousin Anthony." Kitty refused to make the concession. "We have a king and queen for our founders."

"Humph," muttered Anthony, "some people would say you are none the better for that."

"And such a queen as she whose arms in the Spanish pomegranate are all over the college," went on Kitty. "Her son Edward was but a poor king, I grant, and let himself be murdered by his traitor servants; but I wis you have no lady on your foundation like our Queen Eleanor. You do not discredit her story, sir, do you?" urged Kitty, so much in earnest that she forgot to whom she was speaking, and addressed him almost beseechingly. "You do believe that when her lord, King Edward I., had a poisoned wound dealt him, as he was fighting in one of the Crusades in the East, she knelt by his side and sucked the poison from his wound, saving his life at the risk of her own?" And Kitty's eyes looked as if their blue was borrowed from the heavens above her, while she told the story.

"And prithee, Kitty, what kind of cur was he who suffered her to run the risk for his unworthy sake?" he startled her by inquiring, in a deep voice, which sounded like a growl.

"Oh!" said Kitty, after a moment's reflection, "the poison was thought not to hurt when swallowed into the stomach and not let into the blood. I suppose he knew that, though I had not thought of it before. Besides, he was her king as well as her husband, and at the worst it would have been right and good to die for her king."

He looked at her in silence, and then he said something in an undertone, which she did not quite catch, about dying being one thing and aiding and abetting in wrong-doing another. Then he hastened to add, "Whether I believe thy legend or not, cousin Kitty, I will say this, I do believe I have known women who would do as much as your Queen Eleanor was said to do, for their husbands, or fathers, or brothers in extremity."

He glanced for a second at his favourite sister Prissy, who was talking to Alice and Jack, and then Anthony's look seemed to fall for another instant on Kitty herself. But she was not a woman, she was only a girl, and he could not know what she would do when she was grown up, if she were ever tried. However, to dissipate a little awkwardness and tremor of pleasure which she could not help feeling at the bare chance that her cousin Anthony, whom she had been blaming so severely, who was so much older and wiser than she, should think so well of her as that came to, she hastened to renew their dispute.

"And Sir Walter Raleigh, who was the most gallant knight at Queen Elizabeth's Court, who would have written a history of the world if he had not been beheaded before he could finish it, studied at Oriel, cousin Anthony."

"And William Tyndale, who translated the Bible and died a martyr for his good deed, studied at Magdalen, cousin Kitty," he said, imitating the solemnity of her statement. She thought he was laughing at her, and she was at the age which objects most strongly to being laughed at; but she considered it wiser and more dignified to take no notice. "I have one of Sir Walter's 'golden birds,' do you know, cousin. I had it from Lady Ottery, and she says it was one of a hatching of Lady Anglesey's birds, and that the first of the Anglesey canaries was a present from Queen Elizabeth, who had the parent birds direct from Sir Walter Raleigh, on his return from the New World."

"And does your royally descended canary sing better than his common brothers and sisters, Mrs. Kitty?"

"I cannot say that, sir," answered Kitty, in a reserved tone; "but I like that he should sing in Sir Walter's old lodging. If I had my will the piping of canaries should be heard all over Oriel."

"Pity on the splitting headaches thou wouldst have to answer for, worse than after the Whitsun cakes and ale! Didst never hear from my respected uncle that scholars' fine nerves are easily upset? Thou wouldst put a stop to another sort of piping which the pipers are vain enough to think is worth all the birds' songs in the world. Men are so weak, my dear Kitty, that I fear me they could not study to purpose to the playing of a pipe and tabor, or even to the shrill piping of a canary."

"I know, cousin Anthony," said Kitty, demurely, "that silence is commanded in the great library which Sir Thomas Bodley hath given to Oxford, and father likes to read there above all things. But even there, when I've been taken to see the wonderful heaps of books, I'm not sure that men do not speak when they've a mind to. They make the laws, and then they break them when it suits the law makers."

"Hear to cousin Kitty's criticism on men's mode of government! Are we to look for more consistency and stability from women?"

Once the conversation took a serious turn, when Jack suddenly addressed Anthony, as if fain to get rid of a burden on his mind.

"Have you heard that a maypole is to be erected again at Carfax?"

"Thou dost not say so, Jack. The madmen!" cried Anthony, knitting his brows, and evidently containing himself with difficulty.

"Why not?" put in Kitty, in innocent wonder. "A maypole with its garlands is one of the prettiest things I ever saw; and sure, men and women have not so much time on hand to dance that they should be forbid when they have the opportunity. I read part of a sermon to Lady Ottery on the text, 'A merry heart doeth good like medicine,' and she said it was right wise as well as Christian."

"I wonder at my Lady Ottery, when Master Prynne hath condemned maypoles along with stage plays and Christmas feasts and dancing, and singing too, for aught I can tell, in his book, which was hung round his neck when he stood in pillory, and afterwards burned by the common hangman," said Alice, drily.

"Hush, Alice!" cried Prissy.

"You don't know what you're speaking about, Kitty," said Jack, ignoring Alice. He did not speak unkindly, only brusquely. But it vexed his sister to think that he should believe and show these cousins that he believed her so stupid as not to know about a maypole. Why, she remembered a maypole having been erected in the quadrangle at Oriel, and her father and Mrs. Judy had allowed her and Jackie—a small boy and girl—to join, to their great glee, in skipping round it.

"My dear little Kitty," said Anthony, dropping his bantering and speaking to her very gently and gravely, "thou art not old enough for such disputes; but when thou art of sufficient years to enter into them, though I would fain hope they will be silenced before then, thou wilt comprehend thus far. If the dancers round the maypole were like thee or Alice, aye, or even like Jack here, with no more harm in your hearts than there is at this moment, you might dance till you were weary, and neither Master William Prynne nor any other would have very great cause to complain. Or if it were a matter of inclination and not of compulsion, something might be said for the 'Book of Sports' itself. As it is, though it hath the approval of my Lord the Archbishop, it is highly distasteful to many a godly clergyman of the Church of England. These men are giving up their livings in scores and hundreds sooner than enforce the practices which are enforced in the book on the Lord's Day; and their parishioners who are like-minded are relinquishing their attendance at church rather than offend their consciences in this matter."

"Men of their opinion," said Prissy, quietly, "have another text which they quote in support of their views. 'The people sat down to eat and drink and rose up to play.' The Bible telleth us what the end of that play was, when Aaron was compelled to make the golden calf that the Israelites might fall down and worship the idol withal."

"It was a sorry sight when Lame Giles cast off his gown and danced with the rest last Whitsunday," said John Dacre, in accents of sharpest reprobation, which, while it pained him to utter, he could not for the life of him keep back. He was referring to the eccentric rector of St. Martin's, the most eccentric of his cloth in that or any day.

Anthony shrugged his broad shoulders.

"Prynne and he were at Oriel together under my excellent uncle. Now they are sworn foes, and we have 'Lame Giles, his Haltings' from Prynne's intemperate pen. Suppose, then, Jack and I fall out and come to be at such odds! Suppose I live to write a book and call it 'Long-legged Jack, his Leaps'!"

When the laugh at the absurdity of the idea died out it was time for Prissy and Alice Walton to take their places in their coach, and for Anthony and Jack to see Kitty back to Oriel in the early dusk of the spring evening.

THE NEWEST GOWNS AT THE PRIVATE VIEW.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

THE NEW COURT BODICES.

IN the sketch of "The Newest Gowns at the Private View," I have done my best to gather together everything that is now known of the future spring styles in dress. The cold and inclement February kept every idea of spring in the background, and so there is perhaps rather less of novelty than usually to be observed at this time. Although there are many dresses of the "Directory" style still being produced, I do not imagine that we shall have quite as much of it as during the winter. The long coats can be so well imitated by the skirts with large pockets and kilted backs and bodices, that they will, I think, fall out of favour; while the more simple "Empire" costume will, very probably, be more worn than anything else. Many people are rejoicing that we shall cease to consider square shoulders a feminine beauty, and that we shall return to the sloping shoulders which our grandmothers admired and cultivated. It is always a puzzle to those who think on the matter, where all the sloping shoulders have gone to, and what the people did who had them when they went out of fashion, and were said to be ugly twenty-five years ago. No amount of padding would quite account for it, and the only explanation lies in the suggestion that the moving up of the sleeve to its proper place on the shoulder, where the arm really does enter the shoulder, has hidden the shape of the shoulders, and we do not notice them, as we did when the seam on the shoulder was carried several inches down the arm; a truly dreadful fashion, when no one could lift up their arms to their heads without tearing the dress! No wonder that we needed the strongest of cords to prevent continual disaster.

In spite of the constant abuse of what is termed the angular masculine style of square shoulder, I must confess I admire the latter more than the figures we have been lately seeing in the Grosvenor Gallery, in the styles of the last century, with sloping shoulders and long, swan-like necks; and I think that our generation, and the nineteenth century of trim, neatly-cut gowns and straight shoulders, are much more up to our present day opinions and manners. To-day women are more useful, and take more part in the world's labour than they did; and no style of dress, such as that of the seventeenth century, would do for us, active workers with hand and brain.

and useful hygienic ideas; and it is quite certain that our stout boots and woollen stockings, woollen dresses and jackets, mackintoshes and waterproofs, are calculated to produce in the end handsome and healthy women, able to take their share in the world's work. Whether sloping shoulders were beautiful or the reverse, it is quite certain that, even at that period, they were considered indicative of great delicacy of constitution, if not of inherited disease, and quite as much so as a narrow pigeon breast. But those were the days when they admired ill-health, and glorified a poor appetite into something angelic; when the poor women and girls did not dare to eat in public, for fear of being thought vulgar and ill-bred; when everything that was healthy, strong, and beautiful was "hoydenish," milk-maidish, and not à la mode. These ideas are quite on a par with Chinese notions of women's feet.

In the way of colours for this spring we seem to have a wide choice, though, from all appearance, green will hold its own. There are so many shades of it that all complexions can be suited, while some skins will look better with the cool greens than they ever have looked before. By cool greens I mean those with grey in them, so that they resemble the old réséda, or mignonette colour, which will be more used than ever this spring. Greys, as they appear at present, have a great shade of pink in them, one of the darkest being called a "Russian grey." One new grey-green is called "lizard skin," and there are one or two others, more or less pretty. The new tan is called "pigskin," and is very decidedly yellowish in its tone; and "Parchment" is the new name for cream colour. "Olive" is yellow in its hue, and there is a true emerald-green come in, that I cannot fancy will be much adopted.

In browns we have "Robin brown" and "Robin red"—to be worn together—and a pretty madder that ought to be called a brick-red. Boulanger makes his appearance in English society as a dark, rich red; and there is a handsome yellow-red hue, called "Venetian." There are many touches of terra-cotta here and there in the cinnamon-browns, fawn-browns, and yellows. There are several blues, which deserve to be called "greys," but some of them will be sure to be popular, for they are so very cool-looking and summer-like, and will show well if trimmed with gold or silver braids. The newest are "lapis lazuli," "Wedgwood," and a dark blue called "Austrian." In the violet shades there are some of very lovely and pure colours—"pansy," "plum," "dahlia," "mulberry," and a colour which copies the French anemones, which we see in such quantities for sale in the streets of London.

In the way of spring mantles there seems to be nothing novel, but all the old shapes with modifications will be worn. Nearly all are short at the back and have long ends in front. The new jackets have wonderfully embroidered fronts, with a long, straight-cut revers at either side, the linings being of moiré silk. The latest models seem to be in black plain cloth, with plain black moiré facings in front. But there are plenty of dark stone, brown, grey, twine, and cinnamon colours. The fronts are braided on white, with a braid to match the outer colour, or else with a braid having either gold or silver mixed with it. There are some novel redingotes with a wide revers in front and a triple "Garrick cape" on the shoulders at the back. One of the novel ways of putting on braid is to lay it on in stripes that follow the seams of the jacket, and finish it off in loops, arranged like trefoil at the edge. This style will add length to the figure, and become short people. Some new small mantles have appeared, which are of the cape order, the fronts being long and pointed. They are very becoming, and are made in plush, velvet, and matelassé. Black velvet has quite come forward as a material for mantles, and is to be trimmed with gimp and cord, or a tasselled fringe. We shall still retain the large cloaks, to all appearance, during the summer, but we shall change the material of which they are made. Cinnamon foulé, scouring cloth, and the bordered materials used for dresses are all adopted, the borders of the last named being arranged so as to go down the "Russian fronts," and also down the under fronts, which are now frequently gathered or pleated at the neck, and are tied at the waist by a ribbon, or confined by a belt.

The show of materials is not very great as yet, and plain cloths seem to be as popular as anything else. Serges, cashmeres, Indian cashmeres, with a fishbone weaving pattern on them, "Angola cloth," "Vicuna cloth," "camel's hair," and some pretty cloths with a return to the "snowflake," or knickerbocker

In silk the best shops are now showing large brocades, which are to be made up with plain materials. All the new silks are soft and thick in texture, and there are many new ideas in fanciful weaving, and matelassé patterns. There seems to be a feeling for stripes in silks, and many of the newest are woven in designs that look like lace, or even macramé lace, or crochet lace, laid on in stripes. I cannot say that the effect is pretty, but they will probably be used as trimmings; so the somewhat stiff effects will not matter so much.

The greatest change which has taken place is in the bonnets of the spring. They are shallow, flat at the sides, and low in the crown. The front of the brim is often depressed and square, and the trimming is put on so as to give a coronet effect. The ribbons used for trimmings are very wide and handsome; and sad to say, the rage for the poor birds and their feathers still continues. But we see that the fancy for flowers, which generally appears in the spring, is coming on. The newest are violets in all shades; mimosa, marsh-mallow, lilac, aconite, and kingcup; and they are one and all beautifully made and coloured. The Alsatian bow is very popular, and so is the knot bow, which stands up. Many of the new bonnets have the bows sewn on at the back and pointed to the front of the bonnet—and all bows are rather obtrusive. There are many styles of hats, both large and small. The smaller shapes have the brim very often turned up at the back, and not in front. And there is a very ugly hat which has a round brim, caught up to the crown in several places at equal distances all round. The crowns and brims are often of different materials in various colours, and the ribbons for trimming hats are as wide as those used for bonnets.

The newest skirts are those with small tucks in front, or are gathered for several inches down. The backs of these are laid in folds. The "Empire skirt" does not need either steels or a mattress; but the folds of the dress itself are slightly wadded, either underneath or in the folds themselves, to make them stand out. As the season goes on we shall have flounced muslin put at the back of the skirts, in order to hold them out softly.

Zouave jackets are immensely popular, for either day or evening gowns; they are both square-cornered in front, or are very short, and cut-away, so that they resemble a Spanish Gitana's jacket. They are worn over jerseys, silk blouses, pointed bodices, or anything that is not a jacket itself, for then they would lose their raison d'être. One evening bodice was very pretty. It was one of the loose blouses of last summer, in dark red or crimson, and a small Zouave was worn over it, cut so short as to come only to the centre of the back, and rounded off in front. This was made of black velvet, with handsome beaded trimmings all round it.

In the "Private View" we show the new method of making up the striped materials on the left-hand side. Next to that is the Directoire jacket, and in the front the new sleeved mantle, in plain black velvet. Of the two gowns at the back, the one is a Directoire jacket, with embroidery, and the other a tailor-made gown, with white panel and waistcoat. The different shapes and trimmings of the new hats and bonnets are also represented.

The "three bodices for spring" show the use that will be made of folds this season, and how two materials—a figured and a plain—will be used in the same gown. The braided front is also a pretty style.

I am sure that many of my readers will like to see the new Court bodices which the Queen has lately authorised, as a protection to those who cannot wear the ordinary round Court bodice, that has been worn during Her Majesty's reign. The bodice represented as open can be filled in with white tulle or net, quite up to the throat, if preferred, and transparent sleeves can be used instead of thick ones. It is reported that they were not very generally adopted at the first Drawing Room held this year; but they are new, and are, moreover, intended for invalids, and those advancing in life; for though a doctor's certificate is no longer needed, the permission of the Lord Chamberlain has to be asked.

The "Empire dress," which has been selected for our paper pattern for this month, gives the last idea which has come out for the spring. It consists of two paper patterns in reality—the "Corday skirt," which we had in December, price 1s., and the new Empire bodice, which is both a novel and pretty one, to be used with the revers in front or not, as preferred, price 1s. The two patterns can be had apart at 1s. each, or together at 2s. "The Lady Dressmaker" has thought it better to give the bodice a skirt in the sketch, as so many people may not know how to manage the putting of the bodice on the skirt at the waist.

The front of the skirt is laid in small tucks, which are run in neatly to about half a yard down the skirt. The back is set in either in folds, gathers, or flat pleats, as preferred. There are three pieces in the skirt.

The bodice consists of two parts of sleeve, cuff, puffed top, folded piece for front, collar, revers, front of bodice, back, and two side pieces. Both patterns (price 1s. each) can be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale, and one pattern given each month. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each pattern. If tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, including the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire or Zouave jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, Directoire redingote, bodice instead of stays, Corday skirt with pleats, jacket-bodice with waistcoat, "Little Lord Fauntleroy" bodice with folds in front, braided bodice with revers, and the "Empire" dress (consisting of a bodice and a skirt, which may be had separately at 1s. each).²

manner of some years ago. This is used in two colours, and is the only very new idea that I have seen. There is to be again an effort to bring in alpaca, and it is to be found with lace stripes and in plain colours. There are plenty of the new woollen damasks, which will be popular for mantles and cloaks; and we have the pretty old-fashioned, "de Laines" which came out last year, but are a thousand-fold more charming this year, with their girlish designs of grasses, sprigs of flowers, and small leaves. They will be very pretty for making up the "Empire dresses," which will be the last idea for girls this year, and which we illustrate this month as our paper pattern. It is new, without being remarkable in any way, and is extremely graceful.

BIRD LIFE IN MAY.

By A NATURALIST.

"BIRD, prune thy wing; nightingale, sing,
To give my love good-morrow!
Wake from thy nest, robin redbreast,
Sing, birds, in every furrow;
And from each hill let music shrill
Give my fair love good-morrow!
Blackbird and thrush, in every bush,
Stare, linnet and cock-sparrow;
You pretty elves among yourselves,
Sing my fair love good-morrow!"

Thomas Heywood.

THIS month is the best of all the months for observing the migrants, the insectivorous ones, in a state of activity, and for listening to their various notes and songs. The woods and the moors, the brook-sides and the fens, are all awake with tune. Good old Izaak Walton, writing in the spring-time, says: "Lord, what music hast Thou provided for the saints in heaven, when Thou affordest bad men such music on earth!"

They have come from far, these delicate-looking birds, through mountain passes and sandy tracks, keeping—who can tell how, or by what rule?—to the line of coast, more or less, which will ultimately bring them to the narrow silver streak that parts England from the Continent. Take, as a single instance from the many insectivorous ones, the very delicate wood-warbler or wood-wren, a butterfly of a bird—one that you can barely hold for a few seconds in your hand without his showing most pitiful signs of distress; and yet he has come the same long journey that his family have travelled, who can say how long? That little mite, the chiff-chaff, or least willow-wren, crosses and recrosses nearly the same tract of country; delicate creatures, soft-billed and soft-feathered, they come to enliven our woods, coppices, and hedgerows with their slim forms and cheerful voices.

As a songster, first on the list is the blackcap. He and his companions prefer the tops of the trees, or the top twigs of high bushes, to perch on whilst giving out that beautiful song of theirs, second only in our opinion to that of the nightingale. The willow-warbler adds to the concert, but the garden-warbler, with his full rich notes, is the one that will most attract your ear. With one or two exceptions the insect-feeding migrants are shy, retiring birds; their haunts are as a rule quiet places, moist and warm. Insect life is best nourished in such spots, and food plentiful therefore. You may often see them on the topmost sprays of the trees surrounding these haunts, flitting hither and thither, hardly at rest for a moment, busy feeding on the insects that in warm weather quit their retreats and luxuriate in the sunshine. If you notice their forms, you will see a family likeness run through the whole group. No matter what the difference in plumage may be, there is something in their movements and habits that stamps them as near allies.

The white-throats—the large and the small species—are very busy, flitting and diving in and out the tangle of the hedgerows. The large white-throat is particularly noticeable for his scolding chatter, as, with crest erected, he chides away at a most furious rate; to think that anyone should have the impudence to pass by that spot, his notes seem to say—a spot he had selected for his home. No matter where you find him, he is a most talkative little fellow.

The grasshopper-warbler, that most shy and curious mouse-like bird—mouse-like in all his actions, which seem to be done by fits and starts—I must describe. Picture to yourself a strip of plashy ground on the borders of some common, covered with furze and hollies. I say plashy, to distinguish it from bogland. Here and there are runs bordered by miniature banks—in fact, little watercourses, where the sun shines brightly the greater portion of the day. Vegetation is at its best in such spots, and there is a tangled undergrowth that wraps itself about your ankles as you try to force your way through it: long trailing brambles that will be covered in September with fine fruit, the joy of the children of all classes. Jagged and stunted sloe bushes grip the soil, and furze bushes are inextricably entangled with wiry-stunted heath, laced and interlaced with coarse, wiry grass, which even the half-wild ponies that range the common will not eat. Such is the home of the grasshopper-warbler, a small brown bird very like a wren, with a rather long and rounded tail. If you wish to see anything of him, come out of the tangle on to the higher ground, and sit very quiet. When he thinks you have gone away you will hear a few notes like the chirrup of the great green grasshopper. Presently you may see him scuttle up from the matted undergrowth with wonderful nimbleness, and after he has got to the top twigs of his favourite bushes you will hear his song, such as it is—after all, very much in keeping with his surroundings. Then, as though he fancied he had made himself a little too conspicuous, down he dips into the tangle again, which you will not persuade him to leave if he is in the least alarmed.

Some of the rustics are very incredulous about the grasshopper-warbler. "What are ye listening to, so deedy like?" I was once asked by a man in leather gaiters, who passed the spot where I had been hidden, to observe the bird's movements and to listen to his notes. "The grasshopper bird," I replied. "No, no! no such thing; somebody's bin making game on ye, knowing as ye're allus bird-hunting. That ain't no bird; I've heerd that 'ere noise hundreds o' times; doan't ye believe it. It's one o' them 'ere big locusses, what comes now an' agin. 'Tain't no bird." I did not contradict him; he only expressed the general opinion the rustics hold about the grasshopper-warbler.

Near the streams the nightingale best loves to make his nest, which is usually begun about the beginning of May. It is formed with coarse weeds and dry oak leaves outside, and horse and cow hair and little roots within—and it is usually built near the ground. The instinct of migration is very strong in the nightingale, and those kept in captivity—an Italian lady I know in Pisa, kept and reared a great many young nightingales—show great uneasiness and distress at the season when they ought to be on the wing.

Ford, in his "Lover's Melancholy," calls the nightingale "Nature's best skill'd musician."

PERUGINO (NO. 288).

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

ROOM VI.—THE UMBRIAN SCHOOL.

LET us now take our stand before the picture which has faced us in the distance from the first moment that we entered the Gallery. It has seemed to be drawing us on towards itself all this time. I mean the famous Raphael from the Duke of Marlborough's collection, known as the "Madonna degli Ansidei" (No. 1171), the picture that cost the nation the amazing sum of £70,000.

"Is it worth all that money?" one often hears asked; "and if so, what are the special beauties that give to it such an extraordinary money value?"

Let us see what answers can be given to these two queries.

In answer to the first query, something must be said about the subject—viz., the Madonna and Child. We must bear in mind that Raphael obtained a very great reputation for his treatment of this particular theme. He was the first painter who attempted to modify the stiff and conventional attitudes in which the Virgin had been always represented adoring the Infant Saviour.

He was the first to bring home to us the sweet feeling of the real human infancy of our Lord. At the same time, by the reverent expression on her face, we feel that the loving earthly mother is filled with a humble joy, as of one "who knew that she was most highly favoured amongst women." No other artist has been able to represent thus graciously the pure young mother who so loved her child even while she revered her God.

Raphael painted this subject often—perhaps most often in his youth. In the Vatican we may see the lovely Madonna di Foligno, painted for the Foligno family; in the Dresden Gallery the superb Madonna di San Sisto,* in which Pope Sixtus IV., who gives the name to the picture, is introduced. The Louvre in Paris boasts several exquisite versions of the same theme. No public National Gallery considers itself complete without at least one such treasure, and, I need scarcely add, having obtained it never parts with it. But until the Duke of Marlborough announced his willingness to part with this picture, it seemed as if our English gallery was to be the one gallery in all Europe insufficiently represented in this respect; the small picture known as the "Garvagh Madonna" (No. 744), though a very sweet little work, being hardly of sufficient importance to fulfil national requirements.

Thus the extreme difficulty of obtaining a much-valued subject explains to a great degree the extravagant price set upon it.

And now a few words with regard to its peculiar beauties as a work of art.

Let me here pause to remind my young readers that Raphael, in the course of his short lifetime, painted in three distinct and very markedly different styles. The first he acquired while he was the pupil of Perugino, in whose school he was trained, and in whose manner he painted until he visited Florence, he being then about twenty years of age. His second style lasted from the time of his first visit to Florence in 1503 until 1508, when he took up his abode in Rome, and is known as his Florentine manner; after that time he changed again very materially. His last is known as his Roman manner. He visited Florence, as I have said, first in his twentieth year, having previously painted many pictures, which have become famous, in Perugino's manner, and there fell at once under the influence of more advanced artists than those of the Umbrian School, amongst whom up to this date he may fairly be classed.

* A tracing of which, made by a distinguished German artist, has been placed in the National Gallery.

Hanging close by the Madonna degli Ansdei in the Gallery is one of the best works by Perugino (No. 288)—“The Virgin adoring the Infant Christ, on either side the Archangel Michael; the Archangel Raphael with the young Tobias” (see illustration). Here we recognise the formality of treatment of the central group and the two side compartments as characteristic of the early school, yet with considerable charm both of the colour and the sentiment.

Turn we now to the Raphael (No. 1171), “The Virgin and Child, attended by St. John the Baptist, and St. Nicholas of Bari.” We see the Madonna seated on a raised throne, under a canopy; she holds the Infant tenderly and reverently on her knee, while he pores over an open book, which she holds for him, with a sweet childish gravity; St. John the Baptist, on the left, gazes up at the Divine group with a rapt expression of intense love and devotion; on the right, St. Nicholas of Bari, in episcopal robes and holding his pastoral staff in one hand, bends over a book which he holds in the other. The formal composition of this picture is strictly in accordance with the mode of arrangement designed by Perugino. It is said that the commission was given to Raphael before he left Perugia, with the condition that the arrangement should be in Perugino’s manner. Such conditions were often made for pictures that were designed for altar-pieces, where a certain formality of style is proper and suitable.

Our other pictures by Raphael hang in a line facing us as we enter the room, with a fine altar-piece on either side by his early master; so that we are well able to compare the teacher with the pupil. We note the similar tones of pearly grey in the backgrounds in both artists, the formal arrangements of the figures, united with a certain similarity in the tender devotional expressions and attitudes, which are characteristic also of the other works of the School of Umbria by which we are in this room surrounded. But in Raphael’s pictures how much more character in the heads! How much more nature in the positions!

The “Madonna degli Ansdei” was painted in Florence in the year 1506: Raphael has inscribed his name and the date on the Virgin’s robe. It belongs, therefore, to his second or Florentine period. An art critic says justly of Raphael that “though he absorbed all that was excellent in the style of Perugino, he avoided its affectations, and seemed to take departure for a higher flight from the most exquisite among his teacher’s best paintings.” There are some critics who prefer this, Raphael’s Florentine work, so highly finished and so deeply devotional, to the larger style and the historical subjects of his later years.

The lovely “St. Catherine of Alexandria” (No. 168), which hangs near and is dated 1507, was also painted during his four years’ residence in Florence. Compare the sweet natural grace of the “St. Catherine” with the very similar action and sentiment in Perugino’s figure of the young Tobit in the side compartment of his famous altar-piece (No. 288), hanging near, and note the “little more” that just makes the difference between the natural grace in the Raphael and what I will venture to call the stilted sentimentality of Perugino.

The portrait of Pope Julius II. (No. 27), who sent for him to Rome in the following year, 1508, was probably painted soon after his arrival in the Holy City. There is a replica, or copy, of this portrait in the Pitti Palace in Florence.

“The Vision of a Knight; or, Duty and Pleasure” (No. 213). This exquisite little miniature picture (with the careful pen and ink study for it which hangs below) is believed to have been painted when Raphael was but seventeen. We therefore have before us a specimen of the three different epochs of the painter. At the South Kensington Museum there is a room set apart for the famous cartoons; and there we can best realise the later style of Raphael, for by those works, and by his frescoes in the Vatican, he is perhaps most known to fame. We learn from them to admire him as the founder of the Roman School of painters, most of whom were his immediate pupils and assistants in his larger works. But here in the National Gallery we can best appreciate the great genius first trying his young wings. And looking round the room, we clearly understand what was the nest out of which he sprang. Around us hang the pictures of Giovanni Santi, his father, and of Pietro Perugino, his master, besides works by Pinturicchio, Lo Spagna, and others, who were his companions and fellow-students in the bottega or workshop of Perugino. We see to what degree his early work resembled that of the painters of the lovely secluded Umbrian valley where he was born and bred, “shut off from the rest of the world, as if it had been one large convent garden.” Its stiff conventional manner was already becoming antiquated in the rest of Italy, and the highly-wrought tone of religious sentiment with which it was so deeply imbued was also considered somewhat old-fashioned and affected by the scholars and artists of Florence and Rome.

One great advantage has come to Raphael through working in the studio of Perugino—namely, that he there had the opportunity of thoroughly acquiring the Flemish art of painting in oils, discovered by the Van Eycks of Bruges, and but lately introduced into Italy. Perugino was among the earliest of the Italian painters to appreciate the value of the discovery, and to teach the method to his pupils.

A small picture, a “Madonna and Child” (No. 181), painted in tempera by Perugino, hangs near to his other altar-pieces, already referred to, and is very curious for comparison.

In this same room, near to the best work of Perugino and the youthful works of Raphael, hangs a picture (No. 1051) which has a great charm for me, as it seems to me to have a personal and interesting story of its own. The catalogue does not identify the artist further than to call him “of the Umbrian School.” He was probably some fellow-student of Raphael, very likely painting with him under the same master. The grey tone which pervades the work, one of the especial charms of Perugino, indicates clearly his date and country.

"Our Lord, St. Thomas, and St. Anthony of Padua." Let me attempt to write its history. My first guess would be that the picture was painted for a gentleman of Padua; this I infer from the fact that the donor, who kneels in the corner, is introduced to our Lord's notice by St. Anthony, the saint who was supposed to take the city of Padua under his particular care. The latter is represented in white robes, bearing the white lily, his emblem, in his hand. May we not imagine that the donor, like St. Thomas, has been a doubter, and that, like St. Thomas, he has been rescued from the pangs of doubt? In commemoration of his renewed faith he has ordered this picture to be painted to serve as encouragement for others in like mental trouble, and as a thank-offering for his own deliverance.

The reverential action of St. Thomas, as he moves forward to touch the wounds of our Lord, is very fine. Very beautiful, too, is the effect of the rich reds and dark olive-green of the draperies against the pale grey of the background. The mountains of Umbria lie beyond, distance beyond distance, in delicate aerial tints. The painters of that Umbrian valley never tired of reproducing its features in the backgrounds of their sacred subjects. It has been said that "both Perugino and Raphael often repeat their native scenes in the peaceful mountain valley in which they represent their youthful virgins cradling the infant Saviour."

St. Francis of Assisi was the favourite saint of the whole district. He had wandered in his lifetime, not two centuries previous, among these very hills and vales, a voluntary outcast from wealth and pleasure, chanting his pious canticles, dreaming dreams and seeing visions, and gaining followers to his ideal life of poverty and abnegation. His meagre form and gentle dreamy face reappear again and again in these Umbrian pictures. Now, overwhelmed with grief, he clings to the foot of the cross in representations of the Crucifixion; or again, he introduces some acolyte to the notice of the Virgin and Child, as they sit enthroned above.

Pinturicchio, in three highly decorative architectural pictures (Nos. 912, 913, 914), tells the story of the peasant maid Griselda, doubtless in honour of Poverty, Patience, and Meekness, the attributes of the much-loved saint whose marriage with the maiden Poverty was depicted by that great early painter Giotto, and sung of by Italy's greatest poet.

But while these paintings of the fifteenth century, so full of humble, tender, devout expression, tell us of the aspirations of men's hearts towards a new ideal of life, how different was the actual state of society by which they were but too frequently surrounded!

History describes this peaceful smiling valley, which we recognise in the background of so many sacred works, as "that Umbria which the Baglioni and the Popes laid waste from time to time with fire and sword." We read: "Often and often have the steps of the Duomo (the Cathedral of Perugia) run with blood. Once the whole church had to be washed with wine, and blessed anew, before the rites of Christianity could be resumed in its desecrated aisles." "No Italian city illustrates more forcibly than Perugia the violent contrasts of the earlier Renaissance. To many travellers the name of Perugia suggests at once the painter who, more than any other, gave expression to devout emotions in consummate work of pictorial art. They remember how Raphael, when a boy, with Pinturicchio, Lo Spagna, and Adone Doni, in the workshop of Pietro Perugino, learned the secret of that style to which he gave sublimity and freedom in his Madonnas di San Sisto, di Foligno, and del Cardellino. But the students of mediæval history in detail know Perugia far better as the lion's lair of one of the most ferocious broods of heroic ruffians which Italy can boast. To them the name of Perugia suggests at once the great house of the Baglioni, who drenched Umbria with blood, and gave the broad plains of Assisi to the wolf, and who through six successive generations bred captains for the armies of Venice, Florence, Naples, and the Church."*

The contrast seems a violent one, but it is one that we are constantly reminded of; for to these ever-renewed ferocious wars do we owe the loss of so many achievements of art. The works of Raphael have been fortunate, but those of his great rivals and contemporaries, Leonardo da Vinci and Michael Angelo, have been far less so.

Raphael died in 1520. He did not, therefore, live to see that terrible sack of Rome, when

"The Bourbon came over The Alps and their snow,"— when "in the year 1527 the Constable de Bourbon, at the head of an army of 40,000 men, composed for the most part of the completest ruffians in Europe, assaulted, entered, and sacked with every circumstance of atrocity, the city of Rome."

Raphael's works, possibly because they were chiefly on the walls of the sacred precincts of the Vatican, a spot which even the wildest soldiery would respect, were not damaged. But how many priceless pictures then disappeared! How many artists and literary men vanished after that dreadful time—died, no one knew how or where! Amongst the works that perished were those two splendid cartoons that the young Raphael had seen on that first visit of his to Florence in 1504, which had impressed him to such a degree that he at once set himself to change and enlarge his style in emulation of those noble masterpieces. And what were the works that he saw? you will perhaps wonderingly inquire.

They are thus described by Benvenuto Cellini, who was an ardent admirer of both his great contemporaries:

"Here was the first chef d'œuvre in which Michael Angelo evinced his great genius. He was working in rivalry with Leonardo da Vinci. Each of these cartoons represented an episode from the war (of the Florentines) with Pisa. The admirable Leonardo had chosen for his subject a group of horsemen contending for a standard . . . He acquitted himself of his task as divinely as it is possible to be imagined.

"Michael Angelo Buonarrotti represented some Florentine soldiers bathing in the Arno, when suddenly the trumpet sounds and all fly to arms. The hurried gestures, the excited movements of these figures, are such that neither the ancients nor the moderns have ever produced anything so perfect. . . . As long as these cartoons existed they served as models to the entire world of artists."

These two works had been commissioned by the Gonfalonier (or Governor) of Florence to adorn the two ends of the great Council Chamber in the Palazzo Vecchio.

We can fancy the young Raphael hastening, immediately on his arrival in Florence, to the Palazzo Vecchio, where these much-talked-of works by the two great artists, already so famous, were exhibiting. We imagine his astonishment at the vigorous drawing, the immense variety of figures in movement, the marvellous composition. Here was an art quite different from the highly-finished but tame works of Perugino and his followers, whose ideas of grouping were usually limited to the two central figures (of the Virgin and Child), always in much the same positions, with a saint or two on either side, carefully arranged to pair with each other, in some quiet and quite conventional attitude. These works are known as "The Cartoon of Pisa" and "The Battle of the Standard." We have cited Benvenuto Cellini's testimony to their great merits, to the estimation in which they were held. But a few years passed, and after exciting all this admiration they vanished; it is said they were cut in pieces in the wild times that were hanging over the city of Florence. They are now only partially known to us by copies, or engravings, of small portions of each work.

What the effect of these splendid works was on the mind of the young Raphael the immediate modification of style in his Florentine and subsequent work remains to show. His Cartoons, his Transfiguration, and all his noted works in the Vatican, bear witness, and justify the remark of Pope Julius II. made to a rival artist, some few years later: "Look at the works of Raphael," said the Pope, "who when he had seen the works of Michael Angelo suddenly forsook the manner of Perugino, and approached as near as he could to that of Michael Angelo."

Leonardo's works must, however, at that time have had as great, if not an even greater influence upon him.

Michael Angelo was only a few years his senior, but Leonardo was then in the very prime of his powers, and had lately executed two of his masterpieces at Milan. His wonderful Cena (or Last Supper) he had lately finished on the walls of the Refectory of the Convent of the Madonna delle Grazie. It had been painted at the request of Ludovico il Moro, Duke of Milan, as an offering to the memory of his lost wife, Beatrice d'Este, whom the Duke had loved and passionately mourned. The noble grouping, the pathetic moment chosen in that famous work ("And one of you shall betray Me"), the varied expressions of the twelve Disciples, stamp the work as one of the world's masterpieces. It is too well known for it to be necessary for me to do more than refer to it. Leonardo had also just completed another splendid work, the equestrian statue of the same duke, when Milan was invaded and conquered by the French king, Charles VIII. Duke Ludovic was put in prison, where he died miserably, and the French soldiers made the noble statue a target for their arrows. Milan was no longer a place where artists, or any who lived by the arts of peace, could live or find work to do, and Leonardo and his friends and pupils fled to his native Florence, where, as we have seen, he was at once employed by the Government to adorn the Council Chamber with his great thoughts.

The picture we have by this master in the National Gallery, "The Virgin and Child, with the infant St. John and an Angel" (No. 1093), was painted before he left Florence for Milan, when he was about twenty-three years of age. It shows a power of modelling and a knowledge of grouping which are something quite different from the conventional arrangements of Perugino and his predecessors. A glance at my two illustrations (of the Perugino and Leonardo) will at once explain my meaning. In Leonardo's picture the figures do actually occupy the landscape in which they are placed. It is not simply painted in behind them, like a scene in a theatre, as in the earlier pictures. Then, again, look at the modelling; the heads stand out, they are really round. Again, the grouping; see how naturally the four figures place themselves round the Divine Infant. All eyes are directed towards Him, and as we look from one to another, each one leads our attention to the central figure: the mother, who leans tenderly over him, as if she said, "hear Him;" the angel, who turns towards us to draw us into the heart of the picture, and seems to echo the mother's words; and the little Baptist, who bends his knee and clasps his chubby hands together in reverence—all turn towards Him; while He, with a look beyond his years, as if conscious of the Divinity within Him, raises His baby hands in benediction. The shadows of the rocks close in the group, but we see the River of Life sparkling in the distance. It flows to the feet of the Infant Saviour, and breaks into flowers at His feet.

There is a replica of this picture in the Louvre, known as the "Vierge aux Rochers" (see illustration), in which there are some small differences from the picture of the same subject that we possess, the chief variations being the position of the right hand of the angel, which is raised in the one picture but not in the other, while the reed cross, against the shoulder of the little Baptist is wanting in the Louvre version.

In Leonardo's journal there is the following entry: "In the autumn of 1478 I began the two Madonna pictures." This apparently refers to the "Vierge aux Rochers," meaning probably the studies from life preparatory for the painting of the pictures. Some of these charming studies are in existence. One, evidently for the angel's head, is in the Royal Library at Turin. The study for the head of the little John Baptist is in the Louvre. That for the Infant Christ, in red chalk, is in the Windsor Collection, and a second of the same is in the Louvre.

Leonardo was in the habit of making most careful studies previously to commencing any work, trying the attitudes over and over again with slight differences, so as to attain to the utmost perfection in his work that was possible.

I have given a larger sketch of the head of the angel in this picture, to attempt to render the indescribable charm of the smile which seems about to play upon the lips. It is said of Leonardo by Vasari, that quite in his early youth "he used to make models of women smiling." Vasari adds, "Two ideas were especially fixed in him, as reflexes of things that had touched his brain in childhood beyond the measure of other impressions—the smiling of women and the motion of great waters." I do not know of any picture existing which shows us the motion of great waters; but his portraits of women are illusion itself, more skilful in modelling than that of any artist before or since; and one of the most noted, the portrait known as Mona (Madonna) Lisa, or La Gioconda, in the Louvre, has been called the portrait of a smile, "of a subtle, shadowy, uncertain smile." Vasari continues to speak of him thus. He says: "Truly admirable indeed, and divinely endowed, was Leonardo da Vinci, in whom—to say nothing of the beauty of his person, which yet was such that it has never yet been sufficiently extolled—there was a grace beyond expression, which was rendered manifest without thought and effort in every act and deed, and who had, besides, so rare a gift of talent and ability that to whatsoever subject he turned his attention, however difficult, he presently made himself master of it."

After awakening our curiosity and enthusiasm about this wonderful man, it is distressing to read the following in a later biography. "A singular fatality has ruled the destiny of nearly all the most famous of Leonardo da Vinci's works."*

The same writer who makes this observation has, however, edited and translated the journals and precious MSS. of Leonardo, which have fortunately been preserved to this day, and he thereby lets us into the secret workings of that great artist's mind, and makes us know him as the profoundest thinker and observer of his time. He continues: "It is due to nothing but a fortuitous succession of unfortunate circumstances that we should not, long since, have known Leonardo, not merely as a painter, but as an author, a philosopher, and a naturalist. There can be no doubt that in more than one department, his principles and discoveries were infinitely more in accord with the teachings of modern science than with the views of his contemporaries. For this reason his extraordinary gifts and merits are more likely to be appreciated in our own time than they would have been during the preceding centuries. He has been unjustly accused of having squandered his powers, by beginning a variety of studies, and then, having hardly begun, throwing them aside. The truth is that the labours of three centuries have hardly sufficed for the elucidation of some of the problems which occupied his mighty mind."

"Those who can judge, describe him as anticipating long before, by rapid intuition, the later ideas of science," while those who have learned to study the phenomena of nature in Ruskin's works will find the method and insight anticipated, three centuries ago, in these memoranda of the mighty Florentine, who was the contemporary of Perugino and the predecessor of Raphael.

The new rooms give us a very complete survey of the rise and progress of the great Tuscan or Florentine School of Painting—such a survey as we could obtain in no other single gallery in all Europe. We see its infancy in the second room, its cognate branches of Ferrara, Bologna, and Umbria in the fifth and sixth rooms, while its progress to perfection is shown in the first and third rooms.

The artistic aim of this school, from first to last, was to realise the perfection of form rather than colour, and profound religious feeling was throughout its characteristic.

* Preface to "Literary Works of Leonardo da Vinci, compiled from the original MSS.," by Dr. Jean Paul Richter.

In its earlier phase the artists were imbued with the teachings of St. Francis of Assisi; in the time of Leonardo and Michael Angelo, the Dominican monk, Savonarola, the great Reformer (who may be called the precursor of Martin Luther), swayed men's minds when he lifted up his voice against the corruptions of the age in which he lived. Many artists, Sandro Botticelli amongst others, were so affected by his preaching that they actually brought their own pictures and flung them into the flames of the great bonfire in the public market-place of Florence, which was kindled in answer to Savonarola's call to destroy the "vanities" of life; some, as Fra Bartolommeo, abjured their art altogether and became monks, thinking to please God better so than by painting pictures.* Some, like Michael Angelo and Luca Signorelli, devoted their great artistic powers to illustrating the preacher's burning words, and, penetrated by horror of the wickedness and corruption which they saw in the high places, show us upon canvas all the terrors of the awful last judgment that shall descend and punish the wickedness of the world. These subjects we may see and shudder at over the high altar in the Sistine Chapel in Rome, and again on the walls of the Cathedral at Orvieto. Neither of these two great artists can be known in their full strength by the works we possess by them in the National Gallery. As well could we judge the size of a giant from seeing his little finger. Still, we cannot fail to recognise in the two unfinished works of Michael Angelo the largeness of style and the grand simple naturalness of the drawing of the figures in No. 790 and No. 809. We can quite imagine his indignation when Perugino ventured to criticise his drawing; and may excuse his retaliating by calling the latter "an artistic dunce" (un goffo nell' arte), an anecdote told of the two men by Vasari, the friend of Michael Angelo, and the historian of the Florentine School of painters, to whose delightful pages I would refer my young readers. I think they will find the book as interesting and amusing as a good novel.

Vasari was a Florentine, and is accused of unduly favouring his fellow-townsmen in his history, and of being unjust in his estimate of the artists of other schools than his own. He has also been called a sad old gossip.

I will, therefore, conclude with the hope that a perusal of his biographies will stimulate a desire in the minds of my young friends to dip deeper into the pages of history. If they do, they will certainly be rewarded by finding an increased interest in the pictures painted by the artists of the Renaissance, for the pictures and the history help to illustrate and to explain each other.

VARIETIES.

CLEANLINESS NEXT TO GODLINESS.—"Cleanliness is next to godliness" is a proverb. Some hold the statement as of biblical origin, but it is not. Others attribute it to the famous John Wesley who, perhaps, put it into the terse form in which it runs; but it is ages older than Wesley, for it came down in the tractate Mishna from an old Jewish book where it read, "Outward cleanliness is inward purity or piety." It is so; and if by some magic spell England could wake to-morrow morning physically clean, she would wake also pure in spirit and godly in comprehension of goodness.—Dr. Richardson.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCE.—"I remember," says Lord Eldon, "a case of a murder in which the guilty man was taken up twelve years after the deed. He had made his escape, and though every search was made he could not be found. Twelve years afterwards the brother of the murdered man was at Liverpool in a public-house. He fell asleep, and was awoke by someone picking his pocket. He started up, exclaiming, 'Heavens! the man that killed my brother twelve years ago!' Assistance came to him, the man was secured, tried and condemned. He had enlisted as a soldier and gone to India immediately after the deed was committed; and he had just landed at Liverpool on his return, when his first act was to pick the pocket of the brother of the man he had murdered twelve years before. It was very extraordinary that the man, waking out of his sleep, should so instantly know him."

INJURING ONESELF.—No one ever did a designed injury to another without doing a greater to herself.

SUCCESS AND FAILURE.—Sometimes a noble failure serves the world as faithfully as a distinguished success.

HOUSEKEEPING.

D. A.—We are delighted to hear how well you succeeded in decorating your own "studio," and making it pretty; so much can be done in that way by clever heads and willing hands.

IRENE.—We strongly advise you to send your silk and wool tapestry tablecloths and curtains to a cleaner, as the probability is that they will be ruined at home by inexperienced hands. Cleaning is so inexpensive, it would cost you less than to buy new ones to replace what was spoilt.

AN APPRECIATIVE READER is thanked for her kind letter. We gave a full account of washing with paraffin oil in the Answers to Correspondents, page 783, vol. ix. We have seen lately in an American paper that half an ounce of soap and one teaspoonful of paraffin are the proper proportions to a gallon of water. Therefore when washing it would be easy to add water with these quantities of oil and soap. You must always keep a good lather. Opinions differ so much with regard to this recipe; many people consider it excellent, while others think it worthless. It certainly does help many people like yourself to manage washing at home who never have done it before.

DAISY may produce the écru colour for her curtains by using a strong coffee rinse. The depth of the colour will be produced in proportion to the strength of the coffee. But just at present it appears we have returned to old ideas, and are using pure white in preference to either écru or cream. But perhaps in London écru has advantages in not showing the effects of smoke and fog.

PENELOPE.—You can obtain any kind of stain and varnish for your floors. We prefer stain and beeswax dissolved to the substance of butter in turpentine, and rubbed in with a hard brush, so as to polish instead of varnish them. But you must beware of the inflammable nature of this mixture in melting it. All you require can be had at a good oil-shop. The depth of the floor exposed to view round the room must depend on the size of the central carpet or rugs employed. You might stain and polish the whole floor if you liked. Such floors must always be in good taste, or as you term it, "fashionable." If you have a large table in the drawing-room, do not place it in the middle of the room, nor arrange the books all round it, so as to give it a starfish appearance.

COOKERY.

PENN.—We gave a recipe for "Queen Cakes" in vol. ii., page 303, but in case you have not got that early volume we now give a fresh one. Take half a pound of dry flour, half a pound of sifted white sugar, six ounces of currants (well washed and rubbed in a coarse cloth), six beaten fresh eggs, half a pound of good butter, dissolved, but not in oil, the grated rind of half a lemon, and two tablespoonfuls of brandy. Mix all these ingredients together in the order in which we have given them, and beat the mixture for ten minutes. Then pour it into small moulds, and bake in a quick oven for about a quarter of an hour. We object to gigantic writing.

DOROTHY and SYLVIA.—You will find our recipe for "Maids of Honour" at page 255, vol. vii.; and for Trifle at page 727, vol. vii. For Potato Cheese Cakes at page 95, vol. v.; and for Apple Cheese Cakes at page 23, vol. v. You should consult our indexes; or if you failed to procure them for each volume, you should look through our recipes yourself, as it is a lazy and thoughtless thing to ask us to give our time all over again, either in writing recipes twice or three times, or in hunting through our volumes, which you could do for yourself.

ART.

SARAH.—No picture has been sold from the Pitti Palace, nor is it likely any will be sold, for the Italian Government prohibits the exportation of works of art. The "Holy Family" you mean was purchased from a well-known private gallery in England.

HOPE.—Your drawings do you great credit, if you have had no lessons; they show much talent. We hope that those around you will get you some lessons as speedily as possible; it will be such an additional amusement and pleasure to you. We admire your cheerful patience under your affliction. A two years' illness is a long one, but you have had time "to draw near to God," which quiet time in private is denied to many others in this busy restless life, and "He is a very present help."

STUDENT OF ART.—You should get a biographical dictionary of the great Italian masters. There is a small inexpensive one "by a Lady" (Maria Farquhar, edited by R. N. Wornum) which would be very useful to you, especially in your studies at our National Gallery. Titian, or Tiziano Vecellio, died of the plague at the same time as his son Orazio, a good portrait painter, at Venice, August 27th, 1576, being then ninety-nine years of age. He and Giorgione often worked together, and their respective frescoes and portraits were scarcely distinguishable one from the other.

MARCELLINA.—The pebbles may be painted on the rough surface without polishing; a smooth, even place, free from holes, being selected, and the stone washed thoroughly and dried; then fill in the small unevennesses and holes with a mixture of parchment, size, and whiting, applied with a palette knife; lay on smoothly, and when dry rub down with a piece of sandpaper to make it level, and paint over with flake white for the ground colour. When dry, take a lead pencil and trace out the chief lines of your drawing on the pebble, and then go on with the painting in the ordinary manner. We have given these directions in a very recent series of answers.

DENDRON and A GALWAY GIRL are both thanked for their information that thick, uncrumpled, brown paper, oiled with ordinary linseed oil, and then carefully painted with a background or foundation of "Aspinal enamel," will, when dry, offer a suitable foundation for painting a subject, either for a hand screen or any other article with a flat surface. 2. There are many German and French papers published in England, which could be ordered at any railway bookstall. 3. Do not meddle with a hen when hatching; they dislike even to be looked at, and might desert the eggs. If proposing to rear chickens you should always prepare a comfortable dry nest in a secluded corner, on a shelf or cupboard off the ground, of which the hen will probably take advantage.

MISCELLANEOUS.

JESS.—You will find the two characters, called "Minna" and "Brenda," in Sir Walter Scott's "Pirate." The "God of Thunder," so-called in the heathen mythology, was "Jove."

A. E. LORD.—There is some promise and poetical feeling in your verses, but they would not suit our magazine. We are gratified by your appreciation of our work.

LILLIE ROSLIN.—We should not attempt to write books until we had been inspired with original ideas, or with a new method of reproducing old but valuable ones. If you have not such an inspiration we could not assist you to one. You are too young to publish your own little fancies; it is, on the contrary, the time for learning. Make the most of your opportunities for improving yourself in the schoolroom, and learn to spell.

ONE OF A THOUSAND could obtain all our early volumes if she advertised for them. She had better write to our own publisher, Mr. Tarn, first, and obtain from him any still in stock. We are glad that you value our paper so much, and send us our best wishes. The verses do not quite suit the "G.O.P."

CANTERBURY.—A doctor recommends ablutions in boracic acid—one part of acid to twenty parts of hot water—for the excessive perspiration. Boracic acid pulverised and mixed with starch is also a useful dusting powder.

A. B. E.—Your puzzle, "If a hen and a half laid an egg and a half in a day and a half, how many eggs would six hens lay in seven days?" can be easily answered. Tell your inquiring friends that their hens would have laid forty-two eggs in a week.

HUNGARIAN GIRL.—We read your well-expressed letter with much interest. You are at liberty to make any extract from our paper, provided you state whence it was taken, for the purpose you name. We are, indeed, glad that you like it so much.

SPERANZA (Riviera de Genoa).—Your letter has gratified us much, and your English does you credit, but it is not sufficiently correct in its idiom, and the use of certain words and tenses of verbs, to write verses. At the same time you have done yourself credit in what you have accomplished. We regret they would not suit our paper.

TROUBLED ONE.—You should find a way of making restitution to anyone you have defrauded. Send the amount due in money, making a guess at the probable debt, and write (in a registered letter) a few words, unsigned, stating that the money was due from one who repents of some petty acts of dishonesty committed in childhood, and wishes to make restitution, as becomes a believer in Christ, and one penitent for her misdoings. The sin you name of ascribing the miracles of Christ to devil-possession instead of the Holy Ghost within Him, involves the rejection of Christ persisted in. We have many times explained this.

FIREFLY.—We advise you not to leave your father alone. You might arrange, perhaps, to go for an hour's instruction in housekeeping to your aunt; and if not you might obtain a great deal from articles in our paper, such as "She Couldn't Boil a Potato," which begin at page 36 of vol. viii., and continue through the paper.

LADY BETTY should cut the over-long claws of her canary, or they may become entangled in the bars of the cage, and the legs be broken, or at least the toes. But she must be careful not to cut them too much; only take off a little at the ends.

EAGER FOR KNOWLEDGE.—Hereward the Wake (or, the Vigilant), Lord of Born, Lincolnshire, who resisted the Conqueror, the Earl of Morcar uniting with him, supplies the name and the subject to one of Kingsley's novels, and is popularly called "Hereward."

C. H.—To manufacture papier mâché you must employ, as the name signifies, waste paper repulped, and press it into moulds to take the form you desire. Get old "wall posters" if you can; because the paste will render it the more suitable for the purpose. When the article is made it must be varnished, coating it with successive coats of Japan black, in which thin slices of mother-o'-pearl should be embedded, so as to form an ornamental design. Many coats of the Japan black will be needed to bring up the foundation to a level with the mother-o'-pearl. Then the surface must be smoothed and carefully polished and finished with a coat of colour or of gold, and one of transparent varnish. When very fine varieties of papier mâché are produced, sheets of paper glued together are employed instead of pulp, which are damped and moulded in the same way as the latter.

A READER.—"A morbid state of mind" may arise from a disordered state of the liver, or some other physical trouble. Consult a doctor, as no one could prescribe for a stranger, whose age, constitution, and circumstances of life are utterly unknown. Good food, moderate outdoor exercise, early retirement to bed, and active work by day, are the best methods for ultimate cure, always provided that any particular physical disorder be attended to in the first place.

ANCHOR.—Perhaps you read at night, or try your eyes with fine needlework. We have no means of knowing the cause, which precludes our giving advice, excepting that you should show them to a doctor or an experienced apothecary. Perhaps you have a cold in them, or the redness may arise from a disordered state of constitution. Your cousin, perhaps, makes herself sleepy by reading after dinner.

CHEYRON.—Certainly you can purchase a coat of arms, chosen for you at the Herald's Office, if you care to buy what has no family interest, nor reference to gallant deeds of arms which won them, as hereditary distinctions, on the field of battle. We refer you to our series of articles on "Heraldry" and "The Days of Chivalry" in our last year's volume. But in these modern times, of course, you can "honourably use" what you have purchased. A son cannot take the arms of his mother's family unless he change his name for hers, and purchase a legal right to bear them. Possibly the persons to whom you refer obtained a legal right to the arms and liveries by purchase, which is very commonly done on the acquisition of property. It must be entirely a matter of personal feeling, and, under special circumstances, one of expediency and worldly advantage.

A WARY ONE.—In such a case the proper person not only to give you advice, but likewise permission to send the birthday card to your "bosom-friend's brother," is your mother. Supposing we thought you might send it, she might think it inexpedient; and her will should be a law to you.

ANXIOUS TO KNOW.—September 5th, 1847, was a Sunday; July 18th, 1850, was a Thursday; December 1st, 1858, was a Wednesday.

CHAPTER V.

THE ALARM BELLS OF ST. MARY'S AND ST. MARTIN'S.

WHEN Kitty Dacre was between fifteen and sixteen, one of the riots for which Oxford had long an unenviable notoriety took place, and the was fraught with misfortune to the Dacres. Kitty had often heard of these tumults, which frequently arose from the most trifling causes—customers finding fault with a vintner's wine, or quarrelling among themselves about the cast of a die or the length of a feather, or scholars sallying forth in bands at the hours when they ought to have been in their respective colleges, roaming in search of idle excitement or bound to revenge some fancied insult, till chancellor and proctors, mayor and aldermen were all drawn into the fray. On one occasion the fray lasted not merely for the dark hours of a single winter's night, but broke out again and again, day after day, till halls and hostels, and the private houses of the citizens were sacked as in a siege, the streets and lanes encumbered with the slain. And the wrath of the King and his council fell heavily on those who were proved to have been the first assailants in the chronic strife. What Oxford maid who knew anything had not heard a tradition of the great riot on St. Scholastica's Day, the 10th of February, 1354, when three "clerks of Owsenford," hot with bad wine, if you would believe them, came to blows, not with each other, unfortunately, but with the owner of a tavern called "Swyndlestock," opposite St. Martin's Church, and rushed out shouting the students' war-cry, "Gown, Gown, into Town!" Roger de Chesterfield, one of themselves, led the students, and John de Beresford, the mayor, the citizens, who were reinforced to the number of two thousand men by the inhabitants of the villages in Bucks, Berks, and Oxon nearest to the city. These allies came pouring in by the north, south, east, and west gates, till the riot assumed the proportions of an insurrection in the eyes of the alarmed king, then at his neighbouring palace of Woodstock. The conflict lasted for three days, the students fighting with bows and arrows, swords and staves; the townsmen and their supporters with pikes, axes, and such rural tools as scythes and reaping hooks which came readily to hand. Whenever the fury of the onset slackened the bells of St. Mary's, the students' church, which should have rung—

"Peace and goodwill,
Goodwill and peace,
To all mankind," clamoured to summon fresh batches of students to replace their beaten-back brethren, and were met by the answering clamour of the bells of St. Martin's, the citizens' church,* calling for more men from the shops, and stalls, and boats, the plough and the thrashing-floor, the forest and the fen, to stand by the people. Forty students and twenty-three townsmen were slain, besides many hurt and wounded, while the city was given over to the rioters.

When peace was restored, the King and his council, judging, rightly or wrongly, that the town, which had shown itself dangerously in the ascendant, was most to blame, inflicted on it a sharp chastisement and a protracted humiliation. Annually, at St. Mary's Church, the mayor, city bailiff, and citizens, to the number of the original quota of victims slain on either side in the riot, attended to help in the celebration of a mass for the souls of the slain students, and to pay each man a penny, to go to the maintenance of forty poor students, and the increase of the curate's income. The mass had been exchanged for prayers and a sermon at the Reformation, and these had dwindled into the Litany alone. Once the service had been intermitted for as long as fifteen years, and then resumed, with the payment of a substantial fine to make up for the withheld pennies. In Kitty's day, the transformed and shorn rite which had lasted, off and on, for nearly three centuries, was still performed. She had seen with her own eyes the chief magistrate of Oxford and a procession of the townsmen walking, in sullen ceremony and hardly-concealed chafing, two and two, bound for St. Mary's, there to atone for their predecessors' wrath and prowess on the fatal day of St. Scholastica.

The town might have been supposed to have learnt its lesson, for though there had been many a fierce tussle between town and gown in every generation, there had been nothing at all equal to the battle of classes in the Middle Ages. There had not been anything Kitty could remember, though a sword continued to be part of a gentleman's dress, whether for morning or evening wear, and was not unfrequently present beneath a scholar's gown; while a cudgel was in every apprentice's and countryman's hand, when he went abroad after work hours. So it was with no thought of anything wrong that Kitty, as she sat at her seam one January morning, about noon—for she was looking for her father's making his appearance at dinner—in the year 1641, the year following that in which she had gathered fritillaries with her cousins in Merton meadows, heard a sudden clash and discord of bells over the sounds of Oriel Lane and the streets beyond. The peal and tinkle of bells was no unusual sound in the city, of monks first and scholars afterwards, but as a rule they rang one at a time, or else in tune and harmony.

"Hark! Why are the bells ringing together and out of tune?" cried Kitty, flinging down her work and running out to Mrs. Judith, who was in the small ante-room that served for household stores, and such washings up of glass and china, and making and mending of household linen, or supplementary cooking and brewing as did not come within the province of the college servants. "There do be more than one bell ringing wildly; can his Majesty the King be come to Oxford? Or can there be great news of some glorious victory, though I wot not that we were at war, Mrs. Judy?"

Mrs. Judy was not listening to the girl. She was harkening to the bells, with one hand holding back her hood behind her right ear, though she had never admitted herself to be so much as dull of hearing before, and with a scared look on her comely, cheery, elderly face.

"Alake! alake!" she said; "if it be not the bells of St. Mary's and St. Martin's sounding the alarm against each other, and not knowing which shall get out their fearsome tale the loudest and the fastest! There's bad blood between gentle and simple in Oxford town this day, Mrs. Kitty. I heard the college and the town bells ring like mad against each other once before, and that was when I was a young wench no older than thou art, and my mother could call to mind a worse bout just before I was born; but that was more between my Lord Norreys, who had given offence to one of the colleges and the college he had offended, than between town and gown. But my lord was the King's lieutenant at the time, and what should hinder the town from taking his part until the chancellor and his company flung themselves between the young masters and my lord and his servants, and hailed the lads back to their desks and books, not without bloodshed."

"You do not think the bells mean two raging mobs, and mayhap Jackie in one of them?" asked Kitty, under her breath, with her rosy cheeks beginning to pale and her lips to tremble.

"God forbid!" prayed Mrs. Judy, fervently; "though he's so venturesome a slip of a scholar, and so set on upholding what he judges to be the right, that a body cannot depend upon him. His clothes will be torn from his back at the least."

"Nay, never mind his clothes; their destruction will be nought. You said 'bloodshed,' Mrs. Judy," cried Kitty, with a gasp.

Then Dr. Peter Dacre came into the room from his bedchamber, which was his study for greater privacy, since even Mrs. Judy's retiring room and pantry were lined with bookshelves.

"What's agog, Judy?" he demanded, with some vehemence. "These mutinous rogues and villains of New and Magdalen are not at their rebellious tricks, are they?"

"Father," protested Kitty, in amazement and dismay, "have you forgot that Jack is at Magdalen now, and so is Cousin Anthony? You don't class them with rogues and villains?"

Ever since that day in the Merton meadows last spring, when the truth had been broken to her, Kitty, though still so young, had become more and more conscious that her countrymen were divided. They had been united and strong in their union when the mass of the people became Protestants in the days of King Henry and Good Queen Bess, when they defeated the Great Spanish Armada, and rejoiced from the one end of the land to the other, Catholic striking hands with Protestant over the national deliverance.

They had still been outwardly united when with one voice they had called King James to succeed his cousin on the throne; when they welcomed King Charles to fill his father's seat, and declared that, for personal virtue and a refined taste in learning and art, he even surpassed his lamented brother, Henry Prince of Wales. Yet here was this once united England rent asunder by conflicting factions, with the whisper waxing louder and louder every day, that the time was coming when they must fight out their quarrel to the ghastly end. Still Kitty was not prepared to hear the students of Magdalen, of whom her old Jackie was one, defined as miscreants.

"If it be not so, what meaneth the scandalous reports which are rife of disgraceful brawls, in which harmless maypoles are pulled down, and well-warranted effigies of snivelling Puritan preachers—rank raisers of ill-will and dispeace—wrested from the hands of honester men than their assailants, who belike are bearing and burning the images in maintenance of the honour of the church? If the students of Magdalen and New keep company with traitors, fledged or unfledged, in order to aid and abet them in their felonious practices, the misguided fools must even abide by the consequences," stormed Dr. Dacre.

A great change had come over Dr. Peter Dacre. He had been by nature a quiet, pacific man, half suspected of timidity. He had lived buried among his books, troubling nobody and counting on nobody's troubling him. The great shock and overthrow of his earlier life, caused by the death of his wife, had rather intensified than altered his character. To the last he had refused to take into account the signs of a new era, and had contented himself with opposing abounding evils by a passive resistance, and with enjoining on others to do the same. Wrong would right itself, if one but waited long enough for the process. A hereditary monarchy was the central principle of English politics, and loyalty to the reigning monarch forbade the slightest doubt of his ability to cope, sooner or later, with long-standing abuses, bad advisers, constitutional prejudices; and with this new tumultuous element in the situation, this sudden growth of the Commons, hectoring and obstreperous as all young forces which had broken their bounds were sure to be.

Dr. Peter's fine, scholarly head was bald, and his face shrunk and pallid—the effect of a long and severe course of brain work, and much confinement to the exhausted, musty air of his college rooms. But he had never seen in his whole experience any good come of a sudden subversion of right rule and lawful supremacy—indeed, of violent changes of any kind. Like many peaceable men pushed to an extremity and driven to resistance, he showed himself passionate and reckless after a certain point, totally unlike his old self.

He had been pleased with his son's progress at college, and had entertained a kinsmanly regard for his nephew, Anthony Walton. But within the last few months these sentiments had undergone a decided modification. It had become notorious in Oxford that the Mitre Tavern was not a better known rallying-ground of Papists and Jesuits than were Magdalen and New Colleges nests of Puritanism.

Dr. Dacre was an absent-minded man, leading a retired life. He was much more conversant with the different currents of politics in ancient Greece and Rome, at any time, than with their parallel in mother England and Oxford in the seventeenth century. Thus he, a staunch supporter of Church and State, discovered the strong bias of Magdalen too late to prevent his son being first enrolled on the college books, and afterwards obtaining one of its demys, as Anthony Walton had done before him. The father took it ill of his nephew that he had not delivered a warning in time, and, in the room of the Doctor's old liking, he bore a bitter grudge against the offender, and was on the road to conceiving a violent antipathy to him. Men like Dr. Dacre, slow in taking offence (for that matter deliberate in mental movement of any kind, and gentle in temper), are in danger, when fairly roused and brought to bay, of showing themselves like women—passionate, unreasonable, implacable. But, in fact, the time had come when a woman such as Lady Ottery, though, like most elderly persons, inclined more and more to be conservative in her views, was at once more liberal and more forbearing than her learned friend, Dr. Dacre, appeared likely to prove. Certainly she too had changed in some respects, but it was rather in a mellowing than in a souring and fermenting of the old strongminded, outspoken nature. She was more of a king's and queen's woman to-day, when the monarchy was affording every symptom, to clear-sighted eyes, of passing under a cloud, than she had been five years before, when Charles and Henrietta Maria had come with undiminished state and splendour, and hardly a premonitory shadow over the bright picture to grace the chancellor's rule, and be feasted and entertained by their university of Oxford. It was not merely that the days of the old plots and persecutions were farther off with the memories of their sufferings dimmed; all the woman's generosity was aroused by the first muttering of the impending storm. At the same time she could not forget what she had learnt in her own adversity; she could not be unjust or inveterate either in her loves or her hates.

Dr. Peter Dacre, when he had become apprised of the danger, had done what he could to defend his son from the contaminating influence of his college, and, doubtless, of his cousin, since he had been guilty of permitting Jack's introduction into what, to Anthony's knowledge, must by that time have been a hotbed of sedition. But not only had the son passed beyond the father's control; in a large measure there had arisen between them in their very likeness that sensitive reserve and suspicion which not infrequently separate disastrously those who, under the galling restraint and bewildering misconceptions they have imposed upon themselves, are still by natural affection and kindred ties strongly attached to each other.

Dr. Dacre was calling for his hat and gown, and preparing to go out into the streets to ascertain for himself the extent of the disturbance, and Kitty was clinging to him and trying to hold him back; was it not enough that her brother might be in the tumult? must her father expose himself too? She begged him to stay with her and Mrs. Judy, at least till the members of Oriel were summoned, and he should go out with the others at the call of duty. Her distress was not caused by mere cowardice; she was by far too healthy in body and mind, and too sensible for her years to be a prey to hysterical panic; she was brave enough to have been a soldier's instead of a scholar's daughter. Poor Kitty was haunted by an apprehension which was sufficiently terrible to have daunted a woman of any age—lest her father and her brother should find themselves on opposite sides in the fierce quarrel—lest Dr. Dacre should openly denounce his son, and John Dacre should publicly defy his father. For what will not men, when their blood is up and they are in the thick of a fight, say or do, which they may live to regret to their dying day?

"Let a-be, Kitty," Dr. Dacre angrily forbade his daughter's further interference. "How often am I to tell you that women have no call to meddle in such matters? Keep thyself quiet here with Judy, shut thine eyes and ears as far as thou canst. For me I must out, and be at the bottom of this pestilent business."

Time was when Dr. Peter would have counted himself in the light of a man of peace and of letters, as exempt from any call to interfere in a scene of strife which had nothing to do with his college as Kitty could be. But the man was changed; he was now feverishly anxious to vindicate all he owed to King, Church, and State, by defending them furiously from the most distant approach to an attack.

Kitty was left behind, and as she sat listening to her father's hurried, somewhat uncertain step descending the stair, and mingling with the clang of the bells, she sank down in a dejected attitude on the window-seat, and mechanically watched the stragglers making their way to the fray.

"Now, don't take on so, Mrs. Kitty," Mrs. Judy proceeded to comfort the girl in the old woman's brisk, encouraging tones. "It may all blow over, and nought come of it. I could wish I had bitten my tongue out before I told you which were them bells and what they were saying."

"Nonsense, Mrs. Judy!" said Kitty, with the impatience of a young girl at being kept in the dark and with a natural inclination to assert her supremacy as her father's daughter and Judy's young mistress. "Of course I'm bound to know everything. I'm not a baby any longer; what would be the good of my remaining in ignorance? Oh, Judy, Judy, what is that? Are they coming this way? What are they doing?"

"Be still and hold back from the case-mistress," cried Mrs. Judy, exerting all her old authority on the instant. "Neither thou nor I, my poor lamb, can do aught either to stay or to help them, and it may be best both for thee and them, not only now but in the time to come, when somebody must be called to account for this day's work, that there be not any sign that either good or bad was heard or seen from my master's windows."

By some chance in the warfare a party of rioters, closely pursued by their enemies, had rushed down Oriel Lane, and were struggling in a free fight past the college. As yet the townsmen were only using their fists and such cudgels as were among them; while the students, who were seeking to rout their hereditary foes, laid about them with canes and the flat sides of the few swords which had seen the light. But the spectacle of the wedged-in, buffeting and buffeted crowd, surging hither and thither, as if driven by the wind, and incapable of staying itself, with here and there a man or a couple of men falling with a crash, and rolling over on the stones; and those who were behind and those who were before swaying backwards and forwards for a moment, and then closing over the blank in their ranks—was enough to startle and horrify eyes unaccustomed to such sights. In their least ghastly shape they still present the spectacle of raging wild beasts rather than of men—fathers, husbands, brothers, beside themselves for the instant, striking and tearing at each other in terrible forgetfulness of all save the delirium of the fight.

Once and again the shrill scream of a woman rose above the roar of the men, and some poor, weak creature, rendered a virago by the danger of one of those nearest and dearest to her, her woman's clothes fluttering wildly in the winter wind, fought to stem the tide and to force a passage into the throng, that simply thrust her aside and rushed on unheeding.

The townsmen in their doublets and hose, some of them wearing the tall beavers of gentlemen, instead of the caps of tradesmen and apprentices, were to the front, not so much chased against their will by their assailants as tearing along with an object of their own in view. They were declining to be stopped by the troop of students and university men, many of them beyond their first youth, wearing the hoods of doctors and the velvet sleeves of proctors in addition to the ordinary scholar's hat and gown.

"Gown, gown, into Town," the old rallying cry rose and rang, while the conflicting bells of St. Mary's and St. Martin's jangled and clashed as if they meant to bring down their respective church roofs on the peaceful dead sleeping below.

They were not all Romans who were with Rome in the riot. Among the gownsmen there were many gentlemen and substantial burgesses of the town, who were not university men either in dress or in anything else, who took what was held to be the cause of the King and Church, the nobles and gentry, against the side of the Commons and the upholders of Puritanism. On the other hand, among the citizens were not a few of the gowns and trencher hats of those scholars of Magdalen and New against whom Dr. Dacre had inveighed so wrathfully.

Did Kitty and Mrs. Judy see anyone they knew among these stern men and fiery lads who were staunch to their deepest convictions at the very time that they were reviled as renegades from their ranks?

The woman and girl, withdrawing from notice, looked eagerly with shrinking eyes, unwilling to find what they sought. For little as the gazers knew of the riot, they had both of them shrewdness and judgment sufficient to comprehend that to-day's outbreak was like a declaration of war, which would bring to light smouldering suspicions, discrepancies and divergences, sever men into hostile parties, and range them as declared foes thenceforth.

Alas! alas! there they were, rushing on with the faction of the town, in the very heart of it, John Dacre and his cousin Anthony Walton. They had evidently not contented themselves with lending the passive support of their presence to their political allies. Jack had lost his hat, and his long fair hair, which he still wore cavalier fashion, like the great Puritan, John Milton, was streaming half over his boyish face, which was hard set, the teeth clenched and the blue eyes not seeming to see his old home of Oriel, or to call to mind who might be watching him from behind one of its casements.

"Oh! Jackie, Jackie," Kitty could not help murmuring in a piteous undertone.

"Master Jackie," echoed her old nurse, fain to clench her fist under her apron and shake it unseen at her former wayward charge.

What if his father should see him in such guise? What if father and son should look into each other's eyes declared enemies?

As for Anthony Walton, his gown was in tatters, and he was shouldering his way with such a frown on his brow as Kitty had never before seen on the face of her big, bantering cousin.

The strange sight, with its hubbub and clamour, did not last many minutes. The mob streamed past in the direction of Corpus Christi and the great buildings of Christ Church, and vanished like any other pageant, leaving the little street absolutely deserted, and the silence, but for the bells, something to be felt after the late wild medley of flying feet and shouting voices.

EVENINGS AT THE OBSERVATORY.

By SIR ROBERT S. BALL, F.R.S., Astronomer Royal for Ireland.

It is well known that in the United States there are many more opportunities for educated women to gain useful and remunerative employment than can be found in our own country. I was particularly struck with this when I saw on a recent visit to America ladies employed in doing work in the astronomical observatories, which in our country would be almost exclusively performed by men. The work they had to do was eminently suited to ladies; it required neatness and care, and a conscientious determination to do the work with unremitting accuracy and attention. That they have done this work well is known to all astronomers who have made themselves acquainted with the great volume of excellent astronomical research that flows from the American observatories.

I am specially led to make these remarks at the opening of a series of papers on astronomical matters in the pages of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, because I was much interested and entertained lately by reading a paper written by one of the American astronomers to whom I have referred. Two years ago a new astronomical observatory was opened at Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, and at the laying of the corner-stone an appropriate—a most appropriate—address was delivered in celebration of the auspicious event. When I add that this address was given by a lady it will, I think, show that America, in respect to such performances, is much in advance of the countries on this side of the Atlantic.

The address was published in the Sidereal Messenger, and has been copied into the Observatory for December, 1886. It is signed Mary E. Byrd, and is well worth reading. It admirably expresses the wide divergence that there often is between the presumed nature of the work that is performed in an observatory in the popular imagination, and the routine of somewhat prosaic detail that is the actual fact.

I cannot resist quoting a passage from this address as the best introduction to our present subject.

"It is commonly fancied that there is a great deal of poetry and romance within the walls of an observatory. All have read the ancient legend of Tycho Brahe, how he went to the observatory in robes of state, as if the presence of the stars was the presence of princes. And people fancy that here at midnight, in starlit domes, you almost hear the music of the spheres. They picture to themselves the observer seated at his telescope hour after hour looking down, down, into deep lunar craters, feasting on delicate nebulae and swift-flying comets, or revelling in gorgeous star clusters. Here they think night after night before his rapt vision there passes all the panorama of the heavens multiplied and glorified a thousand fold by his powerful lenses. I have sometimes wished that it were so; but it is work that goes on in an observatory, work as stern as that of the factory."

The actual fact is, indeed, widely different from that supposititious view of the duties of the astronomer which are here so humorously portrayed. The popular notion of the way in which astronomical discoveries are made is also very wide of the truth. It seems sometimes to be thought that the astronomer in search of some crowning triumph sits gazing with ecstatic rapture through the tube until suddenly some majestic, and hitherto utterly unheard of, celestial body soars into his view, and he immediately records an immortal discovery. The fact is that when an astronomer goes into his observatory for his night's work he finds it usually convenient to leave all the ecstatic and most of the poetic portions of his constitution outside. He arrays himself in costume, not with a view to the sublimity of the universe, but he thinks of what will best keep out the cold. It is not the stupendous size of the celestial bodies that so often appals him; he is rather straining his attention to the effort of hiding a tiny star behind the spider web of his micrometer.

But though it may be generally true that the work of the observatory is essentially a routine almost of a prosaic character, yet the astronomer must indeed be of a callous nature who does not feel the noble character of the occupation to which his nights are devoted. I propose in these papers to write a sketch of what the visitor to the observatory may reasonably expect to see, if his or her visit be appropriately timed. It must be remembered that the celestial objects are not always to be observed. It is no doubt true that Saturn or the great nebula in Orion are like the Matterhorn or the Falls of Niagara, always to be seen if the visitor will only go to the right place. But very often no terrestrial observatory can be the right place for seeing either of the objects named, and this for various reasons. In the first place it may be that the season of the year is wrong. There is, for instance, no use in going to look for the great nebula in Orion in summer; nor is there any possibility of seeing Saturn when, as happens every year, he is situated near the sun on the surface of the heavens. In general, indeed, there is no use at all in coming to look at objects unless you know as a matter of fact that they are above the horizon at the time.

Then, too, it must be remembered that some objects never rise at all in our latitudes. You need never expect to see the Magellanic clouds by going to any observatory in England. Nor can the astronomers in Australia ever observe the companion to the pole star through the great reflector at Melbourne. Even when the body you want to see is "up," it may be in a very unfavourable condition for making observations. If it be the moon that you wish to see, and even if it be up, and high up, it may be quite unsuited for telescopic scrutiny by the simple fact that it is "full"; a condition in which the varieties of light and shade which give to the moon pictures their beauty and their instructiveness is altogether wanting.

The planets, too, will often be accessible to the telescope, but still be very unfavourably placed for disclosing their real beauty as compared with the seasons when they can be observed to good advantage. The ring of Saturn may be presented under an aspect in which it is too much foreshortened, or the opposition of Mars may be one in which his distance from the earth is still too considerable to admit of a truly effective telescopic picture being produced. It will thus be obvious that to observe any of the celestial bodies effectively not only must good instruments be available, but a careful forethought must be exercised in choosing the appropriate times for each object. But even when the best moment for observations has arrived and we are all ready to secure the examination of the celestial body under the most favourable auspices, there is still the very work those produced by the atmosphere are the most vexatious, because they do not admit of being predicted. The astronomer may sometimes have even gone to the other side of the earth to observe some rare phenomenon like a total eclipse of the sun, or the still more occasional transit of Venus across the sun. The time when such an event will occur admits of actual prediction; all may be in readiness, when the incalculable clouds overcast the sky, and the whole object of the enterprise is frustrated.

But even when not charged with clouds the atmosphere is baneful to the practical astronomer, for air when clearest and purest still obstructs a great deal of light. It makes the stars appear fainter than they would otherwise do, while rays from very small stars are extinguished by it, though those rays would have been quite sufficient to render their source perceptible in our telescopes if we could observe without the intervention of the atmosphere.

An airless globe like the moon would, for merely telescopic purposes, present the most favourable condition conceivable, though how it would fare with the astronomers involves questions of a different character. We have not only the opacity of even the purest skies to contend with, but there are other difficulties. Even under the stillest and clearest sky it is of the essence of the atmosphere to distort the places of the celestial bodies. To see a star we have to point the telescope, not at the star, but in a somewhat different direction. Astronomers speak of this derangement as refraction; they are obliged continually to bear it in mind, and their observations have to be corrected for it so as to place the star in its true instead of its apparent position. The amount of the displacement of a celestial object depends, among other things, upon the temperature of the air. If the temperature changes the amount of the displacement will change. While, therefore, there is any fluctuation of temperature the place of the star will appear to be continually deranged. The astronomer will say that "the stars are very unsteady to-night." As long as this lasts the value of his observations is appreciably impaired; sometimes the unsteadiness is so great that he must desist from important consideration of the weather. For astronomical work a clear sky is indispensable. When we find that a cloud or two can obscure from us the direct image of the sun, we need hardly expect that stars or planets or objects still fainter and more delicate shall be perceived through a dense curtain of watery vapour. Fogs and mists, no less than more extensive clouds, must be absent, and even nights that seem tolerably clear to the ordinary spectator may, from atmospheric causes alone, be very ill-adapted for any careful astronomical work.

From all these reasons it will be seen that the hours in which really excellent work can be done in an observatory are but few in comparison with the whole number of hours in the year. When such hours do arrive astronomers greatly prize them, and it may be readily believed that during the opportunity for which they have waited so long they are often not too well pleased to be disturbed by visitors who come on a star-gazing expedition.

Of all the impediments to astronomical working altogether.

To escape from the pernicious influences of the atmosphere is at present the pressing need of practical astronomy. In this respect of course there will be great differences between one climate and another. But the best method of evading the severe tax which the atmosphere imposes on every astronomer's time and the injury that it inflicts upon his measurements is to carry his observatory to the top of a lofty mountain.

The ocean of air that lies over our heads is perhaps one hundred miles or more in thickness. It is, however, in the lowest mile or so that the mischief is done of which the astronomer so sadly complains. A lofty mountain peak which reared its head a mile above the earth's surface would protrude through all the densest, the most opaque, and the most troublesome portion of the atmosphere. An observatory perched on the summit of this mountain will therefore be in a position to observe the stars almost free from the atmospheric anxieties of the astronomer at the bottom of that turbid atmospheric ocean on which the mountain astronomer can now look down.

At the present moment the attention of the astronomical world is largely fixed on the bold experiment which has been made in America to locate a telescope of perhaps unsurpassed optical perfection on the top of a mountain in one of the most exquisite climates on the globe.

Mr. Lick, a Californian millionaire, committed to the care of the Lick Trust a great sum of money, and directed them "to erect a powerful telescope, superior to and more powerful than any telescope ever yet made, with all the machinery appertaining thereto, and also a suitable observatory."

To carry out this trust a careful search was made to obtain the most suitable locality, and an expedition was sent to the top of Mount Hamilton, near San José, in California. The observations showed that the air was remarkably steady, and that there was a continued succession of nights of almost perfect definition. Then, too, it was found that observations of objects very low down in the sky were practicable to a far greater extent than in other observatories in similar latitudes. Mr. Burnham, a distinguished American astronomer, who conducted these preliminary tests of the capabilities of Mount Hamilton, made many valuable discoveries of new double stars, many of them being exquisitely beautiful and delicate objects, during the six months that his stay lasted. These trials proving eminently satisfactory, Mount Hamilton was decided upon as the seat of the Lick Observatory. Then commenced the arduous task of constructing and equipping a vast astronomical establishment on the summit of a mountain four thousand feet in height, and twenty-six miles distant from the nearest town. With true American energy these difficulties have been severally vanquished. The county of Santa Clara provided, and now maintains, a magnificent road, which runs by a gentle slope the whole way from San José to the top of Mount Hamilton. Then the top of the mountain had to be cut off to make a level platform large enough for the buildings. To do this no less than 70,000 tons of material had to be removed. When the question arose as to the erection of the telescope, the first point to be settled was whether it should be a reflecting telescope or be a refractor. That is, whether it should—like the great telescope of Lord Rosse at Parsonstown in Ireland—consist of a large and brilliant mirror at the end of a long tube, from which the rays of light from the stars were to be reflected; or whether it should be founded on the more familiar principle of refraction, in which powerful glass lenses are made use of to concentrate the light and render faint objects visible. There was much to be said on both sides, but finally the trustees, after taking counsel with the wisest astronomers all over the world, decided to erect a great refractor.

The preparation of the object-glass was the next great work to be accomplished. It was to consist of two pieces, one of crown glass and the other of flint glass, and it was to have a diameter of the unparalleled dimensions of thirty-six inches. The fabrication of the actual pieces of glass on which the opticians could work was a matter of the greatest difficulty, and sorely tried the patience of all concerned; to obtain the rough discs of glass alone no less than six years were required, and they were only finally adopted after twenty unsuccessful trials. At last, however, when Messrs. Alvan Clark, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, did obtain suitable pieces of glass whereon to employ their optical skill, another year of assiduous work was necessary to give to the glasses the exact shapes that would render the vision through them perfect. For the execution of this great object glass the Lick trustees paid to Messrs. Alvan Clark a sum exceeding ten thousand pounds. The length of the tube in which this pair of lenses had to be mounted was adapted for a focus of fifty-six feet two inches. On the 1st June, 1888, the celebrated Lick Observatory was formally pronounced ready for work, and handed over to the charge of the regents of the University of California.

I take these particulars from the first volume of the publications of the Lick Observatory. The charges of the future publications will be generously provided by the State of California, while the United States has presented the site. With consummate astronomical equipment, with a staff of practical astronomers that cannot be surpassed in the world, we may confidently hope that the Lick Observatory will fulfil the generous intention of its founder; indeed, we have already in some exquisite photographs and in other ways received earnest of its success.

I have entered thus fully into the account of the Lick Observatory, partly on account of its novelty and its importance, but also because in one aspect of its work it suitably illustrates the title at the head of these papers. Professor E. S. Holden, the accomplished astronomer who presides over the Lick Observatory, has generously arranged that the resources of the great telescopes shall, under suitable regulations, be available to those visitors who may spend an evening at the Lick Observatory.

I propose in these papers to sketch out some of the objects which a visitor to an astronomical observatory should specially wish to see. He will first of all desire to learn by actual examination something of those marvellous instruments by which the astronomer has detected the movements and learned the actual character of the heavenly bodies. He will see the fundamental weapon with which inaccuracy is driven from the field of astronomy. That weapon is the transit instrument, or rather the more complete apparatus which is found in all our modern observatories, and is known as the meridian circle. This consists of a telescope of considerable but not of the largest dimensions, mounted in a particular way for a particular purpose. A view of the meridian circle at Dunsink Observatory is given in the adjoining sketch. The telescope is attached to an axis about which it can revolve, just as a cannon can be turned up or down in its bearings. The axis also carries two large circles. On these the utmost refinements of mechanical skill must have been exercised. The circles in the instrument at Dunsink Observatory, the establishment over which I have the honour to preside, are about three feet in diameter. There is a rim of silver let into the margin of the wheel; this silver is graduated by fine marks—marks indeed so fine that they require a microscope for their detection. When the telescope is pointed to a star, the position of the marks shows the elevation of the instrument, and thus the height of the star above the horizon is determined. The telescope is carefully adjusted so as to move in the plane of the meridian. It can be pointed to the due north, then it can be raised up to the point of the heavens vertically overhead, then it can be turned downwards to the south. But it is of the essence of the meridian circle that it admits of no other movements; it cannot be turned to the east or to the west in the slightest degree. A star or a planet, the sun or the moon can therefore only be observed with the meridian circle at the very instant of crossing the meridian. In fact, one of the purposes of observing with the meridian circle is to determine the time at which the celestial body is on the meridian. To obtain the requisite accuracy, it will not be sufficient merely to observe the star in the field of view of the telescope—we must have some means of readily indicating the precise line down the field which represents the meridian; a thread or wire has to be stretched across for this purpose. The magnifying power of a large meridian circle is, however, so considerable that any ordinary thread would look like a coarse rope, and would be utterly unsuited for work requiring nicety of observation. We must therefore employ some fibre which shall be extremely fine, and which shall yet be strong enough to admit of being stretched into a perfect straight line, while a certain degree of elasticity is also requisite in order to preserve the straightness of the line with any permanence. These various conditions are most completely complied with by the beautiful thread of the spider. It is a somewhat delicate task to stretch one of these exquisite filaments properly over the little circular framework at the eye end of the telescope, but when it has once been done the web of the spider is sufficiently durable to see many years of service.

The method of observing the transit of a star will consist of noting the time by the astronomical clock when it passes behind the spider web. The due estimation of this time taxes the skill of the practical astronomer; it depends on the appreciation of the fractional part of a second at which the transit takes place. Here, as in so many other departments of science and of the arts, the aid of electricity is invoked to give a subtleness to the work that cannot otherwise be obtained. As the star passes behind the spider web the astronomer taps a key which closes the current, and impresses a mark on a revolving cylinder. Thus a record is obtained which makes the closest approach to absolute precision.

But for the purposes of the continuous observation of a celestial body the meridian instrument is quite unfitted. It merely gives us a flying glimpse of the object as it hurries through the field; a glimpse sufficient for the determination of the place of the object, but quite inadequate to enable us to examine the object with any close attention. A totally different form of mounting for our telescope is now required, which shall enable us to follow the object persistently for hours together. Of course the facility of movement in the telescope which this implies can only be obtained by the sacrifice of some other qualities. The equatorial—for so this form of mounting is termed—is quite unsuited for the rigidly accurate purposes of measurement, which it is the sole object of the meridian circle to obtain. In the stand of the equatorial, clockwork is placed, by which the instrument, after it has been once pointed to the star, is constrained to move so that the object under examination shall continue steadily in the field of the observer's view.

It is the equatorial that we are to visit when we come to spend our evening at the observatory. We shall find ourselves usually in a circular room covered by a dome. This dome reposes on wheel work, so that it can be made to revolve. In it is a shutter, which can be opened so as to allow the telescope to be pointed to the sky. There is, of course, no glass window in the opening; even the most transparent of plate glass would impair the perfection of the image. Nor will it be allowable to have the building warmed by artificial heat. If the temperature inside were raised appreciably above that which is found outside, the heated air from the interior would pour out through the opening, and the disturbance thence arising would produce a mixture of air of different degrees of density, which would be quite sufficient to impair the delicacy of the telescopic images. Need we add that the sky must be quite clear, for seeing that a cloud can hide the sun at midday, it is obvious that even the very slightest thickness or haze in the atmosphere is at all events prejudicial, if it does not even offer an insuperable obstacle to observation. Wind, if unattended with clouds, is not usually injurious to good seeing, though the comfort of observatory work is greatly promoted by a tranquil atmosphere.

And now as to the objects which the visitor to the observatory should specially ask to see. It must be borne in mind that many of the most interesting objects to the astronomer are almost completely devoid of effectiveness from the merely spectacular point of view. A grand nebula, for instance, will often have portions so faint, that however we may find it necessary to represent them in drawings, they are in the field of the telescope only to be seen by most assiduous attention with an eye specially trained for such work. The visitor will hardly feel contented if he be desired to look at something which he may only have a chance of seeing after he has steadily gazed for several minutes at one place. There are, however, some splendid objects in the sky against which no objections of the kind can be alleged, and it is to these that we specially commend the attention of a visitor who is anxious to see some of the wonders of the heavens.

The celestial objects which I have now specially in view are four. There is first the Moon, and then come the planet Saturn, the star cluster in Perseus, and the great nebula in Orion. Anyone who shall have had the gratification of witnessing these objects on a cloudless sky, and through a telescope of adequate dimensions, will have obtained a fair notion of the glories of the heavens. Nor is it often possible to compass all these objects during a single visit to the observatory. The moon, as if jealous of the other celestial bodies, drenches the skies with such a flood of light that the glories of the lesser bodies become well-nigh invisible. In fact, just as the sun at midday prevents us from seeing any of the stars, so the beams of the moon pale the smaller stars to invisibility, and largely detract from the lustre of the brighter ones. Avoid also making your visit at the time of full moon; this is the very worst occasion for going to an observatory. Not only does the moon extinguish lesser beauties, but in this phase the satellite has herself lost all her telescopic attractions; we merely see a huge ball of bright light, with some slight diversity of hue. All these exquisite details of lunar scenery are indistinguishable, they can only be brought out by the relief which shade as well as light gives to a picture. When the moon is full the mountains on its surface cast no shadows, the hollows are invisible, and the picture has no interest. The best time to see the moon is at the period of the first quarter, when she looks like a half completed circle. Along the borders of light and shade an exquisite relief is given to the wild and desolate scenery of the moon, and we have the most striking telescopic picture of the details of a celestial body that this universe can afford us.

The chief feature which immediately arrests attention on the moon is the presence of a multitude of remarkable circular walled plains or rings. Sometimes the included area is comparatively level, sometimes the interior is diversified by a lofty mountain peak near the centre. These rings are of very various sizes; some are objects so minute as to tax the powers of the greatest telescopes; others are about as large as the area occupied by London; while others again are as large or larger than any of our English counties. The rampart or wall by which this plain is encircled is a chain of rugged and precipitous mountains, often towering into lofty peaks. No more striking spectacle can be shown on the moon than the view of one of these great craters, such as Plato, when the aspect of the sun is suitable. The most favourable conditions are found when the sun is just rising or just setting to an observer who is supposed to be stationed on the crater. Then the mountain peaks throw long and deep shadows, which stretch across the level floor of the interior. The relief given by this light and shade make of Plato a truly remarkable object.

There are many other features on the moon of special interest to astronomers. There are the long chasms by which the solid crust appears to have been riven in those days, countless ages ago, when its volcanic fires were in action. Now, however, it would appear that all the signs of active volcanic energy are absent. The volcanoes have become silent and extinct, just like several of the mountains on our earth, which were once active volcanoes, but are now extinct, so far as eruptions are concerned. I need only mention one instance of an extinct volcano on our globe; it will be familiar to all who are acquainted with the Scottish capital, or to those who have read Walter Scott's novels; it is Arthur's seat, the well-known feature in the environs of Edinburgh. There was once in prehistoric ages a great volcano, of which the well-known mountain is a relic. The difference between the earth and the moon, in so far as the presence of volcanoes is concerned, may be thus stated. On the moon all the volcanoes have become extinct; on the earth many of them have become extinct, but some still retain their pristine energy.

We must not delay too long over the aspect of the moon. It will require a number of visits to become acquainted with the whole of its appearance, for the border of light and shade is the only part which is suitable for observation. The position of this border is constantly changing, and accordingly the moon must be observed during several periods in its revolution by one who desires to become adequately acquainted with its glories; but the study of our satellite will amply repay the utmost devotion which any astronomer can award.

A favourable night for the observations of the planet Saturn must next be chosen; and perhaps this will come soon.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER I. A NIGHT early in June!

This calls up visions of peace and tranquillity, still pastures lying beneath the dim moon, with the forms of cattle couched here and there, and the trees "laying their dark arms about the field," the fresh scent of earth stealing up into the silence, and the only sound the murmur of a distant brook or the rustling of foliage stirred by wandering breezes.

For this picture a Londoner has to substitute the glare of lamps, the ceaseless roar and rattle of carriages, the hurry of foot-passengers, all bent on business or pleasure. These fill his summer night, instead of rest and calm.

In Piccadilly the uproar seems at its greatest. The spacious courtyard of Burlington House is usually quiet, comparatively speaking, at this hour; a spot apart from the river of life that rushes hard by. But on this special night the stream is overflowing into its precincts with sound and fury. Carriage after carriage rolls up to the entrance on the right, whence the light that pours forth shows revelry is going on within.

It is not exactly revelry after all, for it is the "Ladies' Conversazione" of the Royal Society, and Science, though for one evening she condescends to lay aside her sterner aspect, is Science still!

There is a great variety of dress in the room where the lady guests are laying aside cloak and shawl. Fashionable women, who take the conversazione as one item merely in the season's round, and are on their way somewhere else, appear in full evening dress, with perchance the flash of many diamonds; others, again, less experienced, have considered a black silk, adorned about the neck with scraps of white lace and ribbon, sufficient tribute to the occasion. Between these two extremes might be classed one little group of three at the end of the room.

The most noticeable figure of the trio is a tall and graceful girl clad in clinging white cashmere, with her head well set upon her shoulders. Her brow is clear and intelligent, and it is remarkable that at a period when Fashion orders her to conceal her temples with her hair, she wears the wavy brown locks brushed back high above her forehead, and coiled in a plait behind. Her dark blue eyes, set deep in their sockets, are candid and large; her complexion is of a healthy paleness, and her lips are full and red. It is a pleasant though not a marvelously handsome face; the chief attraction in it comes from a certain light in the eyes and on the brow that speaks of imagination.

Evelyn Hope was accompanied by her aunt and cousin, Mrs. Lancaster and her daughter Dorothy, alias Dottie. The latter, a dark-haired, dark-eyed little creature in yellow Pongee silk, was a contrast in every way to her svelte cousin, excepting in the sweetness of her expression. Two thoroughly "nice" girls would the pair have been called by any attentive observer. And the mother, round, florid, panting, in a wonderful dress of dark crimson brocade, was evidently good-natured, evidently also a little less accustomed than her younger companions to the haunts of fashion and science.

They have had a long drive, for they have come from a suburb far away in the south-western district, and are now collecting their forces for the reception by the President of the Royal Society.

"Come, mother," urged Dot, "it's time we went upstairs."

"Oh dear!" sighed Mrs. Lancaster, "I feel just as if I were going to be presented at Court. Tell me, Evelyn, you know best—shall I shake hands with him or not?"

"Oh dear no, auntie!" cried Evelyn, anxiously; "just bow; it's nothing at all to alarm you. I am afraid uncle will be tired of waiting for us."

Apparently this fear was well-founded, for a slight line furrowed the brow of the military-looking, grey-haired, grey-moustached gentleman outside when they joined him. To this uncle, Mr. Austin Hope, the three ladies owed their invitation to-night. He was not related to Mrs. Lancaster, and would have been greatly offended had you supposed it possible; but he was Evelyn's uncle on the father's side, whereas Mrs. Lancaster, with whom the orphan girl lived, was her mother's sister.

They mingled in the crowd ascending the staircase, heard their names shouted in a stentorian voice, and made their bow and curtsy to the gentleman of European fame, who stood with his wife to receive the guests. Poor Mrs. Lancaster thought this a very trying ordeal; which to salute first, and how to do it gracefully, she did not in the least understand; she gave two abrupt nods, and her face was redder than her gown, when she was half-pulled, half-led to a chair by Evelyn and Dot. Conscious that she had not acquitted herself creditably, she tried to hide her confusion behind a large crimson fan. Mr. Hope was busy greeting one and another acquaintance.

Evelyn, her hands clasped and an intent expression on her face, sat listening to every name, as the stream of men and women flowed past the President.

"Do come and see something scientific, or have some tea," urged Dot, in a whisper at length, pulling Evelyn's sleeve. "I'm tired of looking at the dresses; besides, we shall see them just as well in the other rooms."

Dresses! Evelyn was not looking at dresses. The names announced were of more interest to her than all the milliners' establishments in the world, that of Worth himself included. The visionary heroes of the realm in which she lived—mere names hitherto—took tangible shape now and again as she listened. For among the list of nobodies would occur here and there the name of a poet, an artist, a philosopher, a literary man, known and revered by the girl for the sake of his work, and then she would fasten her gaze upon him with eagerness. To see all these people, of whom she had hitherto only heard, was an unspeakable delight, and she felt herself living in a new world as she sat there. But there was one name for which she listened more than any other. At length it came.

"Mrs. Allingham West," and an imperceptible movement ran through the room, while the President's welcome was obviously marked, as he greeted a tall, slight lady with great, black eyes, and a pale, thoughtful face. This was Evelyn's idol! The successful novelist of the season, she had leapt into fame by the publication of a Romance—a story, half of this world, half of an imaginary region, where the natural and supernatural were strangely mingled. It was the work of a poet, and Evelyn thought it perfect. She had dreamt night and day of seeing Mrs. West, and if she had proved stout and commonplace, the girl felt she could not have borne the shock. But this spirituelle personality could be reconciled without difficulty with the pages of "Transmigrations."

Oh, if she could only speak to her! Her ardent gaze seemed to devour the authoress as she moved along, accosting one and another of the men and women who thronged in her train.

"What is the matter, Evelyn?" exclaimed Dot.

"Didn't you hear? Didn't you see? That is Mrs. Allingham West!"

"Well, and what then? Who's she?"

"Dottie, how can you? Why, she's the great authoress! Everyone is worshipping her genius!" cried the ardent girl.

"Oh, I know; she wrote that stupid book with the grey and silver cover—'Transmigrations.' I couldn't read half of it."

Evelyn, in the strained tension of her nerves, felt she could bear no more. But her aunt struck in with—

"Well, I don't call her much to look at, after all, nor yet to make such a fuss about, my dear, just because she has written a tale. I couldn't read it, any more than Dottie. I'll be bound she thinks herself wonderfully clever; but there's many a one cleverer. Why, you yourself, Evelyn—"

Evelyn rose, and turning to her uncle, who stood near with amused and cynical countenance, breathed—

"Do take me, uncle—there—after her—I want to be near her."

Mr. Hope complied, and led his niece into the library, where all along the wall the men of science sat, each with his special exhibit in his little nook. The wonderful ways of ants, flies, spiders and bees, the effect of sound on colour and form, the latest improvement in telegraphy illustrated by a model, the forms of crystals—all such marvels were shown forth and explained by their exhibitors to any who would listen.

The right effect of true knowledge is a great patience and a great humility. This was apparent in the gentleness and modesty with which these men, many of them famous all over Europe, responded to silly questions, and strove to teach what they could respecting the marvels of Nature in a momentary conversation with the curious. Evelyn deigned but little attention, and tried to drag her uncle on when he paused to address a gentleman who presided over a microscope.

"We shall lose her, uncle! We shall lose her!"

"Her! What does the girl mean?" inquired her uncle, throwing his head back and addressing his question to the ceiling.

"Mrs. Allingham West, of course! I want to hear her speak. I want to be near her."

"Look through this microscope first. Let me introduce my niece—Professor Grant."

With a very bad grace Evelyn stooped to look through the lens adjusted for her by the good-natured man of science.

"I can't see anything at all," she declared, "unless it's a bit of my own eyelash."

"My niece's tastes are literary, not scientific," observed Mr. Hope, rather grimly; "and just now she is hot in pursuit of Mrs. Allingham West."

"It would be a shame to detain her," declared the kindly Professor, with a laugh, and the two moved on in the stream. Evelyn caught a glimpse of the silken draperies of her idol in the distance, and fairly pushed her way along till she was close behind her. Oh, happiness! she was speaking to the gentleman with an order on his breast, on whose arm she was leaning. Evelyn strained her ear to catch the enchanted sounds. Could it be true that she really heard the voice of her adored author? The next sensation was a chill of disappointment, for these were the words she overheard—

"It is very hot and crowded here. Suppose we go into the tea-room." And away swept the goddess in pursuit of nectar.

Evelyn, over-excited as she was, felt inclined to cry, and slackened her pace.

"Well, what's the matter now? Are you tired of mobbing that poor woman?" asked her uncle.

"Mobbing her! Uncle! How can you? I worship her!"

"An odd way of showing it then, to try to crush her to death. Come and let us see what your aunt and cousin are doing, if you have had enough worship," rejoined his satirical voice.

Evelyn could never quite "get on" with this uncle. Until she came of age, a year ago, he had been conjointly her guardian with Mrs. Lancaster. There was little sympathy—only tolerance on the one side, awe on the other—between these widely dissimilar relatives of the orphan girl. Austin Hope lived in his own house at Kensington. A bachelor, and absorbed in his favourite pursuits, he could exercise little influence over the girl's life; he laughed at the unintellectual Mrs. and Miss Lancaster, but secretly thought them excellent companions for a romantic creature of sentiment, as he supposed Evelyn to be. He had little patience with her impulsiveness, her lack of accuracy, and scarcely rendered justice to the gifts that existed side by side with many blemishes.

They found Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie at last, not where they had left them, but enduring the loud splitting and flashing of a practical illustration of lightning. Mrs. Lancaster's expression of dismay as she sat collapsed in a chair staring round-eyed at the electric fire darting from one great knob to another, gave little indication of her delight in the pursuit of science. The two ladies were not alone. A tall, loose-limbed gentleman, with a brown beard and a mass of rough curly hair on his head, was bending over them, trying to make his voice heard through the din.

“I HAVE MADE UP MY MIND TO PUBLISH.”

"There's Muir trying to instruct your aunt," cried Mr. Hope.

Then followed greetings and introductions, in which Evelyn observed the stranger had very bright eyes, so bright they seemed to form a line of light beneath his brow when he spoke, and that his smile was brilliant, showing white and even teeth. His dress, though spotless in respect to linen, was by no means of the latest cut, and his appearance was generally shaggy. He spoke with a Scotch accent.

"Evelyn has been disenchanted about her idol, Mrs. Allingham West," remarked Mr. Hope, as by his suggestion the party of five withdrew to quieter regions. "Would you believe it, the base creature actually wanted tea, like any other human being? And it was all the worse because Evelyn had refused to look at Professor Grant's microscopic slides, only to hear the remark, 'Come out of this mob,' or something of the kind."

Evelyn flushed again.

"I am not disenchanted," she declared; "and I would rather see Mrs. West than a hundred slides."

"Indeed!" responded the Scotchman, with an air of interest and surprise. "You admire her book?"

"Of course I do," replied Evelyn. "Everybody does."

"I'm not so sure of that," replied her new acquaintance. "I don't altogether myself."

"Perhaps your tastes are more scientific than literary," inquired Evelyn, a little disdainfully.

"May I ask in which direction yours lie?" replied he.

"Oh, in the direction of literature. Thought is spiritual, and science is material," declared Evelyn, conscious that she was saying a very fine thing indeed.

The Scotchman held his peace after this astounding remark, though he looked as if he could have spoken.

There was a good deal more sight-seeing, followed by refreshments, and then the little party from the distant suburb were put into their brougham by the two gentlemen.

The evening had been one of stirring emotions for Evelyn, and all the way home she mused. She had recovered the shock of finding out that Mrs. West wanted tea like any other human being, and she dwelt with rapture upon her looks—upon the evident homage she won from all. Before she laid her head on the pillow that night she drew from her desk certain sheets of manuscript tied together with pink ribbon at the corner, and read some of their contents with a kindling eye.

All the next morning Evelyn was busy in the pretty boudoir she called her own, reading, arranging, correcting the said manuscript sheets. She enjoyed strict privacy in this apartment, but frequently invited Dot to see her there. No such invitation came to-day till the hour of afternoon tea, when the cousins met. Mrs. Lancaster had gone out for a drive.

"What have you been doing, shut up all this lovely morning?" inquired Dottie, standing by the table to pour out the tea from the tiny Japanese teapot.

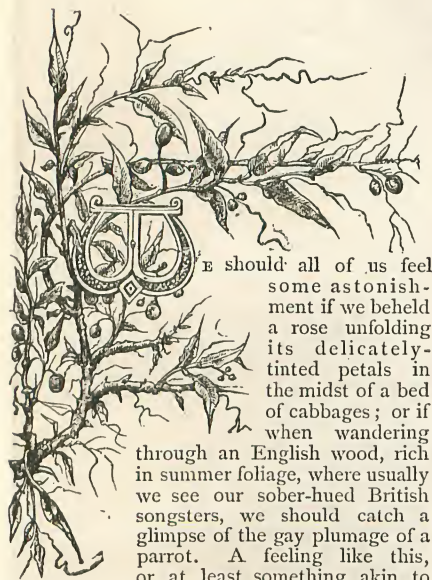

"I was busy writing—copying," responded Evelyn. "Dot, I want to tell you something. I have made up my mind on a very important subject since last night."

"Dear me! what is that?" cried Dottie, pausing with her hand on the cream jug. And Evelyn, conscious of the magnitude of her communication, solemnly replied—

it, flashes through our minds when we hear of a poetess born in the family of a merchant; yet this fact is the first we have to narrate in the story of Mrs. Hemans. She was the daughter of a Liverpool merchant, born in 1793. There is, however, a touch of romance in the next fact which we have to tell, and this is, that her mother was of Italian descent. This strain of southern blood no doubt accounts for much of the fire and tenderness in her verse, and for the frequency with which she loves to dwell, in many of her poems, on southern scenes, which she never beheld with her bodily eyes: for in the whole course of her life she never took a journey to the sunny South.

As is usually the case with female talent or genius, Felicia Dorothea Brown—such was her maiden name, though we almost exclusively know her as Mrs. Hemans—showed in her early childhood remarkable precocity of intellect. More especially did her imagination develop with marvellous rapidity; it outstripped the rest of both her bodily and mental growth, and unfolded into a rich and splendid flower like some rare exotic plant that springs up in a night. She literally lisped in numbers; to make rhymes seemed as natural to her as it is to other children to walk; and at eight years old she wrote a little poem which might have done credit to many a young author of eighteen.

Those were not the days of high-class education for women: though little Felicia's mental powers were, as has been said, very marked at an early age. She received no special training; she went to no lectures, and no band of teachers and masters surrounded her; she passed through no competitive examinations. On the other hand, she had access to a good library, and made good use of it, though according to our present ideas her reading was somewhat too omnivorous. Her mother was a woman of bright intelligence, and discerned early, with a mother's prophetic eye, that her daughter Felicia was more gifted than any of her other children. She did what she could, amid the cares of a large family, to cultivate and direct the girl's mind, and between Felicia and her mother there grew up a special affection and confidence, even more strong and entire than generally exists between parent and child. This love gilded the whole of Felicia's life, and was not extinguished by any after circumstances or new attachments; in all the vicissitudes and trials of Mrs. Hemans' story this love was her best earthly comfort and support.

While Felicia was still a child, Mr. Brown met with certain commercial reverses which caused him to leave Liverpool with his whole family, and seek out some quiet country retreat where they could live more economically than in a great city. He soon found such a residence as he wanted in Denbighshire, among the Welsh hills; there Mr. and Mrs. Brown and their children took up their abode.

To some girls the change from a large town to the retirement of the country would have been sad and depressing; on muddy country roads and rugged mountain paths they would have sighed for gay shop windows, and for the bustle and movement of the streets. It was quite otherwise, however, with Felicia; she rejoiced in country life; it was like a new revelation to her of the wonderful and the beautiful. Her young spirit sang with the birds and the brooks; her young eyes found daily new wonders in flowers and trees, and in the changeful play of sunshine and shadow on the mountains; her young feet went bounding unwearingly over hill and dale, her whole being seemed to have acquired fresh melody from her new surroundings.

Felicia's fancy found new and delightful food in the old Welsh legends and folklore. She was never tired of going among the people, picking up fragments of old-world superstitions, and gleaning quaint beliefs and stories. In some of these she appears to have had no small faith herself. She would seek out the fairy rings, and do her utmost to make herself a favourite and a pet of the 'fairy queen.' There was a story that a fairy hound hunted nightly in the woods near her home, and she would rise from her bed at midnight, when the rest of the family slept, and creep noiselessly down stairs and out into the moonshine, to see if she could catch a glimpse of it. She loved the tales of sprite and goblin, and listened to them with a curious mixture of amusement and awe, that has something singularly pretty and naïve about it to our modern notions.

Thus time went on till Felicia Brown was fifteen. She was at that age as charming a picture, both physically and mentally, as ever adorned the annals of English girlhood. Her figure was as slight and graceful as if it had been moulded by the breath of the west wind itself; her hair fell in rich, natural curls on her sloping shoulders; her complexion was as delicate as the tint of a morning cloud; her eyes were full of the dawn of genius; her whole mind and character were instinct with a thousand generous impulses, with a thousand brilliant fancies, with a thousand tender dreams; her whole nature was overflowing with gracious, winsome frolics, and dainty whims, and sparkling caprices. No wonder that she was the darling and idol of her home, and no wonder that her relations allowed, and even forwarded, such an imprudent act as her publishing at this early age a volume of poems.

Loud was the chorus of exulting triumph which rang round the young authoress when that volume, which contained her brightest fancies and deepest feelings actually set down in print, appeared in the midst of the home. In those days it was no common thing for a young lady to write a book or a magazine article; authorship was regarded as something grand and wonderful, that belonged to the privileged few. They therefore looked upon their Felicia as little less than a tenth muse, and she was very much herself of the same opinion. Soon, however, the strain of joyful pride was to be exchanged for a wail of sorrow in the family. A critic, with more love of displaying his own smartness than of real literary discernment, got hold of the little volume, and cut it up most unmercifully. No doubt at the time of the publication of his article the reviewer held his head very high indeed, but he must have felt very much inclined to hide it in a corner when, in after years, he saw the poetess he had condemned shining as a star high up in public favour. For the moment this cruel attack on her poems had a most disastrous effect on the delicate organisation of Felicia; it brought on a long and dangerous illness, that caused her parents and friends the most extreme distress and anxiety.

There was, however, the vigour of a bright, hopeful temperament and of youth on Felicia Brown's side, and gradually she recovered. She did not write poetry just immediately again, but she did the next romantic thing she could—she fell in love. Those were the warlike days in which every girl in England was full of talk about battles and marches and counter-marches, and aspired to have a soldier lover. Felicia's ardent, impulsive nature did not escape the general infection. Two of her brothers were soldiers, and they introduced to her a young soldier, called Captain Hemans. An attachment grew up rapidly between him and Felicia, and she was but sixteen when she became engaged to marry him. The pair, however, did not unite their lives till three years later; he joined again his regiment, and saw much active service, and she began to write poetry again, making war her theme. With the courage born of instinctive genius, she once more made her way into print, and this time the public gave her a ready hearing, and her verse achieved considerable popularity.

At nineteen Felicia was married to Captain Hemans, and took the name by which we best know and love her, the name of Mrs. Hemans. The young pair went to live in Northamptonshire, at Daventry, and there her first child, a son, was born. Sweet was the melody which the boy's advent woke up in the poetess mother's soul.

The pair did not very long remain in Northamptonshire, far from all Mrs. Hemans' family. She was already beginning to find that the first glamour of young love was over—that Captain Hemans was not quite the hero she had believed him to be; and she wanted again the society of her mother, so they returned to Wales. For six years, during which she became the mother of five sons, she and Captain Hemans lived on together, she doing her utmost to keep his love and believe in him, and love him as of old. Then, without the smallest shadow of ill conduct on his wife's part to warrant such a proceeding, he left her, and never returned to her again.

Captain Hemans seems to have been a man of but limited intellect, but of strong, overgrown self-conceit and selfishness. He was utterly incapable of appreciating his wife's splendid mental gifts; he grew tired of the restraints of family life, as gradually her beauty, which was the only thing he had prized in her, lost its power over him, and so he went from her, giving up his duties as husband and father in a summary, cowardly way, and thinking he could spend a pleasanter life alone abroad.

Mrs. Hemans was a woman of remarkable delicacy of feeling; throughout her life she preserved the utmost reticence with regard to her domestic troubles, and never in any of her poems alluded to them. There is no musical complaint in verse such as some women in her situation would have poured forth, which casts a light upon this part of her story. Neither in any letter to her friends now extant is there a word which touches on this bitter but sacred sorrow. We can therefore only pass over this sad chapter of her history in comparative silence. There was certainly never a downright rupture between the husband and wife, for she kept up at intervals a regular correspondence with Captain Hemans, and consulted him on every point of importance with regard to the education of their sons.

Felicia Hemans was a Christian woman in the highest, and truest, and most beautiful sense of the term. This grievous trial of her married life was doubtless brought often before the throne of Grace in prayer, and was duly spread out there, as was the letter of the heathen king by the faithful monarch of Judah, and, like him, she doubtlessly went away strengthened and refreshed. She was a most admirable and devoted mother, and brought up her sons well and nobly; she threw herself heart and soul into all the small troubles of their school-boy days, and into the greater difficulties which attended their first entry into life's battle. They repaid her love with an almost adoring affection, and were in truth, while she was on earth, her joy and her crown—a crown which is a more glorious one for a Christian woman than even such pure literary fame as was hers.

The genius of Mrs. Hemans was very prolific, and her circumstances rendered it necessary that she should gain as much money as was possible by her literary work. Her writings, sometimes in the shape of volumes of short verses, sometimes in the form of long poems or of dramas, appeared before the public in rapid, bright procession, and were uniformly received with considerable favour. They have always retained a certain amount of popularity, though they are not quite as much read now as they were in her own day.

Poetry was not Mrs. Hemans' only gift; she possessed considerable musical talent, which she cultivated with great diligence throughout her life, even in the midst of all her thronging cares and troubles. When she was hard upon middle age, and had gained much fame as a poetess, she studied music under a great musical professor at Liverpool, and made such progress that she was able to set to music with much grace and ease some of her own verses, and her songs at that period were popular from the simple charm of their melody. It is a remarkable instance this of genius not neglecting to cultivate every entrusted talent on account of the greater gift. It is a bright example, too, to us all, of never thinking ourselves too old or too richly endowed to learn.

Most of Mrs. Hemans' life was spent in Wales, the land which was always regarded by her with special love; there much of her childhood had been spent, and there dwelt her mother; no wonder that she regarded it with strong and lasting affection. She once lived for a short time in Liverpool, but the heart of the poetess turned sick in the midst of the great city, and she returned to her Welsh mountains. She had there a home of her own, but much of her time was passed beneath her mother's roof.

Mrs. Hemans' poetry has lived, but is not as popular in this generation as it was in the last. It belongs too much to the romantic school to suit, perhaps, our modern taste, and though in a certain way perfectly genuine, there is sometimes a touch of unreality about it that is out of tune with the feeling and thought of the present day. She seldom wrote prose, indeed her only prose writings that have been published are a series of papers on some literary subject which appeared in a periodical.

Felicia Hemans formed warm friendships with many of the men and women of mark of her day. As we gaze at the picture of her life, various are the figures which pass before us as in a magic mirror; they all pause lovingly at the side of the poetess, and all grasp tenderly her hand. There is a man of sweet and gracious presence, a man whose flexible mouth quivers with all the delicate sensibilities of a poet, but whose eyes are calm with the calmness of a Christian thinker and an active friend of man; we know him by the name of Reginald Heber. There is a woman with a striking face which tells us that she will make her mark upon her time, a mark that will not quickly wear out; and it has not worn out, for we love her still as Geraldine Jewsbury. And who is this elderly lady, who comes stepping forward with such a conscious air, whose very skirts seem full of a breeze of dignity? Her dress is handsome, but somewhat old-fashioned in cut; she speaks in slow, measured tones, as if every word she uttered was sure to be worth something? This is Joanna Baillie. And who is this little plump lady, with the round laughing face, and sparkling eyes? This is Mary Mitford. Now we see Felicia Hemans wandering along a shrubby walk, hanging on the arm of a gentleman, up into whose face of power she is gazing with a pretty mixture of deference and love, and we know she is holding close communion with Walter Scott at Abbotsford. These, and many more we should like to stop to look at, are connected with Mrs. Hemans' history; but we must hasten on.

A deep and lasting shadow fell upon Mrs. Hemans' life when she lost her mother. No one could ever fill again that mother's place, and she continued to miss her and mourn for her as long as she herself remained upon earth. Her Welsh home was too closely associated with her that was gone for her to remain in it, so she removed to Ireland, and lived near Dublin. There she made new and well-loved friends in Archbishop Whately and his family.

Mrs. Hemans was not, however, to live very long in her new earthly home. Her life, what with her domestic troubles, what with her incessant literary work, had been a hard one for a woman of her delicate organisation, and her health began to give way. She lingered for a while, fondly watched over by her sons and by loving friends. The Archbishop took her to his beautiful home in the country, and he and all his household did their utmost to cheer and revive her. She rallied for a little while, but soon began again to droop, and she passed away at the age of 41, leaving a name and story for Englishwomen to be proud of.

POULTRY KEEPING :

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

PART VII.

CONCLUSION.

HAVING come to my concluding paper upon this subject, I feel that I must rack my brains to the utmost in order that I may leave nothing unsaid that may be of use to the beginner in this delightful enterprise. Let me, then, in order to be quite sure that we are remembering everything, consider again some of our chief maxims.

It is absolutely necessary, first of all, to have a dry, well-ventilated house, of the size required. The perches with boards under them to be swept daily, and clean, comfortable nests. The open run to be clean and sunny; to be dug over constantly, and to be well drained. The covered shelter to be well kept and dry, and to have plenty of sifted ashes for the hens to dust in.

Hens to be kept till eighteen months or two years and a half old—never longer. Pullets for October, November and December laying to be hatched out in March or early spring. Hot food every morning. Grain at night. Plenty of green food, sharp grit, lime, and fresh water.

The use of condiments and spiced foods is a question constantly before the poultry-keeper. She cannot take in any farming or live stock journal without having her attention arrested by advertisements, promising unheard-of results. Eggs daily—eggs always—by the simple use of a little package sent carriage paid, etc., etc. During ordinary weather, when hens are well and all is as usual, it is a great mistake to be constantly using cayenne pepper and other condiments; but during very wet weather, or hard frost, or during the moulting season, hens do require some assistance, and that assistance must be given according to the need of the time. As I have before said, I do believe in common sense, and hens, with a girl of good common sense who has their interest at heart, will succeed far better even though in apparently more disadvantageous circumstances, than with one who follows directions blindly, or, worse still, does not follow them at all!

Let me give some examples.

In wet weather hens often stop laying, more because the shelter is damp or the roof leaks, or the food is spoiled through being thrown on to the wet ground, than for any other reason.

During the moulting time, when the poor hens rest a little after a hard summer's laying, they should not have a stimulant to force them on, but some sulphur to help them make feathers, and an iron tonic to keep up their strength.

In hard, frosty weather, remember that heat is what is wanted; therefore give a very hot meal, with a little cayenne pepper, and hot water; the hard corn may also be softened with boiling water, and animal food and grit, which cannot then be obtained from the hard run, must be supplied.

POULTRY DISEASES.

Young hens from good stock, kept in healthy surroundings, are seldom seriously ill, especially if any little symptom has been attended to.

Some people advocate killing all sickly hens, because they seldom do any good, and because amateur doctoring is usually a failure.

This advice is rather sweeping, for certain definite illnesses can be cured by definite medicines, and a good laying hen should not be thus summarily despatched.

Where, however, a hen seems never well, and mopes about without any apparent cause, and lays irregularly, the most economical thing is to kill her, for doctoring is expensive, and sixpence here and sixpence there runs away with the profit.

Where a girl is really interested in medicines, and would rather like the trouble of effecting a cure, she should buy a standard book on the subject, have a hospital for isolating the birds, and go in for post-mortem examinations!

Every girl must have by her some disinfecting powder, to sprinkle occasionally in the hen-house; also an insect powder for use in the house and nests during the hot summer weather; a small bottle of castor oil, some tincture of aconite, a tin of good roup powder, some flowers of sulphur, some tincture of steel, and a lump of camphor.

A hen in good condition should be very red in the comb, with feathers close and compact, and in full lay; her excrements also should be very firm. The general condition of the poultry-yard can always be gauged by the latter every morning; and should there be a general appearance of diarrhoea, some powdered chalk mixed with ginger may be put into the soft food, and if it continues some roup powder may be given. Where the excrement is of a yellowish hue, it is almost certain to be that the hens have been kept short of grit. If one hen is seen particularly in this condition, she should be caught and given about a teaspoonful of castor oil, and after a little while be given some chalk and ginger.

The way to administer medicine to a hen is to catch her and hold her tight under the right arm, and with the right hand take hold of her comb, and with the left her wattles; her mouth can then be opened, and some assistant can pour down what is required. Powders are usually taken by the hen hidden in soft food.

During the moulting season hens should be fed generously, and have an iron tonic; for six hens put about three drops of tincture of steel into the drinking-water every morning, and every other day put a little sprinkling of flowers of sulphur into the soft food.

Some hens moult very hard indeed, and if neglected suffer very much, sometimes even dying; if this happens it is a pretty sure sign of bad management somewhere.

Cold is an important thing to guard against. If the hens have taken cold (and you may be sure they have done so if they sneeze and show a general watery appearance in the eyes and nostrils), don't neglect them, for they are easily cured at this stage, while later the cold might develop into roup—that horror of poultry keepers, of which you should have no experience.

A good preventive of further trouble is to put a few drops of aconite into the drinking water at night, and put some roup powder into the morning meal. It is advisable in bad weather to keep an inch square piece of camphor in the water; one piece will last a long time, as it dissolves very slowly.

Sometimes, if the day has been very stormy and rough, I give the hens a very hot meal at night, consisting of linseed and barley meal, and leave a sprinkling of corn in the run for them first thing in the morning.

On going into the henhouse at night during winter, some of the hens may be heard breathing very heavily, making a sort of asthmatic sound, but if caught and given about four teaspoonfuls of linseed meal boiled in a little water until quite sticky, they will usually be all right in a little time.

During the recent snow we brought a hen into the kitchen in a hamper: she could not eat, and could hardly breathe; the linseed was given, with some hot water to help her to swallow, and the next day she could eat a little, and was taken back to the run in a few days.

Roup is a very much exaggerated cold, though myself I do not know where the line is drawn between the one and the other.

Mr. Wm. Cook has kindly given me permission to quote anything I wish from his "Poultry Breeder and Feeder," on this and any other disease; but the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER will do best by attending to colds, and saving the danger of roup. As roup is infectious, it is wisest when a hen has what would be called a bad cold, to isolate her, keeping her in a large hamper in a warm, dry place; treat her as described, and if after a few days she really does not recover, it is best to kill her.

"Liver disease is shown by yellow cast about the face, especially round the eyes, a peculiarity in their walk, appearing as though they were rather stiff, and were afraid to shake their bodies; their food does not digest, their crops are seldom empty. Insufficiency of sharp grit, to help digest the food, is one of the greatest enemies to the liver. Cayenne pepper should be avoided. When the liver is not acting properly the fowl is much more susceptible to other diseases, as when this is out of order the blood is very hot, and at other times very low in temperature. When fowls have the disease badly, their excrements are very yellow; then it is waste of time and money to attempt to cure it, unless for an experiment. Remedies: as herbs, nothing better than dandelions, watercresses, and horehound. The two former can be cut up in small pieces and given to the fowls. When horehound is used, it is best to boil it for about fifteen minutes, and give them the decoction. About two sprays are sufficient for from twelve to fifteen fowls. The best way of giving the liquid to the fowls is to mix the soft food with it in the morning."

Fowls laying soft eggs.—This difficulty is not exactly a disease, but it is occasioned by the hen being kept short of lime, or because she is in a generally weak condition. In the latter case some bone meal mixed with the food will help to tone up the system. Sometimes a very good layer will lay a complete egg and a soft one the same day; she should then be kept on limited unstimulating food to keep her from making eggs so constantly.

Egg-bound.—Sometimes quite healthy young hens are not able to lay their eggs, owing to the passage being too small, or there may be some temporary difficulty. Castor oil given to the hen will help her through, or a little applied externally to the part is sometimes necessary. The symptom of the difficulty is the hen being often on the nest without laying. "In walking the tail will touch the ground while the head and breast are reared straight up. Fowls after being egg-bound should only have a little soft food for several days; if they are not attended to at once inflammation takes place, and the hen suffers very much pain; when this is the case the bird should be killed at once."

"Crop-bound."—A common complaint, generally caused by careless and over feeding, and sometimes for want of sharp grit. The first symptoms noticed are that the fowl mopes about, often taking up food and laying it down again, and drinking a great quantity of water. The crop turns hard, and the passage from it to the gizzard gets stopped. The best thing is to give the fowl two teaspoonfuls of castor oil and a little warm water, and some time after to gently rub the crop with the thumb and finger so as to remove every particle of its contents.

"If the crop is not softer in three or four hours, the dose of warm water should be repeated, rubbing the crop as before; and if in another four hours the crop is still hard the warm water, oil, and rubbing should be repeated, and if ineffectual the only remedy left will be to open the crop and remove the hard contents."

This latter I should not recommend readers to attempt, unless they can be shown how to do it by some experienced operator.

Feather eating.—This is a very tiresome habit that hens in confinement get into, through having too little to do generally, or being kept short of feather-making material or water. Some hens I saw last autumn were a sight to be seen, hardly a feather on any of their necks. They had a grand open range, but probably they got into this habit by neglect, and because their house was hardly ever cleaned out. We watched and watched to find the culprits, but they seemed all more or less guilty, so the whole lot were gradually changed into soup. If there happen in a yard to be one or two specially troublesome in this respect, they should be shut up separately in broody coops, and Mr. Cook advocates the following: "If a small piece is cut off the end of the top beak and the sharp edges of the same and the edges of the bottom beak also, they cannot pluck the feathers, as when they go to peck them they slip through their mouths."

Of chicken diseases there are a few I might mention:

The gapes can very easily be told. One or two chicks are noticed sitting by themselves and not running to their food with the others, while at short intervals they will open their mouths very wide as if for a good yawn. They should at once be caught and treated. Innumerable medicines are suggested for this disease, among which are allowing the chick to inhale camphor, or for a moment or two burning sulphur. It is a good thing to give a turpentine pill—that is, a few drops of turpentine diluted with double the quantity of water mixed with flour, and so made into tiny moist pills; one put down the chick's mouth, and afterwards a drop or two of diluted sweet spirit of nitre, will often bring them round again. Where tiny chicks have from the shell appeared to be weakly and ill it is best to kill them, as they will never grow into good stock birds, and where space is valuable they only take up the room of others.

Diarrhæa.—Caused by irregular and too moist feeding or lack of sharp grit. The chalk and ginger can again be applied in very small quantities, and the feeding be altered, giving milk or water to drink only twice daily, except in exceptionally hot weather. Mr. Cook says, "I have not found the chalk and ginger fail for young chickens. A brood of ten from a fortnight to three weeks old can have the same quantity as prescribed for a hen (one heaped-up teaspoonful of powdered chalk and half a teaspoonful of ground ginger)." Leg weakness in young growing chicks, noticeable by their sitting much on the ground, may be counteracted by the use of bone meal, a handful in the soft food every alternate day for from ten to eighteen young birds, according to age.

I must say a word about the tiresome habit of egg-eating. Sometimes day after day on going to the hen-house you see hens on the nests, but, alas! at night there are no eggs. Should this be so, it is almost certain that one or more of the hens indulges itself in a quiet feast, the only other alternative being that rats or other vermin take the eggs away.

If an ordinary egg is left in the run and the hens are watched, that is the best way of finding the culprit. When found—if only one solitary one—she had best be killed, else she will soon teach the rest. If there are many who do it, recourse may be had to the plan of giving a surfeit of rotten eggs filled with mustard, etc., and if still this does not answer, the house should be provided with patent nest boxes, which allow the eggs to roll away out of sight as soon as laid.

Prevention, however, is better than cure, so keep the hens well supplied with lime, so that no tempting soft eggs are laid, and so that the shell of the complete egg may not be more than the poor layer can resist.

It will, I hope, be seen after reading these pages that neglect is, as a rule, at the root of all trouble in the yard, and this neglect does not so much arise from want of time as from want of method. Some people are born muddlers, and if they were to keep hens the following would most probably happen:—

The house would leak in winter, because it was not tarred in the autumn. The hens would lay astray, because the nests were not clean, and more time would be spent in looking for the eggs than in refilling the nests with fresh straw. The rats would eat the food, because the boxes were not shut. The cats would run off with the chickens, because the runs were not properly closed. The hens would spoil the garden, and try the patience and tempers of all the household, because their wings were not cut. Feather-eating begins because the water is generally forgotten. And I might multiply instances of this kind, where great disappointment is felt at failure which might so easily be prevented.

Perhaps some of my readers living in the country may have a difficulty in disposing of their eggs when they have them, and may wish to obtain better prices for them. The parcel post has made it possible to send eggs off very cheaply, especially if the prepared wooden egg boxes are used. Boxes to hold one doz. eggs 2s. per doz., and to hold two doz. 3s. 6d. per doz. For these boxes the carriage is 6d. per doz., and 9d. or 10d. for two doz. If private customers living in any large town can be obtained, it is a great advantage, and the prices must be regulated according to the time of year. If no private family is known, an advertisement will sometimes bring one.

The way to pack the eggs is to fold every egg in a good sized piece of newspaper, and then put each into its own division. Where eggs are sent away for sitting, much more care must be taken.

The eggs as collected should be laid on their sides and turned daily, and when packed should be embedded with the large end uppermost in bran or sawdust, and sent off by passenger train; the parcel post shakes them too much.

When eggs are very plentiful in the spring, as they should be, it is good to preserve them for the winter. If this be properly done they will be quite good for cooking, and even for poaching. They would not taste even if boiled, only that it is never quite safe to send one to table unopened in case of any accident.

A well known way, done much in Ireland, is to butter the eggs very slightly the day they are laid, and store them with the large end uppermost. Eggs packed in common salt also keep for a few months, and the salt can be used over and over again.

A still better way than either of these, where the eggs are to be kept for more than three months, is to "pot" them in lime. Get a stone or earthenware jar about one foot high and one foot in diameter, place in it about three lumps of unslaked quicklime about as big as your hands folded together. Fill the jar with water, and add a good handful of salt, and any time after the heat of the burning lime has abated the eggs can be put in. The lime should be well stirred up the day after it is put in, but finally it will sink to the bottom and form a soft mud. The first layer of eggs may be embedded in this, but afterwards just allowed to float as they will, until the jar is full. A little more water should be added from time to time as it evaporates. Great care must be taken that the eggs do not crack when put in, or they will not keep, and will spoil the others. It is wiser to preserve in a number of small jars rather than in one very large one, in order that the oldest eggs may be used first.

I must now broach the painful topic of how to kill a hen. Some people think it dreadful for a girl to even think of such a thing, and probably many of my readers think so too. But really, if the deed has to be done and there is no experienced person at hand to do it, it seems to me rather cowardly to shrink from the act. I often run away myself, I must confess, when I have given a plump little cockerel to an old man, who is very expeditious in this matter. With him, happily, it is a brief, rapid operation, and he is going on with his gardening a few minutes afterwards. The hen should be held securely and stunned with a heavy blow on the head, and then a sharp penknife should be run through the roof of its mouth into its brain. Another way is to cut the jugular vein in the throat right across with a very sharp knife. The muscular twitching of the hen afterwards is not caused by pain, and will soon cease.

The hen should be plucked immediately after it is killed, when the feathers of young birds will come out very easily, only be careful not to tear the skin. Old birds are not so easily managed, but if boiling water be poured over them, feathers and all, they can be plucked in a few minutes, and the feathers can be dried afterwards. I always find I can sell my chickens to my friends far more easily if I send them ready plucked.

Poulterers are always ready to buy really plump, well-fatted birds; in which case the feathers may stay on, but the price obtained will not be so great.

Before closing, a word is due about our illustration. Bantams are most charming little creatures to look at, and can be had in almost every "grown-up" variety, Bantams, Hamburgs (the black ones in the illustration), Cochins, Brahmans, Game, etc.

Some breeds lay very well, and the eggs are much advocated for children and invalids. Bantams take up much less room than hens, and of course eat less, but should be treated in the same way. Bantams and hens should not be kept in the same run together, the cock being very pugnacious and troublesome.

Where there is a very limited space a great deal of pleasure may be obtained by keeping a few of these pretty little creatures, and children enjoy them very much.

The profit from a utilitarian point of view may be small, and money is usually made out of them by breeding for show and fancy points.

I really must close now, so wish my readers every success in their undertaking, and as much pleasure as that success and their own industry will give them.

THE SILK INDUSTRY IN IRELAND AND AMERICA.

By DORA DE BLAQUIERE.

HE endeavour which is now in progress to found a silk industry in the South of Ireland will be looked upon with great interest by everyone. The poplin manufacture there dates from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and the enterprise of the skillful French artisans who settled in that part of the Irish capital called the "Liber-ties," and who carried with them the art of making poplin. The original invention of this material is claimed by Avignon, once the Papal City; on which account it was called "papaline," in compliment to the reigning Pope, in the fifteenth century. It seems to have been at that time specially made for church vestments, for which its firm texture admirably fitted it. The La Touche family established the first organised manufactory in Dublin, which opened in 1693, and by the end of the seventeenth century there were 2,500 workmen in Dublin, and as many more in Limerick, Cork, and other Irish cities. During the last few years fashion has dealt hardly with this handsome and well-wearing material, and in consequence the industry, once so flourishing, has greatly languished.

With regard to the establishment of the culture of the silkworm, called, properly speaking, "sericulture," the present attempt is not without a good foundation to support it; for Count Dandolo, the greatest authority on the subject, says that the soil and climate of Ireland are peculiarly favourable to the cultivation of silk. The late Lord Kingstown planted 30,000 mulberry trees on his estates, and sent to market raw silk of the best quality; but somehow the gallant enterprise did not pay, perhaps owing to the habits and character of the peasantry. The new "Association for the Promotion of Sericulture" was established in the South of Ireland in the year 1887, under the patronage of the Earl of Bandon, Lady Londonderry, Lady Bandon, Lady Bantry, Lady Kingstown, Lady Listowel, Lady Frederick Cavendish, and Lady Arnott; and an excellent committee, with Mr. M. H. Westropp as Hon. Secretary.

The first season closed in October last, and, in spite of great difficulties, the success has been very great and encouraging. About thirty persons undertook "educations," as the rearing of the silkworms are called, and, in spite of wet and cold weather, leaves sent long distances by post, and inexperience, the largest cocoons were produced, which spun as long a thread as the best French cocoons. The committee are now preparing for their second season, and, in addition to the first mulberry trees imported, have this year brought over 2,000 mulberry trees from France, and also new "grain," as the silkworms' eggs are called. It is to be hoped that this endeavour may be crowned with success; and lest our English girls should be overlooked, I will now try to give them some little account of the various attempts to establish the growing of silk in England, which began with the strenuous attempt of King James the First to establish it by Royal edict. The manufacture of silk really came over in an earlier reign, that of Henry VI., and we have always to thank the religious persecutions on the Continent for its progress. In 1585 the Duke of Alva drove the Flemings to our shores, and a century after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes sent us the Huguenots. No less than 72,000 of these came over, one of their largest settlements being at Spitalfields, where so many of their descendants still live.

But King James had agitated about silkworms more than seventy years before, directly that he came to England as king; perhaps incited thereto by the difficulty of obtaining silk stockings for his own private use. One of the best known stories of him describes him as borrowing a pair of silken hose from the Earl of Mar, in order to make a brave show when receiving the English ambassador, when he was on the throne of Scotland. Perhaps the earl did not want to lend them, as we are told that the king entreated him much, saying, "Ye surely would not have it that your king should appear a scrub before strangers!" It was perhaps in memory of these difficulties, that when the throne of England became his by the death of Elizabeth, he tried his best to establish the culture of silk. He brought over thousands of mulberry trees from France, and had them planted throughout the country, and established a mulberry garden and silkworms near St. James's, in the county of Middlesex. To the care of this garden he appointed Walter, Lord Aston, in the year of grace 1629. The site of this mulberry garden is now occupied by Buckingham Palace. For a long time, no doubt, the silkworms were fed from the leaves of the mulberries; but the gardens became afterwards a very famous place of fashionable resort, and for at least three reigns and in the Commonwealth no place was better known nor more frequented.

Thus throughout England we find traces of King James's endeavour; and at Bisham Abbey, Berkshire, two mulberry trees are still to be seen that have lived ever since; and there are many others also. A recent writer mentions Slough, Yately, and Nottingham as places where good silk has been produced, and one of the recent trials was made in 1846 at Knebworth, by the late Lord Lytton. The sad death of Lord Lytton's young daughter put an end to the experiment, which was begun for her special amusement, and was so associated with her memory that her bereaved father wrote to a friend to say "He had given it up as too painful, but he considered it a complete success." The silk was sent to Coventry, and was considered by the leading manufacturer there "better than any of the foreign silk he was able to obtain." These mulberry trees still remain at Knebworth, and constitute a large plantation or garden.

The most recent enthusiast on this subject was Mrs. Bladen Neill, who in 1876 hoped to establish the silk industry on a large scale in the Australian colonies, and to use England as a depôt, from whence the "grain" or silkworms' eggs might be drawn; thus supplying on both sides a new employment for educated women. Mrs. Neill spoke before large meetings at the Society of Arts, and explained that the mulberry flourishes in these colonies like a weed; and that there was every hope of founding a large silk industry in them. In January, 1878, Mr. B. F. Cobb, the former secretary of the Silk Supply Association, read a valuable paper before the Society of Arts on the rearing of "grain" or silkworms' eggs in this country. The writer of the paper showed that as an aid to thrift, and as a means of adding to small incomes, the pursuit in question was particularly suited for female work. Some practical calculations were also given, to show the highly profitable nature of the occupation, and its feasibility as an industry in this country on a large scale. Mr. Cobb's opinions were supported by Sir Antonio Brady, and other gentlemen, who had derived their knowledge from experience in the rearing of silkworms.

In 1876 several "educations" (as they are called) of various sizes took place during the summer, and up to October 21st the last worms were spinning their cocoons in London. The food for them was supplied from a magnificent old mulberry tree at Sion House, through the kindness of the Duchess of Northumberland. There was no doubt of the success of the trial made during this year. The eggs were healthy, the cocoons firm and well shaped, and the amount of mulberry leaves sent into the temporary depôt enough to feed any amount of worms, a fact showing the number of mulberry trees throughout the country, and the possibilities of the growth of the industry.

The chief difficulties that this enterprise has to contend with are very specifically stated in the American reports, and consist: 1st, in the impatience of the producers to realise profit before they have learned the art of making very good crops of cocoons, and in this way reducing the value of their industry; 2nd, the idea that it was not possible to train the English or Americans, as reeler, which is an art delicate and fine in its manipulation. The secretary of the American association quotes a specimen of the letters she has received, asking, "whether two elderly women—one nearly blind, the other with one arm and nearly helpless—could earn a living by raising silkworms?" And she pertinently inquires, "Could they do so at any industry?"

The silk industry to be properly fostered in any country needs, first, skilled culturists of silkworms; second, skilled reelers; third, cultivated groves of mulberry trees. The culture of these is a branch of horticulture little known out of silk-producing countries, but which is required as teaching how to bring the mulberry into the most perfect condition for full leaf, and keep it in that state of efficiency, also to facilitate, by proper pruning, the labour of leaf-picking for feeding the worms. The reel bears the same relation to silk culture that the cotton-gin does to cotton culture. It is the first process in preparing the cocoon for the loom; and if in America they have proved that this first cost can be reduced with good machinery and labour to a minimum, perhaps in time, here in England, we shall find the same results, and shall have discovered a work for our unemployed women, while founding a valuable industry. In the American section of my subject I shall, I hope, be able to go into this subject fully; as, thanks to the kindness of the Women's Silk Culture Association of Philadelphia, I have been supplied with information up to date of all their proceedings, struggles, anxieties, and successes, from 1880 to 1888.

The silk industry divides itself into three departments—the agricultural, which is the rearing of silkworms and curing the cocoons; the filature department, which is the reeling of silk and the preparation of commercial threads for the use of the third branch, which is the manufacturing into fabrics. The American Association—following wisely in the track of the Italian rules—does not recommend reeling at home. Thus the silk grower prepares his house and his trees for the season of growing silk, and the work of from thirty-five to forty days, during which time the worms are fed—a duty which must be attended to with the closest attention and care. When the silk crop is grown, it goes at once to the reeling establishment, and there the hands that grew the silk reel it for the manufacturer's use.

The cocoons are divided into two classes, i.e., raw silk and waste silk. The raw silk is that in which the chrysalis has been stifled (in the cocoon) before eating his way out, and cutting the strands of silk inside. Thus it is called "unpierced cocoons." The "pierced cocoons" are waste silk—that is when the moth has escaped from the cocoon. The first are the most valuable, and in Italy the cocoons are taken at once to the reeling house, where they are reeled while fresh, thus avoiding the process of killing the chrysalis. The thread of a fine French cocoon will sometimes measure 1,350 yards.

Waste silk has, within the last few years, become an important article of commerce, as a use has been found for it; and it has taken root and prospered in Yorkshire, chiefly through the wonderful enterprise of Mr. C. L. Lester, the inventor of the utilisation of silk waste; and the founder of an entirely new branch of the silk trade, i.e. that of spun silk. The waste silk is that from the filature husks, or knubs, and the pierced cocoons, and it is manufactured and macerated in mills, much after the same processes as the woollen and cotton mills, into spun silk, train, organzine, and the various threads of commerce. This new industry is said by Mr. Thomas Wardle (the chairman of the silk section of the Manchester Exhibition) to be a happy illustration of the facetious Yorkshire saying—"that any fibre can be spun, if it only be long enough to have two ends."

And now what is the practical end of our story about the new Irish industry and our own attempts in England? And "what can I do?" asks some earnest one amongst our women and girls. You can, if you live near any mulberry trees, try a small experiment. Watch the habits of a few silkworms, to begin with. Once learned, by the care of a few of them, you can see whether you think you could manage more, so that failure would be impossible, unless heavy rain or chilly weather should interfere. Or else, if you have land, you could plant a few mulberry trees, and remembering that no process of nature can be hurried, you can occupy the three years they will require for growth in learning how to rear the silkworms to eat their leaves. In England the great majority of mulberry trees are those of the black mulberry, the leaves of which are coarser than the white mulberry, the latter being the true food of the silkworm. But the leaves of the black will do very well for us, in our experiments, and if we want to do more, we must plant the white mulberry to guarantee still greater success.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

WEE QUEENIE.—In face of the doctor's opinion that you are doing too much work, your parents should see that you leave off something, or shorten your hours. The most objectionable part of your whole day, to our mind, seeing that your heart is said to be weak, is the railway journey to and from school; that is enough to do you harm, by hurrying you, and probably injuriously affecting digestion in the morning. You had better try to take a long rest this summer.

F. M. W.—"Thou wilt not gash thy flesh for him," the line you quote from Tennyson's "Aylmer's Field," in Averill's sermon, has reference to the practice of the worshippers of Baal. See 1 Kings xviii. 28.

MAY DAY HILLS (Victoria).—The "Erl king," a spirit of mischief, is said to haunt the Black Forest of Thuringia. There are two ballads dealing with the subject, Goethe's "Erlkönig," and the Danish ballad of "Sir Olaf and the Erl King's Daughter," which was translated by Herder.

HOUSEKEEPING.

D. T. B.—The use of kerosene oil, or some description of oil from petroleum, is said to be destructive to insects in furniture, as well as to act as a preservative to the wood.

MARGARET.—To clean gilt frames take a gill of good vinegar in a pint of cold water, a large, soft, clean, old shaving brush, and clean soft cloths. Brush the dust from the frame, dip the brush in the liquid, squeeze it slightly, so that it may not be too wet, and brush the gilding, doing a small piece at a time, lightly up and down, till it be quite restored. The brush must be constantly washed and the liquid renewed when dirty.

SITTINGBOURNE and MADGE WILDFIRE.—An article on "laying the table" will be found at page 106, vol. vii., with full directions, and "Table Decorations," page 819, vol. viii. "How to Wait at Table," page 488, vol. viii. Now that flowers are so much used, very little fruit is put on the table for dessert; sometimes only the preserved fruits and bonbons.

COOKERY.

MAGGIE MAC had better buy the ginger preserved; it is very moderate in price. 2. White straw hats are bleached in sulphur fumes. Send to a proper cleaner.

C. A.—On page 383, vol. vii., is a recipe for making biscuits of all sorts, and you can purchase the charcoal ready prepared to add to them. 2. The foods to be avoided in case of flatulence are, potatoes, cabbage, and all that tribe—including cauliflowers; no pastry, and no recooked foods; little tea, only three meals a day—nothing between. Rest for half an hour after meals; take daily exercise, and keep early hours.

L. E. C., NAOMI, WISHEE, R. S. V. P. and PHILLIS.—You will find recipes how to make and ice cakes of all kinds in an article on the subject, vol. vi., page 716; also see "Icing for Cakes," pages 174, 800, in the same volume.

M. J. D.—Many thanks for the "home-made wine" recipe. It is not full enough, however, for such a process.

MUSIC.

HOPEFUL.—We do not think it likely that you could obtain pupils as a teacher of music unless certificated. But were you qualified to act as a daily governess, in the several branches of an English education, sometimes a little music might satisfy your employer, at least for a time, were the children young. You might get employment as a shop-assistant if you wrote a better hand.

A CONSTANT READER (Mansfield).—Op. 24 means composition or work 24; op. being short for opera, the Italian word for work, which has the same meaning, wherever it is used, of labour, action, work; in Italian it would not apply exclusively to music any more than our word "work." We say, the greatest work of Handel, or the greatest work of Shakespeare, applying "work" to art, music, or sculpture.

IDDIE STANLEY.—The musical term Arpeggio is Italian, and signifies playing the notes of a chord quickly one after the other, as on the harp; the "g's" in the word are soft and are pronounced as in the word "hedge" or "ledge," not as in "egg." "Fine" at the end of a piece of music is also Italian, and is pronounced fe-ne, not "fine" as in "fine" weather. "Melody" consists in a succession of single tones, harmony in a succession of chords. "Melodic" only means of the nature of melody, or made up of melody. "Harmony" has two meanings—1. As we have quoted above, a succession of chords according to the rules of progression and modulation. 2. The science which treats of their construction and progression. A harmonic triad is the chord of a note with its third and fifth, the common chord. Harmony is music in parts, sounds heard at the same time. We hope you understand, but you are not the first person we have known in the same hopeless confusion.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—Possibly the aged man for whom you desire a home might be received in one of the Aged Pilgrims' Asylums, which are at Camberwell, Hornsey Rise, Brighton, and Stamford Hill; secretary, Mr. W. Jackson, 29, Marlborough Road, Upper Holloway, N.

A SHY GIRL.—The only cure for shyness is to be found in the attainment of self-forgetfulness; and this latter is to be found in devoting your thoughts and practical attention to others. To wait on them, to please them, to listen to and learn some good thing from them—their words, manners, and appearance—if engrossing your attention as it should, would involve that charming self-forgetfulness which, strange as it may appear, is consistent with a due amount of self-possession. Self-consciousness is an outcome of personal vanity and desire for admiration; self-possession has to do with seemingly conduct, not vanity.

LUZ, LAPROFESSORA, and NINA (Habana, Cuba).—We could not undertake to give you instructions on the process of paint-making—gamboge, for example—from the time of the extraction of the gummy juice from the tree. You should visit a manufactory for that. You and "Laprofessora" write beautiful hands. In England, clerks belong, as a rule, to what is called "middle-class society"; in the colonies it is otherwise; all depends on whether a man be a gentleman by birth. Many of the sons of the aristocracy, even in England the younger sons of the aristocracy are often clerks at the Admiralty, or Horse Guards, and are in the highest society; there are clerks and clerks. Freckles are natural to some skins. Bathing with sage-tea is good for sunburn. Girls often grow till they are of age, when the soft bones of early youth have attained the hardness of maturity. We thank you for your kind letters.

ELGIN.—We should think that all house dogs living in the rooms should be washed. But it should be done carefully, so that they do not take cold, and the dog should be well rubbed, and kept warm, or given a good run afterwards.

AN ANXIOUS ONE.—We have quite recently given an answer on the subject of squinting. If in an infant or very young child, some benefit may be derived from lightly bandaging the eye that is not affected, so as to force the other to work, and so bring the contracted muscles into play. Your second question we fail to understand. Do you mean "snoring"? If so, tie up your chin at night, and perhaps that may lessen the noise.

SNOWDROP had better refer to the article called "Spots and Stains" in the series called "The Fairy of the Family." 2. She might lay a piece of blotting paper on each side of the grease spot, stretching the material (of the dress) quite flat, and then hold a smoothing iron over it, to draw out the grease, or pass it gently over the spot. Of course she must use as cool an iron as she can; that would extract the stain.

SCHEEWITTCHEN.—The "Seven Ages of Man" will be found in Shakespeare's As You Like It, act ii., scene 7; the sentence begins, "His acts being seven ages."

MAUDE FERRER'S verses have some merit, but lack original thought, and are transcribed in very bad handwriting. The latter she should try to improve without delay, and if she derive enjoyment herself from writing the verses, there is no harm done.

CHAPTER I.

"Little we knew of the lives that waited Hidden for each in the coming years."
—Lillias C. Davidson.

THE trees were decked with their luxuriant leafy robes, the hedges were draped with delicate wreaths of convolvulus and wild rose, lovely flower jewels and fern plumes peeped from many a cranny and crevice of a lane turning from the main road in the immediate vicinity of Rochgate.

Two young girls sauntered leisurely along, one carrying a basket laden with spoils from nature's treasure-house, and opening a gate they crossed a meadow to a rustic bench which stood in the shade of some elm trees. Seating themselves, they gave their basket a toss, and a shower of wild flowers fell at their feet.

"I dare not show my face to Connie without taking her the garland I promised her," said the elder of the two, as she began arranging the blossoms and foliage, and deftly tying them together with thread. Presently she looked up with a sorrowful expression, saying, "Oh, Ruth, I can't bear to think that by this time next month you will be on your way to the other ends of the earth."

"I can't bear to think of leaving you," said her companion, resting her head on her friend's shoulder; "but," she added, after a pause, her bright brown eyes sparkling, "it will be glorious to see waves, waves, nothing but waves around one."

"That depends," uttered

"HAVE IT! HAVE IT NOT!"

matter-of-fact Muriel Egerton, raising her eyes and eyebrows in a comical way.

"Then there will be such a crowd of new experiences," continued Ruth Stacey, not deigning to notice Muriel's unpleasant suggestion, "and Tasmania is such a charming place, so a gentleman tells us who has been there, the scenery so delightful, I can't help enjoying the thought of it."

Muriel went on weaving her flower-chain in silence.

"You know, dear old Mu, I'm awfully sorry to leave you—I am indeed; but four or five years will not seem so very long, perhaps, and father has promised me that if I keep in the same mind, and go on studying steadily until I'm eighteen, he will send me home to Girton the very first opportunity that offers."

"Very likely you will alter your mind."

"No, that I'm sure I shall not. I'm perfectly determined to fit myself to take some good position." And a very determined little body Ruth looked. Then she gave a merry laugh. "Become Lady Principal of some high class college for ladies, a professor of something or other; who knows?" And she waved her hand in dignified style.

Muriel now joined in the laugh.

"Well, Ruthie, you may don the student's cap and gown; all I want is to wear the nurse's livery. I'm trying to persuade father and mother to let me be trained for a sick nurse, when I'm old enough. I should love it. It is glorious work!"

"Yes, of course, very good and useful, but I could not fancy spending my life making gruel and poultices," rejoined Ruth.

"My father says he believes many a patient's life has been saved by skilful nursing. I would rather be engaged in such work than in cramming people's heads with learning that may never be of any use to them!"

"How you talk, Muriel!" ejaculated Ruth, jumping up and facing the would-be nurse. "Is not the mind worth more than the body? Did not Miss Chubb tell us one day that every scrap of knowledge worth gaining, thoroughly acquired, must be of benefit not only to ourselves, but no one can tell to how many others?"

This oration was delivered in Ruth's own emphatic manner, and with suitable gesticulation.

Muriel smiled; she was used to these outbursts, and, being in a somewhat satirical mood, answered—

"Well, Ruth, since I'm not half learned enough to understand how the mind could get on here without the body, or the body be worth anything without the mind, we will divide the work between us."

"Ah! laugh away, Muriel; I expect we shall both get our wish."

"I am not very hopeful about it."

"Why not? I thought Dr. Egerton approved of girls being brought up so that they could earn a living if it were a necessity."

"So he does, and it certainly is likely to be a necessity with us—such a number of us—but he seems to think I cannot understand the hardships of a nurse's work, so he will say nothing definite yet, and I am to go on with my studies just as if I were going to be a governess, which I'm sure I shall never be!"

Growing near them were a few dandelions that had dropped their golden petals and stood erect, their light seeds looking fit balls for baby fairies.

"Let us see what the fairies prophesy for us," said Ruth, plucking one of these and beginning with "Have it! Have it not!" until with Have it, the last tiny feather was wafted away. Giving another to her friend, and taking the wreath from her hands, "Now, Muriel," she cried, "try your fate." The fairies being equally kindly disposed towards Muriel, she was seized by the waist and waltzed around the staid old elms by lively Ruth.

"You'll see, Muriel, the fairies will grant us our desires."

"Then some day, Ruth, there will be an announcement in the Times to this effect: 'We regret to say that the second of the course of lectures being delivered at the Royal Institution by Professor R. Stacey, on "How to Sweep the Cobwebs from the Sky," is unavoidably postponed in consequence of the learned professor having a severe attack of clergyman's throat.' Nurse Muriel will then make the 'gruel and poultices,' and generally fuss over the body of the said professor until the patient has sufficiently recovered to resume her work of filling other folk's brain boxes again."

The garland being completed, it was stowed away in the basket, and, warned by the sound of a gong, the girls scampered off to a small iron gate in a wall and let themselves into the grounds of the Rochdale Grammar School, of which Mr. Stacey had been for some years head master.

Dr. Egerton and Mr. Stacey were friends of many years' standing, and between their two eldest children, to whom we have just been introduced, a similar bond of friendship had been formed, when very young, and, strengthened by school companionship. This friendship was to be tried by a long parting. Mr. Stacey, who was not a strong man, had accepted the appointment of principal to a new college founded in Tasmania, and he, with his wife and family, consisting of two boys and a girl besides Ruth, were shortly to sail for their new home. Muriel was now paying her farewell visit to Rochdale, and three weeks later the sad "Good-bye" was said, amid many tears and protestations of unchangeable affection and promises of religiously kept-up correspondence.

Dr. Egerton was a medical man in a thickly-populated eastern suburb of London, and, as Muriel said, the father of a large family—three were schoolboys, two little girls were under the tuition of a daily governess, and a tiny boy and girl were still in the nursery. Seeing, therefore, that the doctor had no private property, it was not surprising he felt the desirability of his daughters being prepared to earn a living. But he wisely decreed that Muriel, being a bright and clever girl, should have all the advantage it was in his power to give her in the matter of education. Hence she returned to the Misses Chubb's care for another two years, leaving school then to take up a daughter's home duties before beginning still graver responsibilities.

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE BOW.

"His grizzly beard was long and thick,
With which he strung his fiddlestick;
For he to horse-tail scorned to owe
For what on his own chin did grow."

Hudibras.

WE now come to the magic wand or bow, whose influence over our violins is so mysterious and absolute. Strangely enough, it has no affinity with that over which it dominates; indeed it is a thing quite apart; it is not born in the same class, neither has it any previous acquaintance with the characteristics of the creature it is to rule, and yet the whole training of the violin has been to ensure obedience to this despot which should one day sway its destinies. It is in a measure owing to this training that the wand has been able to take it from among the mass of musical instruments, and place it in the forefront as their king.

The maple and the pine, as they grew up in strength and beauty in their forest home, would scarcely have believed it had the wind whispered as it passed them that in the future they would owe their position, development, and influence to a reed or a sugar barrel. It is often the mean and the unlikely which bring out the beautiful and grand in a character—the very contact between the opposites will effect this.

A thing of so much power as the bow must have a history, but, like many another great influence in the world, its origin is enveloped in mystery. Many men have had many opinions about it, and yet beyond a certain point they have left us to grope about in the dark, if we care to do so. This, however, would be unprofitable, as it certainly would not clear away the clouds from its birth. Of this we are sure, that the ancients did not possess it and we do; they may have had something like it in shape, but the power, grace, and magic, which are characteristics of the present bow, had no existence in days of old.

Just as our violin is scarcely recognisable as a descendant of the old clumsy triangular sort of rebec or crowd, so it is difficult to believe that the bow of the present day is a child of the clumsy, crooked reed bow, with a strand of coarse hair rudely stretched between the extremities, which our forefathers used.

A few illustrations and some remarks of travellers in the East are all the information we have concerning the early life of the bow, and whether it be of Arabian, Syrian, or Welsh origin cannot be decided. It did not rapidly throw off its original ungainliness, and the violin was ready for the bow before the bow was sufficiently graceful to prove an efficient ruler. Indeed, during a hundred years of the violin's palmiest days the bow was inartistic and clumsy, and the union of the two was another illustration of "Beauty and the Beast."

We owe a great deal of the power and efficiency of the bow to France, which produced as great enthusiasts in the art of bow-making as Italy in that of violin-making.

What is the special work of this bow, so masterful, so absolute, so mysterious in its power, as to have deserved the name of magic wand? First and foremost, it is to make the violin, which up to this point has been dumb, speak. It endows it also with the power of thought-reading, of receiving and conveying the sentiments and feelings of human beings; of expressing prayer and praise, love and anguish, joy and sorrow, better even than can be done by the human voice. It develops the hidden powers of wood and strings, and puts them in touch with our hearts; it is the medium, so to say, by which we can express thoughts and feelings, often too deep for words. It renders the violin an instrument of peace and contentment, of gentle suasion and harmony among the whole human race.

Its method of performing its work is very simple; guided by a human hand, it sweeps across the strings, it may be, a feeling or a love message, a prayer or a shout of joy just fresh from some heart; the strings, trained to perfect obedience, take it up in a second, and by their vibrations wake up the two tables of the violin, connected with them by means of the bridge, to add their vibrations and take up the sound. Almost before you can draw a breath the vibrations have set the air in motion, which in its turn is alive and eager, never resting till the message which it carries reaches its destination. The power of the bow is seen, therefore, more in that which it makes the violin do than in that which it does itself.

The violin, as handed down to us by the Amatis, by Straduaris, Guarnerius, and Stainer, is so perfect that neither the ingenuity nor the fault-finding characteristic of man have been able to find a flaw in it.

This cannot be said of the bow, which has only quite lately approached its perfect stage. It is just possible that the ancients excited their strings to vibrate by other means than hair. Paganini, as we know, sometimes used a slender rush. Its origin is, as we have said, enveloped in mystery. I wonder if it was the result of watching certain insects, for in a book of Knight's published in New York in 1875, he says—"Grasshoppers, crickets, and the like are frequently spoken of as singing, yet they do not sing—they fiddle. By rubbing legs and wings together, each in the manner peculiar to the species, these insects produce the sounds which characterise them. Locusts are fiddlers; their hind legs are the bows, and the projecting veins of their wing-covers the strings. On each side of the body, just above and a little behind the thighs, is a deep cavity closed by a thin piece of skin stretched tightly across it like a banjo cover. When a locust begins to play, he bends the shank of one hind leg beneath the thigh where it is lodged in a furrow designed to receive it, and then draws the leg briskly up and down several times against the edge and veins of the wing-cover, the leg being the bow." It is just possible that this suggested the bow.

Some three or four men stand out from among the bow makers as worthy the thanks of all lovers of the violin; they are Francis Tourte, J. B. Vuillaume, Francois Lupot, and John Dodd, an Englishman.

The first of these is among bow makers what Straduaris is among violin makers. He was born in the year 1747, in Paris, and died in 1835. He was perfectly uneducated, and when apprenticed to a clock maker at an early age, he could neither read nor write; indeed, I do not know if at any age he could do so.

At the close of his apprenticeship he gave up a trade he had no love for, and took to that which filled him with enthusiasm, viz., bow-making. It is more than probable that during his eight years of apprenticeship he gained that skill and delicacy of hand, and that marvellous accuracy of measurement, which when applied to his new work made his reputation.

His first attempts at bow-making were made on old sugar barrels, which he was able to pick up cheap, and the bows so made he sold for about one shilling each. Every bow he made was a step forward on the field of discovery, and his great desire now was to find a stiff light wood which would do credit to his work. He decided that Pernambuco wood* would be the very best, but it was dear, and he was poor. This wood was sent to France in billets for drug purposes, and it was rare to find a piece with straight grain and long enough to make a bowstick, and it was this difficulty which compelled him to ask so much money later on for his bows.

He did not shape the bow out of a thick plank, as the violin maker did the back and belly of his violin; had he done so he would have cut the fibres across, instead of keeping them intact throughout the length of the bow. His method was to heat the stick right through the inner fibres, and then bend it to the shape required.

Nor did he confine his attention to the wood only, he was equally careful about the hair; in this part of his work he was ably seconded by his daughter. He preferred the hair of French horses, he said, to any other, as being larger and stronger. He rejected all hairs which were not perfectly cylindrical and equal throughout their length, and he found that not more than one-tenth of any given number of hairs possessed these qualifications, most of them being flat on one side.

Having obtained those that pleased him, he subjected them to a thorough cleansing by soap and bran, and last of all passed them through clear water tinged with a little blue. He did not use quite so many hairs as we do now. As a rule our bows contain from 150 to 200.

He frequently mounted his bows in tortoiseshell, mother-o'-pearl, and gold, and obtained for such eleven guineas; they are much coveted in the present day, and command very high prices. He spent the latter part of his life very quietly, and divided his time between bow-making and fishing.

The next best bow-maker to Tourte was J. B. Vuillaume, born in Paris 1799. He lived to the age of seventy-six, and was one of the most perfect copyists and imitators that ever lived.†

He took immense pains to discover the secret of Tourte's success. He measured every one that passed through his hand, and never lost an opportunity of watching Tourte as he cut up the billets of Pernambuco wood, and of seeing how careful he was to get the grain straight and its curl in the proper direction. Yet with all his care and watchfulness he does not seem to have guessed the secret. He brought, however, to the making of the bow the same spirit of scientific inquiry which he applied to the making of the violin, and we are not surprised, therefore, to hear that he remedied one or two very serious inconveniences under which the bow laboured.

One was the difficulty in arranging the hair so as to form a perfectly even surface throughout its length, and the other was the constantly changing position of the nut.

It was, however, his wonderful power of copying which made him so famous, and in nothing is this power better shown than in the copy he made of Paganini's Guarnerius, which, to the great distress of the owner, fell from the roof of the diligence as he was entering Paris. He took it at once to Vuillaume, knowing that if anyone could repair the damage done to the thing he loved best on earth, he could.

It was while this violin was under his care that Vuillaume felt an irresistible desire to make a copy of it which should defy detection. On the day when Paganini was to receive his treasure back from the hands of the mender and healer, Vuillaume put two violins on the table before him, saying, "I have succeeded so well in restoring your violin, that I am quite unable to distinguish it from the other Guarnerius which has been entrusted to me, and which seems to me exactly like it—you of course will know your own in a moment."

Paganini was greatly agitated; he took up first one and then the other, he took them one in each hand, but to no purpose, he could come to no decision. One hope remained, he snatched up his bow and sent it flying over the strings, first of one and then of the other—all were equally obedient to its command; he was distracted, and his perplexity increased every moment. It is said he strode about the room with his hands clenched and his eyes on fire.

Vuillaume, content with his triumph, begged Paganini to be calm. "Here is your violin," he said, taking up one; "and here is the copy I made of it," taking up the other; "keep them both, in memory of me."

Vuillaume was an extremely honest man, otherwise there is no knowing where this power of imitation would have landed us.

England is not without its celebrated bow-makers, among whom John Dodd stands prominent. What he might have been had he not been poor and fond of drink it is impossible to say, for with these drawbacks he made a great name, and is often called the English Tourte.

"His bows," says Fleming, "are remarkable for their magnificent wood and workmanship, and for being exceedingly light and graceful." One fault they had, which probably was the result of poverty—they were too short. He never would have an apprentice, declaring he did not wish to teach anyone his method of making bows, and, poor as he was, he refused £1,000 for making known his secret.

Dr. Selle, of Richmond, who knew him well, says: "In his person he was very small, and waddled rather than walked; he was negligent in his attire, wearing an old threadbare coat of the most miserable description, smalls, and a broad-brimmed hat."

He visited the public-house with great regularity four times a day, and he died at Richmond Workhouse of bronchitis on the 4th October, 1839, at the age of eighty-seven. His bows sell very well in the present day, two or three sovereigns being the usual sum paid for them.

And now that we have our violin and its bow as perfect as we can get them, we will wait until the next chapter in order to find if among our women and girls master-hands may be found to draw out the sounds with which to charm and influence us, and in this we shall not be disappointed.

* Brazil wood, and a particular kind of snakewood which grows in Demerara, are also used for bows.

WHITE CLOVER.

By CLARA THWAITES.

A FIELD of white clover,
Of bonny white clover!
A couch for a dreamer to lie,
Where the bees ever coming
Will soothe us with humming,
And chant us a lullaby.

And the lark in the azure
Shall sweeten our leisure
With songs of the glad and the free;
When his rapture is over
He will drop to the clover
And rest in the valley with me.

And honey of clover,
When dreaming is over,
We'll share with the bees at their feast,
For a signal is flying
Where nectar is lying,
And "welcome" it cries to the guest.

Oh, were I a fairy,
Yon pinnacle so airy
I would launch for a voyage through air;
There are oars for the galley
Wherewith one may dally
In the depths of the clover so fair.

No storm-cloud will gather
To darken our weather;
The clover is open full wide;
There is joy for us, Alys,
O'er hills and o'er valleys,
Where laughter and sunshine betide.

So bear on thy bosom
The clover's white blossom,—
A charm against sorrow and pain,
The shamrock of gladness,
The trefoil for sadness,
A posy for summer's bright reign.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER II.

O "make up one's mind to publish" is a step frequently taken by young authors; and so far as the determination goes, it is both easy and agreeable. There are, however, further steps necessary in the matter beyond the author's private decision, and it is commonly with these that the difficulty arises. Publishers are proverbially difficult to convince of untried merit, and, though they are ever on the watch for what is really good and original, they have to be sure that what is offered to them is worth their purchase-money. This very simple fact is often overlooked by the inexperienced, who think that a publisher's inveterate antagonism to publishing anything is only to be overcome by letters of introduction from somebody of consequence. It never occurs to them that publishing is the publisher's business, as much as doctoring is a doctor's business; that he wants to practise his trade as much as other men want to practise theirs, and is only anxious to do it satisfactorily.

Dottie looked at Evelyn with her round dark brown eyes rounder than ever, and an expression of awe upon her bonny face.

"Shall you really? Oh, how splendid to have an authoress for my cousin! But what has made you decide that?"

"Last night was the turning-point," replied Evelyn; "I can't tell you, Dottie—and if I could you wouldn't understand—what I felt at hearing those illustrious names—names of men whose thoughts I have here." And she pointed to her well-filled bookshelves. "And above all when Mrs. Allingham West came in—to see how she was followed and courted, what an influence she has exerted, all through that one book! What were the men of science to her? People cared more to look at her than to see all the slides and diagrams in the world. She helps to make the thought of her age, that is the reason. Now I feel I must do the same. Uncle will laugh at me, I am prepared for that, but I don't care. I choose a literary life!"

To Dottie, who thought her cousin unutterably clever, beautiful, and fascinating, there was something grand in this announcement. She really felt as though Evelyn were in a sense a heroine, renouncing rank, fashion, amusement, for the sake of a noble career. She gazed solemnly at her lovely, animated face.

"But you will not write for money, will you?" she inquired.

"Certainly not," returned Evelyn, with dignity; "it is not necessary, and I should not think of it for a moment in any case. I have been looking over my poems all the morning, and I shall take them to a publisher at once; I think I shall call them 'Day-dreams.'"

"And by what name shall you call yourself?" inquired Dottie.

"Espérance; Hope, you know—that will be most suitable in every way. Oh, to see myself in print! How enchanting! Dottie, I have dreamt of it all these years!" And Evelyn rose to fling her arms round her little cousin, who warmly returned her embrace.

"I shall never be clever like you, Evelyn, but I am proud of you," cried the warm-hearted girl. "I wonder what Algy will say?"

"Algy" was Dottie's only brother, who, after his Oxford life, was disporting himself in a lengthened tour upon the Continent.

"Algy? Oh, I don't suppose he will take any interest in it," lightly responded Evelyn. "Nothing poetical is in his line, as you know. Why should you trouble to tell him anything about it?"

The carriage wheels were heard, and the girls went down to greet Mrs. Lancaster, returning from her round of calls.

Evelyn's lot was certainly cast in pleasant places. The luxurious house in which she lived with her aunt and cousin stood in spacious grounds on a hill in a south-western suburb. The rumble of carts and carriages along the high road came but with distant murmur across the park to the ears of the dwellers in that great square pile, solid, substantial, telling of wealth in every detail, within and without.

A charming flower-garden surrounded the house, and tall elms in the park were musical with the cawing of rooks. The charms of country and town met in one, for along the road on which the lodge gates opened, Mrs. Lancaster's well-appointed carriage could bowl on its C springs to the West-end in less than an hour, a fact which the good lady constantly alleged to those friends who wondered at her for living out in the Surrey suburbs. She was secretly convinced that she should die if she were shut up in one of the smoky West-end squares, and both Evelyn and Dottie loved their home. They loved the wide, open commons with their glory of gorse, their noble forest trees standing here and there, the pageant of the sunset sky spread freely out to them across that far expanse, and not for all the fashion in the world would the girls have exchanged the freedom and airiness of their surroundings. One little flaw, and one alone, there was in Evelyn's lot. Intellectual and imaginative, she would have liked to be more closely encircled by intellectual, artistic, and imaginative society. Mrs. Lancaster and Dot would not have cared for it had it been within reach, and the glimpses Evelyn could get were few and far between in comparison with her ambition.

"When I publish," thought the girl, "that will be altered. I shall obtain the entrée into the world of authors, and talk to all those people I saw last night on equal terms, instead of being a little nobody from Surrey."

"Has Evelyn told you, mother, of her determination?" asked Dot, after dinner. She was sitting on the balustrade of the balcony that opened from the drawing-room, with her Japanese umbrella. The low sunlight gleamed on the waters of a pool in the park—much celebrated in the neighbourhood—that was almost, but not quite, large enough to be called a lake, and that in the winter afforded untold delight to the skating community. The girl made a pretty picture with her kitten nestling in her lap, and this picturesque background in the distance.

Instead of replying, Mrs. Lancaster, stout and good-humoured, made a remark she repeated at least twice every fine day.

"Really, now, one might suppose we were a hundred miles from town."

"Darling mother, what has that got to do with Evelyn?" responded Dottie, arching her dark eyebrows; and Mrs. Lancaster smiled sleepily. Her niece's determinations were not of much interest, as a rule, to her after dinner.

"I am going to publish a book, auntie," declared the girl, in clear, distinct tones.

"Good gracious, my dear," cried Mrs. Lancaster, drawing herself suddenly upright. "Whatever will your uncle say?"

"I don't care what my uncle says!" rejoined Evelyn, a little haughtily. "I am my own mistress now, and I want the carriage to-morrow morning, auntie, if you don't mind, to go to the City."

To Mrs. Lancaster's mind publishing was connected somehow or other with poverty, dying prematurely in a garret, Grub Street, insolent patrons, and so forth. It struck her as altogether incongruous, if not improper, that a young lady, good looking, accomplished, with enough money of her own to support her in comfort, should write books; and she was searching her memory for some illustration that would at once alarm and deter Evelyn. Dr. Johnson, who used once to come to a spot not many miles away to see Mrs. Thrale—hadn't he, now, said something about a woman writing a book, that would be just the thing to impress her niece? Mrs. Lancaster had a dim recollection of dancing bears in the observation; but how and why was that comparison introduced? The poor lady hurriedly searched her memory, and so far succeeded as to say, half timorously—

"Don't you remember that Dr. Johnson called a lady who had written a book a dancing bear?"

"He was a bear himself," returned Evelyn, rather startled at this sudden thrust, "but I don't remember anything of the sort; and if I did I shouldn't care what Dr. Johnson said—rude old thing!"

"Well, I know he said, 'It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all,'" persisted the good lady, whose reverence for the great lexicographer was one of the few results of her somewhat desultory education, and who was resolved to make her point.

Dottie, highly entertained at the little scene, and yet sorry for Evelyn, cried out from her balcony—

"Darling mother, you are all wrong; it was about a woman preaching Dr. Johnson said that, and it wasn't a bear either that he brought into the comparison."

"Well, I know he did disapprove of young ladies publishing verses, and said something of the sort," protested Mrs. Lancaster, whose attempts at impressing her young people by quotations usually ended in failure.

"Whatever it was, it isn't to the point now, is it?" retorted Evelyn. "You know, auntie, how fond I have always been of writing, and I am sure my last poems are quite good enough to publish, so I am going to town, if you will let me, to-morrow, to Messrs. Wrexham and Bird. I have made up my mind to go, so do be kind and nice about it, there's a dear."

Poor Mrs. Lancaster could never resist her niece very long; besides, Evelyn's talents and her love of writing had long been an acknowledged household fact. No thought entered the good woman's mind but that the girl was fully competent to enter the lists of authors. Her objection rose rather from the idea that it was decent to practise feminine talents within a certain charmed circle, and surround their exercise with reserve. However, she yielded, of course; and the next day, with a beating heart, Evelyn was driving citywards.

When she actually entered the sanctum of the great man whose acquaintance with her uncle had won her admission to his presence, her agitation seemed as though it would suffocate her for the moment. He sat in a very little room before a very large table, and appeared, she thought, to regard her with a certain fatherly compassion from behind his spectacles.

"Yes, Mr. Hope is an intimate friend of mine," he responded to Evelyn's faltering introduction; "does he know, may I ask, of your visit to me?"

"No; I do not think my uncle cares about my writing poetry," she answered, trying to smile.

"Poetry? Ah, yes," observed Mr. Wrexham, taking the dainty packet Evelyn held out to him, and turning the leaves. "Most young authors begin with poetry; but it's not always wise to publish it—not always wise. Have you written anything else?"

"I have always been writing, more or less; it is my favourite occupation," returned Evelyn, attempting to pluck up dignity. "This is by no means my first attempt."

"I suppose you have had no experience of print?" asked the publisher. "Do you know that this would make a very small volume indeed?"

"I don't wish it to be large. I have no ambition to issue great books," returned Evelyn, grandly. "My idea is a delicate binding—very thick paper—plenty of margin."

"Quality, not quantity," remarked the publisher, pleasantly; and she hated him for saying it. "Poetry is just now a drug in the market," he went on; "nothing but the best will sell; and I should be doing wrong, Miss Hope, if I led you to believe we could offer you anything for these poems."

"I do not wish to be paid," responded Evelyn.

"You are fortunate; but we could not even issue them at our own risk, paying you nothing."

"Cannot you read them first, before deciding that?" asked Evelyn, who considered herself business-like, and felt she ought to stand up for her rights. She had always understood that publishers required a great deal of browbeating if authors dare only exercise it.

The publisher in question smiled pitifully. He had glanced at the poems—as Oliver Wendell Holmes somewhat prosaically says, the buyer does not need to eat, but only to taste, a cheese before purchasing it. He saw that, while they were not bad, they were far removed from being good; that they were the first crude attempts of talent, expressing for the most part borrowed thought in borrowed phraseology; correct as to metre and rhyme, very passable as amateur work, but, as yet, nothing more. He also—for he was a shrewd and kindly man—saw that the advice he would willingly have given to the elegant young lady before him would be distasteful and disregarded. Still, he made an effort, out of sheer good nature.

"I think I have read something like this before, Miss Hope," he said, and turning a leaf, he read aloud:

"When autumn winds blow chill and drear,
And dropping leaves are whirled away,
And crimson glows the parting day,

Full sadly wanes the waning year.'
Is not that rather like an imitation of 'In Memoriam'? In poetry it is necessary in these days to be original, if the poet wishes to find readers."

"That is not the best poem by any means," hurriedly interposed Evelyn.

"No, probably not; and I have no wish to discourage you. You have plenty of time before you, and I should say, as Mr. Hope would, I am sure—Wait awhile."

"Thank you. I need not trouble you any further," said Evelyn, rising, with mortification at her heart. She did not choose to suggest that Messrs. Wrexham and Bird should bring out the volume at her expense, and as they would probably have declined to do so, she was wise. She was provided with a second string to her bow, for she had furnished herself beforehand with all the information she could collect, and ere long she was mounting some steep and narrow stairs, on the way to see a member of the firm of Messrs. Dalrymple and Co.

Here a very different reception awaited her. The stout, round-faced gentleman with the little, twinkling eyes, after a rapid survey of her appearance, glanced through the manuscript, and seemed to read a poem here and there.

"Very nice; very pretty indeed!" he remarked, approvingly. "This 'Sonnet to the East Wind' is capital!"

"South wind," put in Evelyn.

"Ah, well, just so. We have a good deal of poetry on hand just now, that is the only thing; but we could bring out an edition of five hundred for you—that will do to begin with—easily get a second edition out when it is wanted—if you felt inclined to risk from £30 to £50. Little doubt, I should say no doubt, but that you would recoup yourself amply out of the profits of sale, and —"

"Oh, money is not my object," put in Evelyn, charmed at this change of view; and she was very soon deep in the discussion of binding, paper, and print.

As she was driving home she did not feel wholly satisfied with the result of her morning's work. She knew that Messrs. Wrexham and Bird occupied a far higher position in the publishing world than Messrs. Dalrymple and Co. She would like to have seen Mr. Wrexham fall back in his chair; to have heard him exclaim: "This, indeed, is genius! My dear young lady, you have a great future before you!" On the contrary, he evidently did not think much of the poems; but then, as Evelyn had remarked in one of them entitled "Misunderstood," the poet soul is not, as a rule, appreciated by the common herd.

To this she, in self-defence, supposed Mr. Wrexham, in spite of his eminence, must belong.

POETS OVER-SEA.

A GOSSIP ON THE RECENT POETRY OF AMERICA.

By GLEESON WHITE, Author of "Some Poetry we Read," "Ballades and Rondeaux," etc.

PART III.

F all the younger school of American men of letters, whose reputations have preceded a knowledge of their work on this side, the name of Edgar Fawcett is perhaps most familiar; yet although he is known amongst a few English people as a poet of no mean order, it would be hard to find many who have intimate knowledge of his poetry. When "Fantasy and Passion," published in 1878, found its way to England in privately presented copies, it won praise on all sides. Only lately the copy that belonged to Dante Gabriel Rossetti, was in my hands, and its pencilled margin showed that the great poet-painter was a reader and admirer of the young American's work. One specially underlined in Rossetti's copy was this—

TO AN ORIOLE.

How falls it, oriole, thou hast come to fly
In tropic splendour through our Northern sky?

At some glad moment was it nature's choice

To dower a scrap of sunset with a voice?

Or did some orange tulip, flaked with black,
In some forgotten garden, ages back,

Yearning toward Heaven until its wish was heard,

Desire unspeakably to be a bird?

Even this tiny lyric shows the quality of Mr. Fawcett's poetry, and exhibits several of its special features—a delight in colour and gorgeous imagery, a sense of the decorative effect of the sounds of its syllables, no less than of their sense, and above all an idea clearly set forth amid the prodigal wealth of epithet that is never redundant and destructive of the complete effect.

In "Song and Story," 1884, and "Romance and Revery," 1886, the author's powers, shown in the first volume, found stronger utterance. But owing to successes in other departments of literature, his poetry is less widely known than its merits deserve. In fiction Mr. Fawcett has produced a long series of novels that place him in the very foremost rank of American authors, and in sharp contrast to the minutely analysed chronicles of insignificant tediously-related events, that are so evident in the school most widely read in England.

"The Buntling Ball," a burlesque in the form of an old Greek tragedy, published anonymously, took the public by surprise. Its magnificent satire, caustic wit, and ingenious workmanship caused it to be attributed to Lowell, Wendell Holmes, and other well-known names. But when another book, "The New King Arthur"—a parody of Tennyson—that was at its best an absolutely perfect example of the art of parody, was also warmly received, the secret oozed out, and it was known that the author of "Fantasy and Passion" had produced these widely dissimilar works. Of late the poetry of Mr. Fawcett has aroused much curiosity in England, and a forthcoming English edition of his poems is even now "in the press," when, doubtless, in spite of an individual standpoint that may cause some divergence of opinion among our critics, the verdict will accord him a foremost place among the poets of to-day.

The following sonnet and lyric are both from "Romance and Revery":—

TREES IN THE CITY.

When I behold how beautifully they rear
From out the engirding pavements, dull and plain,

Boughs that for genial meadow or fragrant lane

Have longed, perchance, through many a lonely year,

My sympathy wakes dubious yet sincere,

Conjecturing the incalculable pain

Of lives that yearn towards bourns whence they retain

The balm of no remedial souvenir!

But when the spirit of spring breaks cold eclipse,

I dream that every wind which fleetly slips
Through the broad city is bearing in soft-wise,

From happier branches under far free skies,
Compassionate tidings on æolian lips,
Of sweet affinities and tender kinships.

GOLD.

No spirit of air am I, not one whose birth
Was deep in mouldy darkness of mid-earth.

Yet, where my yellow raiments choose to shine,

What power is more magnificent than mine?

In hall and hut, in highway or in street,
Obedient millions grovel at my feet.

The loftiest pride to me its tribute brings;
I gain the lowly vassalage of kings!

How many a time have I made honour yield
To me its mighty and immaculate shield!

How often has virtue at my potent name
Robed her chaste majesty in scarlet shame!

How often has burning love within some breast

Frozen to treachery at my cold behest!

Yet ceaselessly my triumph has been blent
With pangs of overmastering discontent.

For there are always certain souls that hear
My stealthy whispers with indifferent ear;

Pure souls that deem my smiles' most bland excess,

For all its lavish radiance, valueless;

Rare souls, from my imperious guidance free,
Who know me for the slave that I should be;

Grand souls that from my counsel would dissent,

Though each were tempted with a continent!

Bret Harte, as well known here as in the United States, needs no word of description or praise. The only regret is that the super-excellence of his prose, and the world-wide fame of his humorous poetry, has resulted in his delightful work in a more pathetic key being almost overlooked. That one who has done what he has should cease from singing, is a fact to regret keenly. Yet, save an occasional dialect piece, in which he is an unrivalled master, one waits in vain for any new lyrics from the pen that gave us "A Greyport Legend," "Dickens in Camp," "The Spanish Idyls," and many another exquisitely-turned poem.

Rossiter Johnson, in his volume "Idler and Poet," has many good things, somewhat after the school of Præd, peculiarly local in their colour, as such work should be. The one quoted below, in spite of its wide popularity, may be new to some readers, and is a good sample of its fellows to represent the volume in this limited space:—

NINETY-NINE IN THE SHADE.

O for a lodge in a garden of cucumbers!
O for an iceberg or two at control!
O for a vale that at mid-day the dew cumbers!
O for a pleasure trip up to the pole!

O for a little one-storey thermometer
With nothing but zeroes all ranged in a row!

O for a big double-barrelled hygrometer,
To measure the moisture that rolls from my brow!

O that this cold world were twenty times colder
(That irony's red hot it seemeth to me)!
O for a turn of its dreaded cold shoulder!
O what a comfort an ague would be!

O for a grotto frost-lined and rill-riven,
Scooped in the rock under cataract vast!
O for a winter of discontent, even!
O for wet blankets judiciously cast!

O for a soda fount spouting up boldly
From every hot lamp-post against the hot sky!

O for proud maiden to look on me coldly,
Freezing my soul with a glance of her eye!

Then, O for a draught of a cup of cold pizen!
And O for a through ticket, viz Coldegrave,
To the banks of the Styx, where a thick shadow lies on

And deepens the chill of its dark-running wave.

The Rev. J. B. Kenyon, in two volumes, "Out of the Shadows" and "In Realms of Gold," has proved his right to sing, for his lyrics are instinct with song and musical in the lilt of their lines, besides being graceful in thought and refined in treatment. In place of praise, however, these two will speak for themselves:—

WHEN CLOVER BLOOMS.

When clover blooms in the meadows
And the happy south winds blow,
When under the leafy shadows
The singing waters flow—
Then come to me; as you pass
I shall hear your feet in the grass,
And my heart shall awake and leap
From its cool, dark couch of sleep,
And shall thrill again as of old,
Ere its long rest under the mould—
When clover blooms.

Deem not that I shall not waken;
I shall know, my love, it is you;
I shall feel the tall grass shaken,
I shall hear the drops of the dew
That scatter before your feet;
I shall smell the perfume sweet
Of the red rose that you wear,
As of old, in your sunny hair;
Deem not that I shall not know
It is your light feet that go
Mid clover blooms.

O love, the years have parted—
The long, long years!—our ways;
You have gone with the merry-hearted
These many and many days,
And I with that grim guest
Who loveth the silence best;
But come to me—I shall wait
For your coming, soon or late;
For soon or late, I know,
You shall come to my rest below
The clover blooms.

A CITY CRY.

Here hoarsely moan the floods of human woe,
And evermore, along the busy streets
The iron hoof of traffic loudly beats,
And lean-faced avarice shuffles to and fro;
How grudgingly the feet of mercy go
Where gaunt and grimy squalor sits and eats
Her bitter bread, and here, through foul retreats,

Death's noisome currents darkly ebb and flow.
O God, of those sweet airs which blow between

The emerald hills, let me e'er breathe;
Keep me

Far from the roaring city, in Thy green
And quiet solitudes, where I may see

The birds, the flowers, the grass, and sweetly lean

My heart upon the peace and love of Thee.

When, some ten or twelve years ago, a new poet from the Wild West was hailed (if the mixed metaphor may be allowed) as a rising star, those who read the impassioned song of "Joaquin" Miller, as he is termed (from the title of his first volume, "Joaquin et al"), predicted a great future. Yet, so far, it is singular how little more widely popular his poetry has grown. Its very faults are not those that stand in the way of recognition, and in the impetuous honesty of his daring cry against the platitudes and pruderies of conventional hypocrisy, it seemed that his words should have awakened an echo in many an English heart. But to say they have fulfilled in this one respect the expectations raised by "Songs of the Sierras" is certainly not borne out by facts; yet, on re-perusing any of his volumes, the poetry rouses the same enthusiasm to those who have once succumbed to its witchery. It is so unlike the work of any other man, at once so strong and so naive in its expression. "Songs of the Sun Lands," "Songs of Far Away Lands," "The Ship of the Desert," and "Mexican Songs" are among the most important of his published works. Of these, the longer poems, "Arizona," "With Walker in Nicaragua," "Benoni," and others, plead to be extracted, but as that is impossible, it must suffice to quote the following, picked almost at random, yet showing his peculiar genius:—

O thou To-morrow! Mystery,
O day that ever runs before.
What has thy hidden hand in store
For mine, To-morrow, and for me?
O thou To-morrow, what hast thou
In store to make me bear the Now?

O day in which we shall forget
The tangled troubles of to-day;
O day that laughs at duns, at debt!
O day of promises to pay!
O shelter from all present storm!
O day in which we shall reform!

O day of all days to reform!
Convenient day of promises!
Hold back the shadow of the storm.
Let not the mystery be less,
O bless'd To-morrow, chiefest friend,
But lead us blindfold to the end.

One poem, "Mother Egypt," exhibits such power that I particularly wish it to appear, yet one line has found objection by many who admire the poem, therefore I have but quoted it in part.

Dark-browed she broods with weary lids
Beside her sphynx and pyramids,
With low and never-lifted head;
If she be dead, respect the dead;
If she be weeping, let her weep;
If she be sleeping, let her sleep;
For lo! this woman named the stars,
She suckled
Her Moses while you reeked in wars
And prowled your woods, nude painted Thugs.

Then back, brave England, back in peace,
To Christian isles of fat increase!
Go back! else bid your high priest take Your great bronze Christs and cannons make;
Take down their cross from proud St. Paul's
And coin it into cannon balls,
You tent not far from Nazareth,
Your camp spreads where His child-feet
strayed,
If Christ had seen this work of death,
If Christ had seen these ships invade,

I think the patient Christ had said:
"Go back, brave men! Take up your dead,
Draw down your great ships to the seas,
Repass the Gates of Hercules.
Go back to wife with babe at breast,
And leave lorn Egypt to her rest."
Is Christ then dead as Egypt is?
Ah, Mother Egypt, torn in twain,
There's something grimly wrong in this,
So like some gray, sad woman slain.

* * * * *

Here again is a very pleasantly worded lyric, that has the cry of home-sickness, which seems to come from the heart of a wanderer.

Better it were to abide by the sea
Loving somebody and satisfied;
Better it were to grow babes on the knee,
To anchor you down for all your days,
Than to wander and wander in all these ways,
Land-forgotten, and love-denied.

Better sit still where born, I say,
Wed one sweet woman and love her well,
Love and be loved in the brave old way,
Drink sweet waters, and dream in a spell,
Than to sail in search of the Blessed Isles,
For aye and aye o'er the watery miles.

Better it were for the world, I say,
That you should sit still where you were born,
Be it land of sand or of oil and corn,
Than seek red poppies, and the sweet dreamland,
Than to wander the world as I to-day,
Breaking the heart into bits like clay,
And leaving it scattered on every hand.

Born in 1841, and again, if rumour is true, living far away from the busy crowd, it may be that a great poem will come from his pen. No less a subject than "Christ's Life on Earth" is said to be occupying him at present. These verses show his mood upon human questions—

Is it worth while that we jostle a brother Bearing his load on the rough road of life?

Is it worth while that we jeer at each other In blackness of heart—that we war to the knife?

God pity us all in our pitiful strife.

God pity us all as we jostle each other;
God pardon us all for the triumphs we feel

When a fellow goes down 'neath his load on the heather,
Pierced to the heart: words are keener than steel,
And mightier far for woe or for weal.

The daring imagery and unrestrained rigour that pushes poetic license to its utmost strain, and yet remains poetry, is seen in the lines from an unnamed lyric prefacing "Songs of Far-away Lands," and a slightly modified version in "Memorie and Rime," a later volume.

'Tis a land so far that you wonder whether E'en God would know it should you fall down dead;

Tis a land so far through the wilds and weather,
That the sun falls weary and flushed and red,
That the sea and the sky seem coming together—
Seem closing together as a book that is read.

* * * * *
Oh, the nude, weird West where an unnamed river
Rolls restless in bed of bright silver and gold.

John Boyle O'Reilly (1844) is a name hardly known in England, yet his volumes and their reception in America should make him sure of a welcome here, while his Irish birth and strong patriotic bias would gain special interest in these days—whether for or against his future readers' peace of mind depends upon the standpoint taken. His chief published works are "Songs from the Southern Seas," "Songs, Legends, and Ballads" (1882), "In Bohemia" (1884), "Statues in the Block" (1887).

His ballads have all the "go" and fire of the true type, while his Australian poems are among the best inspired by that colonial scenery which, since Mr. Douglas Sladen has brought it to English notice, has roused no slight attention. From Mr. O'Reilly's works two of the shortest pieces will attest the fancy of his muse and the quaint turn of his lighter mood, but they give no indication of the power of the larger poems.

DISTANCE.

The world is large, when its weary leagues
two loving hearts divide;
But the world is small when your enemy is loose on the other side.

"You gave me the key of your heart, my love,
Then why do you make me knock?"
"O, that was yesterday, saints above!
And last night—I changed the lock!"

A TRAGEDY.

A soft-breasted bird from the sea
Fell in love with the lighthouse flame,
And it wheeled round the tower on its airiest wing,

And floated and cried like a love-lorn thing;
It brooded all day and it fluttered all night,
But could win no look from the steadfast light.

For the flame had its heart afar,
Afar with the ships at sea;
It was thinking of children and waiting wives,
And darkness and danger to sailors' lives;
But the bird had its tender bosom pressed
On the glass, where at last it dashed its breast.

The light only flickered, the brighter to glow;
But the bird lay dead on the rocks below.

In "Cap and Bells," Samuel Minturn Peck (1854) has grouped poems more serious in their purpose than the title indicates, unless it be in sober earnest to show that the jester's heart is not as full of quips and cranks as his words imply. While belonging somewhat to the vers de société school, and using the old French metrical forms with easy grace, there is more genuine poetic work than the enemies of the "five o'clock tea school" are inclined publicly to allow. But of all volumes these lighter ones are most hard to represent by examples. A forest may be indicated by a bough, but how is a meadow ablaze with flowers to be judged of one dried specimen? Yet since it must be, these two are as fit as any for the purpose, because in the pages of the Century and Scribner many readers have probably already made acquaintance with others that would else have claimed first notice.

THE SINGER'S REWARD.
(A Legend)

O once there dwelt a singer, in a valley far away,
Who in the fields with loving art awoke his lute and lay.

Now though his song, nor loud nor long,
was strangely sweet to hear,
One day he said, while on his cheek there gleamed a silent tear:

"My note is low, my strain is weak, my singing all in vain,
The little guerdon I desire I cannot hope to gain.

"I do not care for lofty fame, for wealth I do not long,
I only wish my fellow-men to love me for their song."

The kindly zephyrs caught his lays, and bore them far and wide.

"Such songs were never sung before," the people rose and cried.

The great king even listened, in his palace
by the sea,
And said, "Some day we'll send for him, and honoured he shall be."

Alas! no herald ever came, the ancient legend saith,
But when he put his lute away, and laid him down in death,

The people made a great ado, and reared a column high,
In honour of the singer they had left in want to die.

BEYOND THE NIGHT.

Beyond the night no withered rose
Shall mock the later bud that blows,
Nor lily blossom e'er shall blight,
But all shall gleam more pure and white
Than starlight on the Arctic snows.
Sigh not while daylight dimmer grows,
And life a turbid river flows,
For all is sweetness—all is light,

Beyond the night.
Oh haste, sweet hour that no man knows;
Uplift us from our cumbering woes,
When joy and peace shall crown the right,

And perished hopes shall blossom bright—
To aching hearts bring sweet repose.
Beyond the night.

No apology is needed for noticing the "Songs and Satires" of James Jeffrey Roche. If the satires amuse us to the detriment of the songs that equally deserve attention, it is the author's fault. In a serious age honest laughter is of great consequence, and in face of such a witty trifle as the one quoted, we could spare many a poem of not absolutely the highest order. Perhaps the very success of one side of Mr. Roche's art is in no small degree owing to his mastery of the other; for in his fooling there are restraint and good form that charm while they amuse.

THE V-A-S-E.

From the madding crowd they stand apart—
The maidens four and the Work of Art.

And none might tell, from sight alone,
In which had culture ripest grown.

The Gotham million fair to see,
The Philadelphia pedigree,

The Boston mind of azure hue,
Or the soulful soul from Kalamazoo;

For they all loved Art in a seemly way,
With an earnest soul and a capital A.

* * * * *

Long they worshipped, but no one broke
The sacred stillness, until one spoke—

The Western one from the nameless place,
Who, blushing, said: "What a lovely vase!"

Over three faces a sad smile flew,
And they edged away from Kalamazoo.

But Gotham's haughty soul was stirred
To crush the stranger with one small word.

Deftly hiding reproof in praise,
She cries: "'Tis indeed a lovely vase!"

But brief her unworthy triumph when
The lofty one from the home of Penn,

With the consciousness of two grandpapas,
Exclaims: "It is quite a lovely vase!"

And glances round with an anxious thrill,
Awaiting the word of Beacon Hill.

But the Boston maid smiles courteouslee,
And gently murmurs: "Oh, pardon me,

I did not catch your remark, because I was so entranced with the charming vaws!"

Dies erit prægelidaSinistra quum Belodina.

In the section of "Debonair Verse," as Mr. E. C. Stedman has aptly christened it, Mr. Clinton Scollard has shown distinct power. His three volumes, "Pictures in Song," 1884, "With Reed and Lyre," 1886, and "Old and New World Lyrics," 1889, yield ample proof of a natural voice for singing and artistic insight, that having already done much and done it well, may yet do even better and greater things. He has the secret of that delicate trifling which is characteristic of this school of poetry, but it is not by any means mere trifling, rather the colloquial freedom of a scholar and thinker, who, as the taste of the day wills it, is more careful to conceal his learning than to set it forth to astonish his readers. To blame the younger school for not attempting mighty epics and voluminous tragedies is absurd, for few have time to read sustained efforts of that sort, even if the will be theirs. A little rhyme by Herrick, or lyric by one of our modern men, will outlast the monumental triumphs of their contemporaries who keep their solemn reputation for the most part by reason of the blind ignorance concerning the things they really wrote.

TO A CHINESE IDOL.

Once you ruled, a god divine,
In a sacred shady shrine,
Near a river dark as wine,

'Mid the trees;
And to you the mandarins,
With their smooth unshaven chins,
Prayed absolution from their sins
On their knees.

Tiny-footed Chinese maids,
With their hair in raven braids,
Sought you in your quiet shades
'Neath the boughs;

Haply for a thousand years
You beheld their smiles and tears,
Listened to their hopes and fears,
And their vows.

Now above her escritoire,
In my lady's pink boudoir,
Ever dumbly pining for Lost repose;
You sit stolid day by day,
With your cheeks so thin and gray,
Stormy eyes and retroussé
Little nose.

Where the sunlight glinteth o'er
 Persian rug and polished floor,
 You will frown for evermore,
 Grim as hate;
 A divinity cast down,
 Having neither shrine nor crown,
 Once a god, but now a brown Paper-weight!

SUMMER NOON.

The air is full of soothing sounds. The bee
 Within the waxen lily's honeyed cells
 In monotone of mellow measure tells
 His yet unsated joyance, drowsily
 The swallows spill their liquid melody
 As down the sky they drop, and faintly swells
 The tremulous tinkle of the far sheep bells,
 While wind-harps sigh in every crown'd tree.
 Beneath the beechen shade the reapers lie,
 Upon their lips a merry harvest tune;
 Knee-deep within a neighbouring stream,
 the kine
 Stand blinking idly in the clear sunshine;
 And like a dream of olden Arcady Seems the sweet languor of the summer noon.

But these two altogether fail to represent the charm of many facets in the brilliant crystals of Mr. Scollard's work. In the "blithe ballade" he has scored notable success, and throughout the whole range of the school in which he has chosen to abide, he is perhaps the most hopeful of its newest comers.

The collected poems of Edward Rowland Sill speak with all the pathos of a posthumous volume. Born in 1843, the rare promise of his earlier verse is only fulfilled by this scanty booklet (1887). Yet among its pages are real poems. Read in the light of its publication, "Service" has a personal note in it that deepens the pathetic expression of the idea it embodies.

SERVICE.

Fret not that the day is gone,
 And thy task is still undone.
 'Twas not thine, it seems, at all;
 Near to thee it chanced to fall,
 Close enough to stir thy brain,
 And to vex thy heart in vain.
 Somewhere, in a nook forlorn,
 Yesterday a babe was born,
 He shall do thy waiting task;
 All thy questions he shall ask,
 And the answers will be given,
 Whispered lightly out of heaven.

His shall be no stumbling feet,
 Fading when they should be fleet;
 He shall hold no broken clue;
 Friends shall unto him be true;
 Men shall love him; falsehood's aim
 Shall not shatter his good name;
 Day shall nerve his arm with light,
 Slumber soothe him all the night;
 Summer's peace and winter's storm
 Help him all his will perform;
 'Tis enough of joy for thee
 His high service to foresee.

THE BOOK OF HOURS.

As one who reads a tale writ in a tongue
 He only partly knows, runs over it
 And follows but the story, losing wit
 And charm, and half the subtle links among
 The haps and harms that the book's folk beset,
 So do we with our life. Night comes,
 and morn;
 I know that one has died and one is born;
 That this by love and that by hate is met,
 But all the grace and glory of it fail
 To touch me, and the meanings they enfold
 The Spirit of the World hath told the tale,
 And tells it, and 'tis very wise and old.
 But o'er the page there is a mist and veil—
 I do not know the tongue in which 'tis told.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER VI.
A FAMILY RENT ASUNDER.

IT was an immense relief to Kitty, in addition to the pleasure of getting speech with her brother, which was becoming a rarer and rarer treat, to see Jack walk in with his father, a couple of hours after the fog end of the riot, which she and Mrs. Judy, and many more besides them, had seen from their windows.

"Come here and tell us what all the stir has been about, Jack," cried the girl, quite cheerfully. The doubt and fear were gone from her voice. She spoke as if she had not been deeply moved by the scene that had passed before her, which, young as she was, she would never altogether forget; on many a day to come the vision of the boyish face working with excitement, the hasty hand flung up to sweep back the streaming hair, and of Anthony Walton's steady tramp and heavy frown, was present to her in its first freshness; and now, instinctively for a reason she could not have explained to herself, she referred to what she had witnessed as if it had been an affair of no moment, a piece of mere make-believe, like an act in one of the students' plays. "What a fright you are!" she went on quickly. "How will you answer to Mrs. Judy for all the mending you will cost her?" Then, as she caught a nearer glimpse of her brother's face, she gave a little sharp cry and dropped her careless tone. "Oh, dear heart, thou art hurt!" for there was an ugly bruise on John Dacre's cheek, terminating in a slight cut, which ran up among his fair hair, and had dyed and matted it with the blood which had oozed from the wound. "Shall I get water or vinegar? Me and Mrs. Judy will bathe it, and it may not want a plaster or a bandage."

"Be silent, Kitty! let the young scoundrel alone," cried Dr. Dacre, in a voice which was not the quiet scholar's voice, so full was it of bitter anger, keen disappointment, and stern determination.

John Dacre said not a word; Kitty shrank back as if she had received a blow. Mrs. Judy, who had come in at Kitty's cry to see if anything was wanted, turned hastily to the door.

"Stay where you are, Judith Pettit," her master commanded her roughly, using the full name, which he had not given her since the day she entered his service a score of years before. "It may be as well that there is another witness to this business. I have brought here to my college—his home, to my misfortune—this young man who calleth himself my son, to put to him one or two questions of which you will hear the answers, before I have done with him for ever."

Both Kitty and Mrs. Judy were struck dumb with consternation. Jack did not utter one protesting syllable, but neither did he droop or quail in any hang-dog fashion. In fact, he held up his head and looked at the speaker, in the white heat of his fury, with a mixture of reproach and defiance in his pale, blood-stained face.

"John Dacre, will you confess or deny that you did, as my own miserable eyes can testify, in the light of the sun this very midday, in Oxford, conspire with a handful of deluded and debauched students to disgrace thyself and thy family, thy college, thy class in life, by appearing as a ringleader among the town miscreants who dispute the authority of the University and the King?"

"I was in the row this morning, father, as you say you know; why need you ask me any question thereupon?" answered Jack, half indignantly, half sullenly. "Moreover, I will tell thee something for thy better understanding if not for thy satisfaction," he went on, looking his father straight in the face, with a clear conviction and a passionate resolution in his flashing eyes, which were not unlike his father's, except that they had the undimmed flash of young eyes, quick to take umbrage as to inflict punishment, which, when they have once begun, cannot easily leave off in any course. "It was our side that began the riot, in order to put an end to a piece of the basest extortion and tyranny, where an honest man gave goods, ay, and lent money, to a privileged member of Christ Church, and when the respectable merchant sought but his own, he was reviled and set upon by the college servants until he was beaten within an inch of his life."

"Let him appeal to the proctors, or carry his case to the University Courts, or, better still, bear his losses in silence for the credit of his calling and his town. It was no business of thine. Thou art no redresser of wrongs."

"Sir, life would be little worth," said John Dacre, with the sternness of a young Lycurgus, "if a man were not at liberty—nay, called upon by all that is sacred—to denounce and bring to justice every wrongdoer he came across."

"A man!" echoed his father, scornfully. "Heyday, we are ill off for men when boys usurp their elders' functions, and when redressing wrongs means preserving the fruits of his roguery to every scurvy tradesman."

"But, father, this is not like you!" cried out Jack. "What has come over thee? Thou wert wont to insist on justice, and to enjoin on us to be honourable in all our dealings."

"But, son, that was not to take it upon you to judge your neighbours, and to interfere in their concerns, making bad worse, till the small hurts which would have been remedied in the course of nature, become envenomed sores which no man can heal."

Dr. Peter was calmer now. The flush which had mounted to his bald head was paling, his eyes were no longer blazing in their sockets.

Kitty, who had never before beheld such a storm of household dissension, who had not dared to raise her voice, began to trust and pray that the violence of the strife was abating, and that peace would be restored. She failed to recognise that every line of her father's face was setting, not relaxing, and that his voice was taking a tone of dogged implacability, in the strong resentment of a man who is slow to be roused and still slower to be appeased.

"You have gone and done it, John Dacre. You have committed the unpardonable sin of these times which I cannot and ought not to forgive. Art aware of the trouble thy gracious sovereign is in? Of the straits of thy University, thy country? that thou shouldst choose this season of all others to go and quarrel with thy fellows, in order to bring to light and set thy foot on some peddling hardship—some paltry fellow's paltrier grievance. Prithee, is the loss of a barrel of herrings, or a keg of hollands—nay, or even a few yards of tiffany, or a piece of brocade, to disturb the peace of a town and risk the quiet of a country? Perish the goods and the pursy trader sooner, say I. I tell thee it is such as thou who fomenteth discontent, and giveth the silly people an excuse for listening to lying knaves their betrayers."

"The people have far better excuse than any that I can afford them, and infinitely wiser leaders," said Jack, half eagerly, half humbly. "If you have read the reports of the proceedings in the last three Parliaments, if you have listened to such mouthpieces of the nation as Pym, Hampden—"

"Stop!" Dr. Dacre interrupted his son imperiously. "I do not desire to have Parliament brought into the argument. It hath been false to the King's prerogative. It is leading on the Commons to certain destruction which neither Parliament nor Commons will be able to undo, until they return to more loyal and moderate ways; that may not be either in your day or mine. But it is easy to guess with whom you have been keeping company. It is with shame and pain I recall that my shortsightedness and weakness countenanced such intercourse, though I had no ground then to believe, what I have heard of thy cousin Anthony Walton this day, that he has long held dangerous opinions, and consorted with such marked men as Wither and Prynne. I have been told that he hath even held intercourse with such an arch inflamer of the hankers after republics as the Cambridge man and London schoolmaster, Milton. He came down to his grandfather's quarters of Shotover, and hath taken a wife out of a worthy family who might have known better, the Powells of Forest Hill. However, they are punished for bestowing one of their daughters on a rank rebel, for I heard t'other day she soon tired of her bargain, and hath been back on their hands for six months and more."

"Sir," said Jack, with youthful ire and austerity commingled, "I care not if Master John Milton hath troubles in his family or no. Those are still less my business than are the public matters at which you have cavilled. I knew not till now that you could be a receiver and retailer of scandalous tittle-tattle. What I maintain from my personal knowledge is that a more honourable gentleman, or a truer patriot than your nephew and my cousin, Anthony Walton, does not exist in this England, which needs such men as he sorely. He never hath consorted with men who were not honest patriots according to their lights, though these may vary, and still more men's opinion of them may differ."

"It is a pity that your constancy to your friend is not matched by your fidelity to your King and to your nursing mother, this great and glorious University. Pity 'tis that it is not checked by your duty to your father, nay, to the memory of thine own mother, boy, who would not rest in her grave if she knew how you are prepared to go against me, against holy church—all that she held dear."

Dr. Dacre's voice had fallen and broken in the last appeal. He flung his long lean arms across the table at which he had taken a chair, and hid his face on them.

Jack stood opposite him, looking haggard and woe-begone, but he would not give up the principles which, young as he was, were already intertwined with his heart-strings, and formed part of his faith, not merely in man but in God.

"Oh, father, don't be so hard on Jack! Oh, Jackie, say you're sorry!" implored Kitty, not knowing what to say, not understanding, though her cousin Prissy had tried to prepare her, a tithe of what it all meant.

Mrs. Judy wrung her hands. "Master Jackie," she cried, "you were always high-headed and hot and fly-away; but you were never so long, not even to your old nurse. How can you find it in your heart to vex the Doctor so? He as is your father, to whom thou owest the utmost duty, which should come before all others in thy reckoning. Make amends, Master Jackie, make amends while it do be yet time."

"How can you?" cried John Dacre, a little wildly and fiercely, for he was hard pressed. "Is it a fact that you women, in your ignorance and innocence, have been men's most cruel temptresses from the days of Coriolanus downwards? Good wot there is a text which, however you good folks may read it, seems to me to run thus: 'Whosoever loveth father and mother' (ay, or any member of his kin) 'more than me, is not worthy of me.' What! Kitty, Mrs. Judy, wouldst have me turn traitor, to myself, to God, to the truth as far as I can see it? But this I will say for the case of my own mind, whether you, sir, will believe it or not," turning to his father, who had risen to his feet, and stood like stone, "my cousin Anthony had very little to do with this morning's strife. He went into it unwillingly, and I do believe as much on my account as for any other reason. He sought to make and keep peace to the last. He was of your mind so far, that the case should be left at its present stage to the legal authorities, and that if justice failed, the failure would be on their heads, while it would be time enough then to resort to weightier arguments. But when he saw his friends were bent on instant action, he could not hold aloof from them, and leave them to pay the penalty."

"I have had enough of Anthony Walton," said Dr. Dacre, in heavy, unsubdued displeasure; "I have done with him, and with you too, John Dacre, after I also have said another word which methinks it is right you should hear. I am aware there are plenty of trimmers in Oxford and all over the country, college men and others, who are minded by cunning management to make the best of two powers to defer now to the King and now to the Parliament, while committing themselves to neither. Moderate men, they call themselves; moderate, quotha? Moderate enough where honour and service are concerned; immoderate where their own ends and interests are in question. There is something worse than this. There are gentlemen by birth—nobles, squires, and college heads—who have deliberately planned that while they shall take one side in the dispute, they will wink at their sons, or so many members of their houses, ranging themselves on the other, so that when the crash comes they and their worldly estates or the prosperity of their colleges may go scatheless. I would have you know that I am not such a mean cur. I owe more to my gracious King and to my University and College, which have honoured me by enrolling me as one of their unworthy members, and by acknowledging my poor labours. I will not, no, I will not bear the reproach of thus truckling to their enemies, in order to escape loss when the day of reckoning arrives. John Dacre, from this day henceforth thou art no son of mine. I bid thee quit my rooms, and forbid thee to cross the threshold again."

There was a half-suppressed cry from the girl and the woman, but John Dacre simply pulled himself together and took a step towards the door. Then he turned back with one vehement outburst.

"Father, I have done nought to deserve being cast off. A man's conscience and judgment are his own, else were he but the mockery of a man. You have taunted me with being a boy and not a man, yet I want scarce three years of my majority, and these are days which make men of boys; still, I will go in obedience to your command; but you will not send me away without bidding me farewell, or giving me your blessing, or suffering me to take leave of my sister? You spake of my mother a minute ago. Alack! she died almost before I had the happiness to know her, but you wis what her heart would have said for her children. Do not cut off my mother's son from you in this fashion."

Dr. Dacre turned his back for all his answer, and Jack, who dared not face more of Kitty's simple, piteous entreaties, and the urgent remonstrances of the woman who had brought him up, put them both from him with a shaking yet unrelenting hand. He loosed the arms which Kitty, darting towards him, had thrown round his neck, and pulled the corner of his gown quietly but forcibly from Mrs. Judy's grip. He quitted hastily, with unsteady step, his father's rooms, his old home of Oriel, leaving a grievous blank where his place had been in the little circle, and a dark shadow over the blank for many a day.

(To be continued.)

WORK.

A. E. MORRIS (Canada).—The address of the Donegal Industrial Fund is Wigmore Street, W. (Mrs. Ernest Hart.)

R. A. (Scarborough).—We think you mean a "Pantagraph." They are sold at toy and stationer's shops, we think.

MRS. K. (Edinburgh).—You will find an article on "Screens and How to Make Them" at page 224, vol. iii. An ordinary good paste, made of flour, and boiled, is the appliance best for putting on scraps. A little alum will help it to keep good while you are using it.

MARGHERITA.—So far as we know there is no sale for macramé lace, and unless privately sold, no fancy work seems to be in demand. 2. There is an excellent article on "Home-made Jam" at page 526, vol. iv.

YOUNG MAEON.—A bath blanket is used to put under the bath on the bedroom floor to protect the carpet, and to afford a comfortable ground for the bather to rest his or her feet upon. During the day it is folded up and placed on the bath, not draped over it; if it need drying, it should be dried, of course. 2. For a simple way to frost glass, see answer elsewhere.

EDUCATIONAL.

FLO.—"Vathek," written by William Beckford, was composed at twenty-two years of age, in French, and took three days and two nights of hard labour to write. The author never took off his clothes the whole time. It was printed in 1787. It is not known by whom the English translation, which appeared immediately, was made. It is considered a remarkable book, from its beauty of description and power of imagination. The Hall of Eblis is taken from the old hall at Fonthill Abbey, where Beckford's father lived, and the attendants are the pictures of the domestics at old Fonthill. 2. Astaroth, or Astarte, the Phœnician moon-goddess, was represented as Queen of Heaven, Jer. vii. 18, with the crescent horns of the moon. The tradition may have been continued from this, as so many of our ideas have come from extreme antiquity.

CHUCK SOLITUDE.—The only method of arriving at a conclusion is to compare the dates of the two books, and choose the last authority on the subject. The latest manual should be up to date in any science.

BEAUTIES OF NATURE.—The question would be one of shelter from the weather. The tree was unsheltered, while the hedge was in a measure so; perhaps, also, in a warm aspect.

E. L.—We are glad to read your letter. In the "Dress" article we are always endeavouring to persuade our girls to discourage such cruelty to God's feathered creatures.

MATER.—The Post Office and Telegraph are both comprised in the Civil Service, and you could not have a better "Guide to Female Employment" in both than Cassell's (price one shilling). We do not think the question of health, which you mention, would make a difference.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ZILLAH.—There are many ways of giving (outdoor) assistance to "Christian work." Perhaps a book designed for very young people would serve to give you some useful suggestions, viz., "Restful Work" (Griffith and Farran, St. Paul's Churchyard), might fully meet your special difficulty. 2. If you wish to keep a dog, a French poodle is the most intelligent, and the least liable to that terrible disease, hydrophobia, which is on the increase. If ever your dog appear to be ailing, tie him up, and keep out of his reach till you know what is the matter by consulting a veterinary surgeon.

MAB.—The coin is one of the copper farthings, and the only regal money coined in Ireland in the reign of Charles I. The date is probably 1625; the value is from sixpence to a shilling.

SUNNY.—It is so easy to be a critic, is it not?

CLIPHOLME is thanked for her kind thought, and the donation which accompanied her letter. She must take courage, and cultivate a spirit of cheerfulness, and of constantly looking at the best side of things. Take each duty as it comes, and leave to-morrow's duties and cares alone. We should all of us be happier if we made this the rule of our lives. Bath and Buxton are both good places for chronic rheumatism. We should advise you to take a doctor's opinion on the question, which would be the best for your mother.

E. L. I.—We never read anything so perfectly miserable as your poem. We hope it does not reflect your own state of mind. There is some merit in it, and it will give you an outlet, if you persevere, for your melancholy thoughts.

BETA.—We think that you should be guided by your husband in the matter; or if he have no opinion, and do not mind, go to church as you have always done.

JOYCE.—There is a little book by the late Rev. J. G. Wood, "Common Objects of the Country," that we think would suit you; also a cheap little book, "Flowers of the Field," by the Rev. C. A. Johns. 2. The word "acolyte" is from a Greek word, meaning "following," or "attending." In astronomy it means an attendant or companion star; in ecclesiastical history it means an inferior attendant on the priests and deacons, whose duty would be to light the candles, etc.

WILD ROSE.—Weddings may be as simple as you please. What will answer for afternoon tea will do for a wedding—cake, fruit, tea, coffee, lemonade, ices, fruit, jelly, etc. The bride inserts the knife into the cake, and the head bridesmaid cuts it up, and the groomsmen helps her. The easiest way is to lay the dining-room table, putting the cake in the centre, before which the bride and bridegroom should sit.

CUCKOO.—The robes of the Druids were made of either linen or wool. 2. One of the primitive ways of producing fire was to have a grooved piece of wood and a pointed stick, and rub the latter up and down in the groove.

KATIE R.—We should imagine that your diet must be a wrong one, if your teeth be so bad at sixteen. Go to a good dentist.

FLOWER SHOW.—Judging from our own experience, we should think it very needful to be taught how to make up bouquets. At the "Flower Girls' Mission," 12, Clerkenwell Close, E.C., you might perhaps get a little instruction.

ANNIE S.—Perhaps a little benzine or ammonia might remove the marks, but we should advise you to try the effect on a bit of silk first, to see whether they produce a mark.

A BEGINNER, "G. O. P."—See the article on Gymnastics in 516, vol. v., "Physical Education of Girls."

BABBY.—Hattiwell gives "Duffer" as a peddler or hawker selling trashy, worthless things. In the "Oxford Journal," May 25th, 1765, there is an account of the apprehension of "an East India duffer," or fellow who pretends to sell to ignorant people great bargains of smuggled goods. In this last sentence perhaps the explanation of our present-day meaning of the term is given.

THE BISKY BAT.—We regret that we cannot help you as to the means of obtaining copying to do. We know of no way except by private interest or by continual advertisement.

ANTI-VENUS.—We know of no way to dress such short hair as you describe, save by tying it with a ribbon at the nape of the neck. If it will plait together, and the ends be long enough to turn up, it will be firmer. 2. Very hot water used every now and then to the face is said to be needful to keep the pores open and the skin clean.

DULCE CHARTERIS.—There seem to be numbers of charities deserving of help which you might assist by needlework or visits. Send for a copy of "Our Work," price 2d., published at 5 and 6, Paternoster Row, E.C. It is full of knitting societies, missions at the docks for giving food to the hungry, and all kinds of suggestions and ways of helping and working.

WYCH HAZEL shows much tenderness in her composition, but little original thought.

A LOVER OF READING's verses lack originality.

JACK.—Jersey bodices seem to be sold in the shops at all prices, colours, and shapes, and you would do well to look for yourself. In the monthly "Dress" article we endeavour to give with the greatest fidelity the clothes actually worn, or likely to be worn; generally sketches are made from the garment.

OUR PLANS.

By A. M. HARLEY, Author of "Wrapped in the Robes of Mercy," "Fairview Rest," etc.

CHAPTER II.

"He fixed thee and this dance Of plastic circumstance."

—Robert Browning.

CORRESPONDENCE was vigorously maintained between the two friends, and a few extracts from some of their letters as time went on will show how far their early plans for the future were adhered to, how far they seemed likely to be carried out. We begin with gleanings from Muriel's confidences.

"Behold me, a domesticated daughter and sage sister, stocking mending, pastry making, room dusting, washing and dressing little Bessie, and, prophetic work! plastering up her dolly's broken head! As for life in general, it goes on much as before. Father and mother as kind as ever, but not, I consider, giving me very much encouragement in the matter in which I am most interested. However, as you know, I came off A 1 in the ambulance class. So far so good. I go very often to the Children's Hospital, and am on intimate terms with many of the little invalids. Poor little mites! so sad to see them suffer, yet on the whole they are very happy. The nurses are so kind to them. How I long to be one!"

A few mails later took the following news to Ruth.

"Mother has quite unexpectedly come into a pretty good legacy. I'm perfectly ashamed to own that a momentary feeling of disappointment came over me when I heard her say: 'Thank God, George, our girls will be provided for!' My heart sunk to the bottom of my shoes! I was so afraid there might be some hindrance to the fulfilment of my desires. But the next day father told me that, believing me to be really in earnest, he and mother would not feel it right to put any obstacle in my way. Now I shall certainly only go in for unpaid nursing amongst the poor. You know father's opinion is mine. He says that doing the work that another, equally capable of doing, is in sore need of, even though your motive may be the commendable one of wishing to be able to give more money away in charity, may not always be acting so much in the spirit of the Christian law, 'Do as you would be done by' as denying yourself the pleasure of giving might be. Then he spoke so seriously to me, hoping that the love of Christ would be the chief motive with me, that it made me more than ever feel the sacredness of the calling. Oh, Ruthie dear, I do pray I may be made in some measure worthy of it!"

"I am progressing. Father has introduced me to two or three very poor patients, from whom he takes no fee, and I go for an hour or two and tidy them up, and make little things for them, and try to comfort and cheer them. I so enjoy it. Eighteen months yet before I can get into harness! Heigho! for one-and-twenty!

"I have just been having a talk with mother. I think I am beginning to be something like you, Ruth, always questioning myself and wanting to know the root of things. I have been asking myself whether, if all idea of heroism were banished from the work of nursing, I should be so anxious for it. Mother has comforted me. She says we must not put off beginning to do a right thing because we cannot hope our motive is pure as it should be, or we should never make a start. 'Pray,' she said, 'to be made more and more willing to do just exactly what God would have you do; and should He see there is a danger of your being tempted to an undue estimation of self in your chosen work. He will either humble you in it or give you other work, with lesser temptation in it for you.' I suppose I looked rather downcast then, for she gave me one of her loving little pats on my cheek and kissed me, and said, 'I'm not afraid you will grow proud, my child; you will see such lives of heroism amongst some of the poor, that any self-denial you may practise will seem small in comparison.' That is just like mother; she always knows the right thing to say to comfort and help me, without smoothing and glossing over my perplexity."

Ruth's letters gave like indication of her steadfastness of purpose, although her present home had proved as delightful as she had anticipated. Glowing accounts were given of rambles and excursions in the neighbourhood, and of many an interesting practical lesson in natural science, but Girton was still looked forward to as a stepping-stone to a successful career.

"As for me, I'm going on steadily, and so is Time. It seems impossible that we can have been here nearly four years. In six months I hope to be on my way to you—and Girton."

"How I wish you could pop in and have a gossip! You would find Con and me in one of the class-rooms, which is to-day spruced up with a square of carpet, for the German professor has been holding a class for ladies! He has had permission to use this room once a week for this purpose. The lady pupils have just taken their departure, and Con and I have elected to pass a quiet hour here all to ourselves. She has gone with 'Alice' to 'Wonderland,' and, I—well you know what I'm doing. But you don't know what I was doing a few minutes ago! Had you peeped in then you would have seen your friend with a huge note-book before her, on the first page of which appears, in fair characters, 'Random Notes of a Girl's Life in Tasmania.' Now, if your eyebrows have not lost their pliability they have 'gone up' with a note-of-exclamation expression. Don't mistake, Muriel, my beloved—this is only for very private circulation; in fact, for your clear, grey eyes alone. I suddenly came to the resolve that I would look up my diaries, and odds and ends of note-books and scraps, to get them ship-shape to take home, and they looked such a confused heap that I determined to copy them out neatly. Now you know all about it. I'm afraid you will think I have given up all idea of the professorship since my style is so flighty. Not so, I am as sober, or more so, than ever over my lessons, and I have been going in vigorously for some of the 'ologies,' and botany! But, Muriel, I'm far too short to look majestic and dignified! N'importe—the mind's the standard of the man!—and—of the professor—of either sex, so we'll presume!"

Not very long after the receipt of that merry letter, a hurried note was sent, saying that in consequence of news received, Mr. Stacey would be obliged to go to England on a business matter. He had, therefore, made arrangements for the second master to take his duties, and would be leaving with as little delay as possible, bringing Ruth with him.

"Ah," said Dr. Egerton, when Muriel read with glee that Ruth was coming sooner than had been expected, "I fear it is hardly a cause for rejoicing."

Muriel looked up inquiringly.

"Is it as bad as you feared, George?" asked Mrs. Egerton.

"At present I do not know that the whole will be lost, but if not, only a very small amount will be saved, and in case of Mr. Stacey's death, I am afraid there is but little else for his wife and family."

"Father, what does it all mean?" cried Muriel, anxiously.

"An investment made by Mr. Stacey some few years ago has turned out a failure. I told him I did not think it wise to risk so much as he did, but he is of a very sanguine temperament."

"Still, he is in a good position now, and comparatively a young man," Mrs. Egerton said. "We must not magnify the trouble."

"No," replied her husband, but he looked troubled, for he knew more than others the constitutional delicacy of his friend, and he dreaded the effects of the shock he would receive on landing. That landing was never effected, for before the conversation just narrated took place Mr. Stacey was laid in his grave. A cold taken and, in the hurried preparations for sailing, too little heeded, resulted in death after ten days' illness. Thus the journey so joyfully anticipated by Ruth was made under sadly different circumstances.

About the same time that it was originally arranged for her to leave, she, with her widowed mother and orphaned brothers and sister, bade adieu to Tasmania and started on her voyage home.

The worst fears were realised with regard to the speculation made by Mr. Stacey. Happily he had insured his life, and this provided a small income, upon which, with strictest economy, it would be possible to live without any real distress.

During the few days spent in town, before proceeding to pay one or two visits to relatives, the friends were constantly together, and it was apparent to the doctor and his wife that a change had passed over Ruth. Her decision of character and strength of will were as evident as formerly, but softened by a gentleness and a consideration for others that had been rather lacking.

"Is it then perfectly necessary to give up Girton?" Muriel asked one morning, as the girls sat together having one of their old talks.

"Perfectly!" was the reply; "for not only must no more money be spent about me, but I must try, directly we get settled down, to earn my living, or something towards it."

"You poor old darling!" said Muriel, taking Ruth's hand in hers.

"You must not pity me, Muriel." Ruth strove to keep back the ready tears. "Listen to our plans. You know we mean to take a house in Rochdale. Rent is cheap there. The boys can go to the grammar school, where education is good and inexpensive. They are quite young yet—Hugh only just fourteen and Charlie not quite twelve. Mother and I can manage to teach Connie, and I hope to get some daily engagement."

"You are a brave, unselfish girl."

"No, no, Muriel, you don't know the battle I have had to give up my own will; but everything has looked so different since father's death. A few hours before he died he begged me so earnestly to be all the help I could be to mother, and he said he thought there might be some special work for me to do for the boys. Then he prayed that I might be willing both to see and to follow God's leading." Poor Ruth broke down for a time, but, presently checking her tears, "At first," she continued, "I was so overwhelmed with grief at losing father, I thought nothing of the loss of the money; but on the voyage home, as I lay at night in my berth, I seemed to go through it all again, and to understand more of his meaning. And now, I believe, I can see at any rate the next step, and I'm trying to take it willingly and cheerfully. But, oh, Muriel, you must keep on praying that I may not falter."

SLOYD! I daresay a great many of our readers will wonder what this peculiar word means. Well, I will tell you something about it. Sloyd is the Anglicised version of the Scandinavian word "Slöjd," which in its original form means "cunning," "clever," "handy"; it has, however, another use, and is applied in Sweden to a system of manual instruction given in Swedish schools, where different kinds of handwork are employed for educational purposes. An association is now at work to introduce this system into our schools, high and low alike. The system originated in Sweden, and has now been adopted in various European countries in different forms. It aims at making children handy, and giving them a liking and respect for manual work; at developing activity; at encouraging attention, industry, and perseverance; at training the eye and the sense of form; at fostering cleanliness, neatness, and accuracy. In Sweden the children begin their sloyd at nine or ten years of age, learning on a carefully graduated system the use of carpenters' tools. The first article which learners have to make is a little pointer, using merely a knife and glass paper; from such articles they proceed to more difficult ones; making rulers, inkstands, brackets, and other useful and ornamental articles.

Among the conditions which have to be fulfilled to carry out successfully the system, are:—(1) The work must be useful; (2) it must be executed without help; (3) it must be real work, not play; (4) the articles made should be of varied character; (5) the work should be of such a nature that it can be finished with exactness; (6) it should be in harmony with the worker's powers and physical strength; (7) it should demand thoughtfulness, and thus be more than purely mechanical work; and (8) many tools and manipulations should be employed. The great charm of the system lies in the fact that it educates morally, physically, and mentally.

It is not, as many people run away with the idea, merely wood-carving or carpentering, but it is the application of different kinds of handwork for educational purposes. There are several differences between wood-sloyd and ordinary carpentering. For instance, the division of labour employed in carpentering is not allowed in sloyd, where each article is begun, carried out, and completed by the same pupil; the tools used are different—the knife, the most important tool of all in sloyd, is little used in ordinary carpentering; again, the objects made are usually of a different character, and are smaller than those made in the trade; and lastly, the important difference of all lies in the object of sloyd, which is not to turn out young carpenters, but to develop girls' and boys' faculties, and especially to give general dexterity, which is valuable to one and all of us.

Sloyd is essentially a form of work which calls forth every variety of movement, brings all the muscles into play, and exercises both sides of the body. Now, to girls this is specially useful, particularly those in our higher schools, where, as a rule, there is not the variety and exercise to develop properly the sum-total of their faculties. The system is so arranged that the left hand and arm can be used as well as the right in sawing, planing, etc.

Although the exercise of the mental faculties is demanded, it is a very different exercise from that required for ordinary schoolwork; it cultivates, so to speak, the practical side of the intelligence, leading people to put two and two together, and to exercise forethought. Looked at from a moral point of view, it is found that sloyd implants respect and love for work in general, including the rougher kinds of bodily labour. It implants in people a sense of satisfaction in honest work, begun, carried on, and completed by fair means, and by their own efforts. It lightens and strengthens the bond between home and school. Everything which is made is for home use, and among the lower classes this actual use of things made by the children, in addition to the wholesome pride and pleasure they call forth, do much to reconciling the parents to allowing their children to remain longer at school.

Truancy has almost died out in Sweden since the introduction of sloyd, and we can only hope when once its meaning has been rightly grasped in our own country, that it will have the same effect here. It may not be thought at first sight that it is such a difficult matter to introduce the system into our own country; but, first of all, teachers have to be trained, and, secondly, the series of models used in Sweden, admirable though they may be for that country, do not in every particular suit our country.

It requires considerable thought and care to replace certain models by others, answering the same purpose with regard to sequence and processes. We have been particularly fortunate in gaining the gifted teacher and sloydist, Miss Nyström, directress of the Nâas Sloyd Seminary for teachers, near Gothenburg, to initiate us into this system of tried value. If it meets with the success it deserves, it will be to Sweden again we must turn for gratitude and thanks in aiding us in another progressive step in this century.

Captain Nordensköld, who in the little Vega first made the North-East passage, was a Swede; Pater Henrill-Ling, who has given to the world the most scientific and comprehensive system of gymnastics, was likewise a Swede; and now it is from Sweden that has evolved hand-education, which promises to supply the deficiency which our educational system at present lacks.

Institutions are being started all over England now to train teachers—that is to say, in all the great provincial centres. In the winter vacation a four weeks' course is given; when six hours a day is given to the practical work, training is only able to be given in the holidays, as it requires several hours' work a day to study and become acquainted with the system. Invitations have been received from the United States, and even Natal, for teachers to go out to those parts, so that, ere long, the word sloyd is likely to become as familiar to us in the curriculum of schools as arithmetic or geography. It will probably be taken up in Abyssinia, through the instrumentality of the Swedish missionaries, and even far distant Japan is showing an interest in the subject.

The Kindergarten system for the very young is the precursor of sloyd, for that responds to the child's need of activity and production, brightens its school-life, and harmoniously develops the nature of the child. As soon, however, as a child is considered too old to continue the Kindergarten training, the skilful co-ordination of the faculties of touch and sight is left for the most part to chance, and the child's disposition. It is here, however, that sloyd will step in. That there is a necessity for supplying this want in our educational system no thoughtful reader will deny, for it is very desirable, in face of an ever-increasing population, that all classes, from the highest to the lowest, should be taught to use their hands as well as their heads, so that each man or woman may be placed in a position of independence, and be capable of earning a honest livelihood. Anyone who has gone through the sloyd training will find him or herself full of resources, and can with comparative ease turn to new work. We must not forget the fact that all skilled work, however humble it may appear, is brain work too. In addition to its moral and social value, sloyd is now recognised as the basis of technical education.

We hope our readers will have gathered some idea of this much-needed innovation in our educational training, and that many will be stimulated to making themselves acquainted with such an important and interesting new feature. Hitherto those who would like to receive a sloyd training have had to travel to the seminary at Nâas, on the beautiful shores of lake Savelängen; and after going through the course there, have had to face the difficulty of applying the system to British tastes and customs. Now there is no such journey needed, and the knowledge obtained is such as can be straight away imparted to pupils.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK DRESSES GAME.

Faisan Roti—

Lard the breast of a pheasant, roast it before a moderate fire for forty-five or fifty minutes, baste it well; when done sprinkle with salt, and serve with gravy and cut lemon.

Faisan aux Choux (pheasant with cabbage).—Take a cabbage that has been cut in quarters and prepared for cooking, throw it into boiling water and partly cook it; cover the bottom of a stewpan with slices of bacon, add some pieces of veal, a saveloy, a carrot, an onion cut in slices, pepper and salt; place the pheasant on these, let it cook for ten minutes, then add a little broth; when the bird is half done drain the cabbage and press all the moisture from it, put it in the stewpan with the pheasant, and finish cooking together over a very moderate fire. When done cut the cabbage small, make a border of it with the bacon and saveloy cut in pieces and arranged on it, place the pheasant in the middle, and serve with a tureen of highly-seasoned gravy.

Salmis de Faisan (salmis of pheasant).—Three parts roast a pheasant, then cut off the legs and wings, divide each in two, cut the remainder of the meat off the carcass in slices. Put a glass of white wine in a stewpan with some chopped shalots, pepper, salt, grated nutmeg, and a little stock, add the pieces of pheasant, simmer until the gravy is a little reduced and the pieces of bird are done enough, then add two tablespoonfuls of good olive oil; have ready the liver of the pheasant, cooked and pounded, add it to the gravy. Serve the salmis with fried sippets round.

Faisan à l'Angoumoise.—Lard a pheasant with truffles instead of bacon. Put some more truffles (or the remains from larding) in butter, with pepper and salt; cook them a few minutes, then let them get cold, and add twenty chestnuts that have been roasted and skinned; put these inside the pheasant, cover the breast with a very thin slice of veal, then envelop it in slices of bacon fat, tie them on, place the bird in a stewpan on more bacon, and add two glasses of malaga; cook over a very slow fire. When done, skim the gravy, thicken it with chestnuts that have been roasted and put through a sieve, add some cut truffles, and serve.

Fillets de Faisan.—Take the two sides of the breast of a pheasant from the bone, lard them with truffles, put some slices of fat bacon in a stewpan, place the fillets on them, then pour in some light white wine (vin ordinaire) to just cover the fillets. When they are done, take them out and brown before the fire; reduce the sauce a little, strain it, and add some truffles if liked; serve the fillets on fried bread with the sauce round.

Boudin de Faisan.—Take equal weight of chopped and pounded pheasant, of floury potatoes that have been boiled and put through a sieve, and of fresh butter; pound all together, add eggs enough to make it into a paste, season with a little spice, pepper, salt, thyme, and pounded bay leaf; turn on to a board, and roll in flour to shape them, then brush over with white of egg, and cover with breadcrumbs; fry a pale brown, and serve with gravy made from the pheasant bones, etc., and sharpened with a few drops of vinegar. This pheasant mixture is also sometimes put in small buttered moulds and steamed; these little puddings are turned on to a dish, and gravy is poured round, not over them.

Croquettes of Pheasant are made in the same way as any other croquettes.

Partridges.—It is well to remember in selecting a French recipe for cooking partridges that by "perdreux" is meant young birds, by "perdrix" older ones. They are perdreux when the first feather of the wing is pointed, perdrix when it is round.

Perdreux are roasted with a band of bacon fat tied over the breasts, or they are larded.

Perdreux Grilles.—Take two small partridges, cut them in halves lengthways, beat them lightly, season with pepper and salt, roll them in oiled butter, then in fine breadcrumbs, and broil for twelve or fourteen minutes over a good fire. Serve with lemon and gravy.

Salmi de Perdreaux.—Take two cold partridges; cut each in six pieces, remove the skin and backbones, pound the latter, and put them in a stewpan with a handful of raspings, sweet herbs, parsley, a little broth, and a glass of white wine; boil twenty minutes, strain, put the gravy back in the stewpan, thicken it with a little flour, boil five minutes, put in the pieces of the partridges, and make hot without boiling; arrange the birds on a dish. Pound the cooked livers with a little butter, add them to the gravy, let it boil, and pour it over the partridges. Serve with fried bread round.

Perdreux aux Truffes.—Cut some truffles in small pieces; cook them in butter, with pepper, salt, and a little nutmeg; chop and pound some bacon and some of the white meat of a fowl; mix with the truffles, and stuff the partridges with it; then braise them. When done serve with gravy with chopped truffles in it.

Filets de Perdreaux Sautés.—Take the meat off the breasts of the partridges in filets, sprinkle salt over them, and cook in a stewpan with butter. Fry in butter as many pieces of bread as you have filets, arrange in a circle on a dish, with a fillet on each toast; keep hot. Put a little sauce espagnole or good gravy into the stewpan in which the partridge filets were cooked, with a wooden spoon stir the brown from the bottom of the stewpan, let the sauce boil, and pour it into the middle of the filets, and serve.

Perdreux aux Choux.—Cut up any remains of cold partridge, warm in good gravy without boiling. Braise a cabbage, adding a little piece of pickled pork to the braise; when done chop the cabbage and put it on a dish with the pickled pork cut in small pieces, place the partridge on the cabbage, thicken the gravy with flour mixed with butter, let it boil a few minutes, then pour over the pieces of bird, and serve.

Perdrix aux Choux (partridge and cabbage).—Put two partridges in a stewpan, with a lump of butter, and brown them slightly; add some slices of bacon or bacon cut in dice, a little stock, herbs, parsley, pepper, salt, and a little spice; let all cook slowly. Take a large cabbage, cut it in quarters, throw it in boiling water, and cook it fifteen minutes; then press and drain all the water from it, put it in a stewpan, with some fat from poultry, some small smoked sausages, and a piece of pickled pork; add a little broth; when all is nearly done (the cabbage requires nearly two hours, the partridges according to age) put the partridges in the stewpan with the cabbage, and finish cooking together (about half an hour), strain, and skim the gravy in which the birds were cooked, and serve in a tureen. When done squeeze the cabbage and cut it up, place it round the dish, arrange the bacon, sausages, and pickled pork (which latter must be cut in small pieces) round on the cabbage; put the partridges in the centre, and serve.

Perdrix à la Purée.—Braise the partridges and serve them on any purée that is liked, as à la purée de lentilles.

Perdrix de Campagne.—Take two old partridges, put them in an earthen stewpan or a jar, with half a pint of broth, two or three slices of fat bacon, a sliced onion, two carrots, a parsnip, salt, pepper, sweet herbs, parsley, and a bay leaf; cover closely, cook slowly for two or three hours, strain the gravy, skim, and serve with the birds.

Soufflé de Purée de Perdrix.—Take some cold partridge without skin, chop it very finely, and pound in a mortar; add a little thick bechamel sauce, add from three to five yolks of eggs, according to the quantity of partridge; beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, stir them in at the last minute, put in a buttered soufflé dish, bake in a rather quick oven, and serve the moment it is done.

Perdreux en Salade (partridge salad).—Take some cold partridges, cut them up, remove the skin and the bones, season the meat with oil, vinegar, pepper, and salt; leave for an hour, then drain the pieces and place them on a bed of salad, cover the whole with good mayonnaise, surround with alternate quarters of French lettuce and hard boiled eggs, and serve. Tarragon, capers, chopped gherkins, or fillets of anchovies are sometimes added.

Purée de Perdreaux aux Œufs Pochés (purée of partridge with poached eggs).—Take any remains of cold partridge (or pheasant), chop it after removing the skin and bone; to half a pound add six tablespoonfuls of rice that has been boiled in broth, and then allowed to get cold, pound together, add one ounce of butter and four tablespoonfuls of gravy made from the bones of the game, season with salt and nutmeg; make hot without boiling. Put the purée in the middle of a dish, surround it with seven or eight poached eggs, on each of which put a little of the gravy, and serve.

Canard Sauvage (wild duck).—Put in the body of the duck a lump of butter, pepper, salt, the juice and part of the rind of a lemon; roast before a quick fire for twenty minutes, basting well with butter; serve without gravy, with cut lemon or watercress.

Canard Sauvage en Salmis.—Prepare the same as a salmi of partridges.

Sarcelles Roties (roast teal).—Like wild duck, or instead of lemon put a bunch of parsley in the body; roast fourteen or fifteen minutes, and serve with a cut lemon.

Bécasses Roties (roast woodcocks).—Woodcocks are not drawn; the beak of each bird is thrust through the two legs and the body, to truss it as if it were a skewer; a slice of bacon fat is tied over the breast, and it is roasted fourteen or fifteen minutes before a quick fire; a piece of bread is put under to catch the trail as the bird roasts, and the woodcock is served on it. The bread is basted so that it browns; a little salt is sprinkled on the birds when they are done. Some cooks put a vine-leaf over the breasts under the bacon.

Salmis de Bécasses.—Draw two woodcocks, roast them before a good fire; take the livers and the insides and some livers of poultry, cook them in butter or poultry fat, add a few sweet herbs, parsley, and some trimmings from truffles; as soon as they are done pound them and rub through a sieve; put the purée in a stewpan, moisten it with some spoonfuls of brown gravy; add a little white wine. As soon as the woodcocks are done, cut each in five pieces, take off the skin and put them in the sauce, let them get quite hot, but not boil, squeeze in a little lemon juice, and serve the salmis on slices of fried bread.

Bécasses à la Manselle.—Cut the legs, wings, and meat from the breasts of two woodcocks that have been roasted; chop the remainder and put it in a stewpan with a teaspoonful of gravy, a tablespoonful of olive oil, salt, pepper, and the pounded livers of the woodcocks; boil for twenty minutes, put through a sieve, then put back in the stewpan and add the pieces of woodcock; let them get thoroughly hot, then serve.

Bécassines (snipes) are cooked in the same way as woodcocks.

Cailles Roties (roast quails).—Draw and truss them, put a vine leaf over the breast of each and tie bacon over that; put slices of bread in the dripping-pan, and roast at a moderate fire.

Cailles au Jambon (quails with ham).—Make a forcemeat with parsley, scallions, and mushrooms chopped with the livers of the quails; draw, then stuff the birds. Put in the bottom of a stewpan as many small slices of ham as there are quails, next put them on the ham with a little parsley, sweet herbs, and pepper, but no salt, as the ham contains sufficient; cover the whole with a large slice of bacon fat; put the cover on the stewpan with some hot cinders on it, and cook gently at the side of the stove; when done serve the quails on the ham. Put a little veal gravy and a few drops of vinegar in the stewpan; stir to detach the brown from the bottom of it; let it boil, strain, and serve.

Grives (thrushes) are much eaten in France; they are roasted like quails; some cooks draw them, some dress them with the insides in.

Grives aux Olives (thrushes with olives).—Take six thrushes, draw them, cut off the heads and feet; cook the livers, hearts, etc., in butter, and with them a few breadcrumbs, six tablespoonfuls of sausage meat, and a little chopped parsley; stuff the birds with this. Melt a small lump of butter in a stewpan, put in the thrushes, and sprinkle a little salt in, cook over a quick fire, turning them as they cook; when they are brown add a wineglassful of white wine; let it reduce to half, then add a quarter of a pint of thickened gravy; let it boil up, take out the thrushes as soon as they are done, and arrange on a dish; boil the sauce two minutes, mix with it some olives that have been stoned, make them hot, and pour the sauce over the birds.

Plovers are not drawn; they are cooked like woodcocks.

Ortolans.—The gizzards and crops are taken out, and the ortolans are roasted ten minutes before a quick fire; they are served without gravy, but with the fat out of the dripping pan.

Alouettes or Mauviettes (larks) are roasted in slices of bacon.

Mauviettes à la Minute.—Take twelve larks, cut off the heads and feet and remove the gizzards, brown them in butter in a stewpan over a quick fire; when a pale brown take them out and sprinkle with a little salt; put in the stewpan two tablespoonfuls of minced shalots, some mushrooms and parsley, all finely chopped, sift in a little flour, add a quarter of a pint of light wine, and the same quantity of broth, boil up; put the larks into the stewpan again, simmer eight or ten minutes, finish with a squeeze of lemon juice, and serve with fried bread round. The mushrooms are sometimes omitted.

Paté de Mauviettes (lark pie).—Take a dozen larks, open them by the backs, take out the insides, bone them, and remove the heads and feet; chop the intestines and cook with some fat bacon, then pound and pass through a sieve; add to this nearly a pound of sausage-meat and two tablespoonfuls of bread paade, with a little chopped parsley, sweet herbs, pepper, salt, and spice, fill the larks with some of this forcemeat, and wrap each in a very thin slice of bacon fat. Put a thin layer of forcemeat at the bottom of a pie-dish; on this arrange the larks, cover them with the remainder of the forcemeat, add a little gravy, and put a crust of pâte brisée over, brush the outside with yolk of egg, and bake. When cooked make an opening at the side or raise the crust and pour in some good hot gravy; serve. Chopped onions, shalots, and mushrooms are sometimes added to this forcemeat.

HARE.

Lièvre Roti (roast hare).—Lard the hare over the back and legs, roast before a good fire, basting it well, serve with sauce "au pauvre homme," to which has been added the gravy from the hare and the finely chopped liver.

Civet de Lièvre (civet of hare).—Cut a hare in pieces, put aside the blood and the liver. Prepare a good bunch of sweet herbs and parsley, with a clove of garlic and a bay leaf in it, also two dozen small onions (browned in butter) and a dozen mushrooms. Commence by putting a little piece of butter in a stewpan, with half a pound of bacon cut in small pieces (or a quarter of a pound of bacon and a quarter of a pound of pickled pork); when it is warm add the hare, and cook together until quite hot (eight to ten minutes), then sift in a large tablespoonful of flour, and stir until the bottom of the stewpan is dry; then add some red wine and hot water, the bunch of herbs, salt, pepper, two or three cloves and a lump of sugar; stir well, cover, and let all simmer, stirring now and then; when three parts done add the small onions, the mushrooms, and the liver. When sufficiently cooked arrange the hare on a dish, with the onions and mushrooms round it. Strain the gravy, and at the last add the blood, stirring it in like a thickening, but only let it get hot, not boil, or it will curdle. Some cooks chop the liver very finely before adding it, or pound it after it is cooked, and put it back in the gravy.

Lièvre en Daube.—(This is the best way in which to cook an old hare.) Bone a hare, and place it in a braising-pan with a piece of knuckle of veal and some slices of bacon over and under it, salt, pepper, carrots, onions, bay leaf, sweet herbs, parsley, and a lump of sugar; place over the fire for ten minutes, then add some broth and a little white wine; cook very slowly for two hours and a half, or longer if the hare is old or has not been hung long enough to be tender. When it is done take the pieces of hare out of the stewpan and arrange them on a dish, skim and strain the gravy, serve very hot, poured over the hare. This is also served cold, but then the gravy is poured into a pan, allowed to set, and served as jelly with the cold hare.

Levraut Sauté (leveret sauté).—Cut up a leveret, put it in a stewpan with some butter or chopped bacon fat, turn it about and cook it; when it begins to stick to the bottom of the stewpan sift in a little flour and some finely-powdered sweet herbs or chopped mushrooms, and moisten with one-third white wine and two-thirds broth, half a pint altogether; add a lump of sugar, pepper and salt; cook gently until the meat is done, then add a little piece of butter mixed with a teaspoonful of flour, cook for five minutes more, then put on a dish, sprinkle a little finely-chopped parsley over the top, and serve.

Levraut au Chasseur.—Sauté a leveret as above; when done mix with it some onions that have been finely chopped, cooked in butter, and then in broth until it is glaze, that is to say the broth should be nearly dried up; cook two minutes after the onions are added, and serve.

Levraut Piqué, Roti au Cresson.—Lard a leveret; roast it forty minutes, baste it well with butter as it cooks. Serve it surrounded with watercresses seasoned with oil and vinegar. Serve the gravy out of the dripping-pan in a sauce tureen.

Paté de Lièvre.—Bone a hare; cut it and one pound of fresh pork and one pound of veal cutlet in pieces. Chop a quarter of a pound of beef kidney suet, some scallions, parsley, thyme, a bay leaf, and small clove of garlic; mix with the meat; add pepper, salt, and two or three cloves, arrange the whole in a game pie-dish or a jar; cut half a pound of bacon in thin slices, place them on the top of the meat, and put in eight tablespoonfuls of water; cover very closely with a weight on the top of the lid, and bake for four hours in a moderate oven. The cover must fit closely enough to keep the steam in.

RABBITS.

Lapereaux aux Petits Oignons (young rabbits with onions).—Cut up two rabbits, take a plateful of very small onions, skin and throw them into boiling water for fifteen minutes; put some thin slices of bacon in a stewpan with the onions (which must be well drained after blanching), and a lump of sugar; add the pieces of the rabbits five minutes after, also pepper, salt, sweet herbs and parsley; cook for two minutes; add a little broth and two tablespoonfuls of white wine, cover the stewpan, and cook gently. When done put the rabbits on a dish with the bacon and onions round; put a little more white stock in the stewpan, thicken it with butter and flour, add a little nutmeg, with more pepper and salt if required, boil for five minutes, then pour it over the rabbit, and serve.

Lapereaux à la Tartare.—Bone two rabbits and cut each into four pieces, put them into a dish with a marinade of oil, pepper, salt, and chopped parsley, scallions and shalots; let them soak an hour or two, then dip the pieces in breadcrumbs, put the remains of the marinade over them, broil over a good fire, and serve dry. Send remoulade (or other sauce if preferred) to table with them in a soup tureen.

Lapereau aux Mousserons (rabbit with mushrooms).—Take a young rabbit, cut it in six pieces, put it in a stewpan with a lump of butter, add a little flour, then some mushrooms, two scallions, and some chopped parsley; in a minute or two add pepper, salt, and sufficient broth to cover the rabbit; stir, put the lid on the stewpan, and simmer until tender; serve with the mushrooms round the rabbit and the gravy over. The gravy should be moderately thick; if necessary, let it reduce a little by boiling quickly after taking the rabbit and mushrooms out.

Lapin à la Jardinière.—Cut a rabbit in pieces, put it in a jar with onions, carrots, peas, turnips, potatoes, beans, a little celery, bunch of sweet herbs, parsley, pepper, salt, and some fat skimmed off stock, or poultry fat if you have it; if not, some butter or good dripping; fill the jar up with water, and bake in a moderate oven from three and a half to four hours, then separate the pieces of rabbit from the vegetables, rub the latter through a sieve to make a purée, then put it in a stewpan to make it quite hot. Fry some slices of bacon, and put the pieces of rabbit in the pan at the same time to brown them a little, then arrange the rabbit and bacon on a dish, and put the purée over all.

Lapereau Sauté, aux Capres.—Cut up a young rabbit, put it in a frying-pan with some lard or butter, a finely-chopped onion, salt and pepper, fry over a quick fire; when nicely coloured add two tablespoonfuls of light white wine, let it evaporate, then add a good wine-glassful more of half white wine and half water, and a little flour and water mixed together; finish cooking over a gentle fire; just before serving throw in a handful of capers.

Gibelotte de Lapin.—Cut up a rabbit, place it for two hours in a marinade of onions, parsley and vinegar; cut five ounces of pickled pork in slices; brown two dozen little onions in a stewpan, take them out and put the rabbit in the fat in which they were browned, add the pork, pepper, salt, a bunch of sweet herbs and parsley; when the meat is brown sprinkle a little flour in, and add some hot water and a little hot white wine, cook fifteen minutes, then add the two dozen little onions, and finish cooking together over a moderate fire; ten minutes before serving add some raw mushrooms; when done take out the herbs, and serve with the onions round.

Cuissot de Chevreuil Roti (roast haunch of venison).—When the venison has been hung long enough, wipe it all over with tepid vinegar, and lay it for six hours in a marinade of oil, vinegar, chopped onions and parsley; then roast it before a good fire, basting it well, first with butter, then with its marinade; roast about one hour and a quarter; salt when done, before taking from the fire; serve with a frill round the knuckle. Skim some of the fat from the contents of the dripping-pan, then add "sauce poivrade" to the gravy, and send to table with the venison.

Civet of Venison.—The scrag end of the neck or the breast does very well for a civet. Proceed the same as for civet of hare, but of course there is no blood or liver to add. Serve with fried sippets.

Emincé de Chevreuil (hashed venison).—From a joint of cold roast venison cut some thin slices; remove any brown or dry pieces from them. Cook in butter two tablespoonfuls of minced shalots; add two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, reduce it to half; add any gravy that is left from the roast venison and a little stock; thicken with flour mixed with butter; cook five minutes, then add pepper, chopped parsley, and the slices of venison; make hot without boiling, and serve on a hot dish with fried sippets round.

Minced Venison.—Prepare a sauce as above, put in some minced cooked venison, make it hot without boiling, season with pepper and salt, and serve with halves of hard boiled eggs round.

In this paper I have for convenience followed the plan of most French cookery books in placing rabbits and some small birds that are not really game under that head.

I must again remind readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER that the wine may be omitted from most of the recipes. I give them as they are prepared, but it is to be remembered that where a thing is cheap it is much more used and often unnecessarily; for my part I do not think rabbits would be worth the white wine often used in cooking them, at the price we should have to pay for the wine in England, but I have found most of the foregoing recipes very good without it.

THE MICROSCOPE AND OURSELVES.

PART IV.

NERVES.

How often does one hear people mention nerves in a vague sort of way, especially with reference to some real or imaginary ailment of their own! In how many senses, indeed, do people use this expression? Some speak of not having "the nerve" to do such and such an action, such as the climbing of a high mountain; then using the word nerve in the sense of calmness, in preserving their equilibrium in the accomplishment of the feat, or in remarking on the presence of mind displayed by some acquaintance in meeting a sudden emergency, they speak of the "nerve" he showed. How often do we hear of people "nerving" themselves to undertake a difficult task, and how many people speak of "a fit of the nerves," and how many more are "nervous"!

FIG. 1.—WHITE NERVE FIBRES.

(b) Medullary Sheath. (a') Node of Ranvier.

And yet all these people, in speaking of these things, are unwittingly exemplifying the attributes of the so-called "nervous system," and I want in this article to give you some idea of the functions of this wonderful system of ours, and some notion of the structure of its many component parts. You must all by this time be so familiar with the terms "cells" and "fibres" that I shall have nothing new in the way of elements to introduce to you, the only novelty which I shall place before you being the structural arrangement. In this article, as in my former ones, I propose in the first place to deal with the microscopical appearances of the various structures, and subsequently to indicate what special processes they subserve.

FIG. 2.—SCHEME OF A MEDULLATED NERVE FIBRE.

(b) Medullary Sheath.
(c) Axis-Cylinder.

I have said that the component parts of the "nervous system" are made up of cells and fibres, but that the arrangement is peculiar. We will first take the pre-eminently fibrous part of our nervous system—I mean the "nerves."

Now nerves have been divided, from a microscopical point of view, into two great classes: the "white" or "medullated," and the "grey" or "non-medullated." Let us first notice the white or medullated nerve fibres, and as we do so you will come to understand why they are so called. Fig. 1 represents two white or medullary nerve fibres which have been teased out of a nerve with fine needles on a microscope slide, and stained in solutions of osmic acid and nitrate of silver, and then mounted in glycerine. The specimen is supposed to be under the high power. Such a specimen can always be obtained ready prepared in this particular way at the shops of most microscope-dealers.

What do we see? Let us begin at the edge of the specimen. There is here a fine tubular sheath surrounding the whole structure; this is called the "primitive sheath" (c), and serves as an outer protection for the fibre. Next we come to a part (b) which is stained a dull, almost black colour. This part is an oily, fatty substance called "myelin," and in the natural state of the specimen was white, and on this account gives the fibre its characteristic white colour, but we have used an agent, osmic acid, which has the power of blackening all fat, hence the change of colour in the part. This structure is called the "medullary sheath," hence the name given to the nerve fibre "medullated," on account of the presence of this part, or sometimes it is called the "white substance of Schwann," from the man who first demonstrated its existence. This medullary sheath serves in a great measure to protect the structure we shall next consider, and this is the "axis-cylinder" (a), the working part of the nerve. Fig. 2 shows a rough plan of the construction of a nerve such as we have just considered. But now having passed the structural elements of our specimen in review, let us look more closely into its intimate arrangement.

FIG. 4.—TRANSVERSE SECTION OF A NERVE.

(a) Epineurium. (c) Endoneurium.
(b) Perineurium. (d) Nerve Fibres.

You will notice in Fig. 1 that the nerve fibres are not quite continuous, and that at one place there is a modification of their calibre, and this is produced in the following manner: At a the medullary sheath suddenly ceases, and the primitive sheath is bound tightly round the axis-cylinder itself by a ring of cement substance similar in constitution to that which we notice as joining the edges of epithelial cells. Now nitrate of silver, when exposed to sunlight in the presence of such animal matter as this, blackens it, as any of you who have had occasion to use lunar caustic must know; thus by using nitrate of silver we bring out in strong relief this constricting band, and also the axis-cylinder at a, giving the appearance of a cross, as seen in Fig. 3. This arrangement takes place at regular intervals in the course of the nerve fibres, thus dividing each fibre into equal segments. Each little notch is known as a "node of Ranvier," after Ranvier, a French histologist.

FIG. 3.—WHITE NERVE FIBRE.

Just above "a" in Fig. 1 you notice a nucleus on the left-hand side; this is the nucleus of the segment of the nerve fibre.

What I have now described, then, are the elements which go to make up a white or medullated nerve, but it takes many to make up an ordinary small visible nerve. Fig. 4 represents a transverse section of a nerve, and there you see, first, a large amount of "connective tissue" (a)—principally white fibrous, such as I have described in previous articles; this is called the "epineurium." You will notice in the specimen five rounded patches; these are transverse sections of bundles of nerve fibres which go to make up the nerve; each bundle is surrounded by a distinct sheath, the "perineurium" (b), which sends in prolongations between the individual nerve fibres, these prolongations being called collectively the "endoneurium" (c).

The nerve fibres present a small circular sectional area with a little spot in the centre of each; the little spot represents the cut end of the axis-cylinder of each nerve fibre. The individual fibres never branch or communicate, but remain distinct, like the threads in a skein of silk. This holds them only in the course of the nerve; at its termination a different state of things exists.

As I have already indicated, all nerve fibres do not present the peculiar characters just described, and I must now draw your attention to Fig. 5, which represents, as you see, a very different structure. Here you distinguish no black masses in either side of an axis-cylinder; you merely see fibres which are in the first place more sinuous in outline, more granular in texture, and lastly, having no medullary sheath, and yet presenting distinct nuclei at certain points. We may consider these as ordinary white nerve fibres robbed of their medullary sheath, and thus consisting only of an axis-cylinder and a primitive sheath to the latter, of which the nuclei, seen so distinctly, belong. Many white nerves towards their terminations take on this character; the fibres measure from 1-8000th to 1-6000th of an inch in diameter. The nerves which give us the sense of smell are of this particular character. In some instances nerve fibres consist merely of an axis-cylinder protected neither by medullary nor primitive sheath. So much then for the fibrous constituents of the nervous system.

Now let us turn our attention to the structure and management of the cellular elements. These are found principally in what is called the "central nervous system," or "cerebro-spinal axis," that is, the part encased in the skull and in the vertebral column or "spine." These cells present very various appearances, and have equally varying functions.

Let us think again of "amoeba," as we look at Fig. 6. Again we see a cell with its processes, this time sharply defined and permanent, and a nucleus and nucleolus equally brilliant and distinct. Sometimes these cells have only one process; they are then called "unipolar" nerve cells; sometimes they have two processes, in which cases they are spoken of as "bipolar" nerve cells; at other times, having many processes, they are called "multipolar" nerve cells. In a multipolar nerve cell most of the processes branch indefinitely, but it is stated that one and only one remains unbranched, and this being continued on becomes the axis-cylinder of a nerve (Fig 6, a). These are the most important and interesting cells in the nervous system, but others of less import, and generally of smaller size, occur in plenty, in the brain especially.

FIG. 6.—NERVE CELL.

(a) Beginning of Axis-Cylinder.

Let us now get a rough idea of the use and rationale of arrangement of these various elements.

For convenience of description and ease of conception it is as well for us at once to realise that there are two kinds of nerves, both, like telegraph wires, transmitting impulses from one part to another. These two kinds of nerves are called respectively "motor" and "sensory." First let us consider the motor, and in doing so let us take the most elementary and fundamental notion of a "motor act." Imagine then for a moment a nerve-cell, such as I have just described, with its process going to form the axis-cylinder of a nerve, and imagine this nerve to terminate in a muscle, i.e., a structure capable of movement. A "stimulus" or impulse generated in this nerve-cell travels down the axis-cylinder of the motor nerve, is conducted by its termination to the muscle, and causes a contraction of that muscle which produces movement; this constitutes a simple motor act. Not unlike an electric bell, our cell is our battery, our nerve is our conducting wire, and our muscle gives us its functional result, just as much as the electric bell would. A nerve performing such a function as this is called a "motor," "efferent," or "centrifugal" nerve.

Now, dealing with sensory nerves in a manner parallel to that in which we dealt with the motor, let us examine their mode of action. Imagine a nerve in connection with the skin of the hand, and terminating, as our motor nerve began, in a nerve-cell. Let us prick the hand; the impulse is carried up along the nerve with the utmost rapidity, and appreciated at once by the centre. Now this is what goes on when we feel pain, or heat, or cold, or when we feel a body and experience the sense of touch. A nerve that performs such a function is termed a "sensory," "afferent," or "centripetal" nerve.

The functions of these two nerve fibres are often associated, and in the following way. Our finger is pricked, by our sensory nerve conductor we feel pain, and immediately we exercise our motor abilities and draw the hand away. The centre cell has been stimulated by the pain impulse, and has generated a stimulus which has been transmitted down the motor nerve, and caused a movement. The rapidity of this complicated act is known to all of us who have felt sudden pain.

The whole of this process is called a "reflex act." The rough sketch of the structure and function of the nervous elements cannot include an account of the minute construction of the various special terminations of sensory nerves, as in the eye, ear, tongue, and nose, nor in the skin; nor can it include an account of another nervous system, the so-called sympathetic, which forms many organs in the body and the blood-vessels. But it will have fulfilled its mission if it awakens a desire in any girl's mind to learn more on this subject, and will have doubly earned its reward if it enable her to understand and decipher with comparative ease any matter she may read on the subject in books or periodicals.

W. LAWRENCE LISTON.

USEFUL HINTS.

SALLY LUNNS.

Put a pint of warm water into a quart jug; add two ounces of German yeast, break it up into the water; add also a tablespoonful of flour, and the same of sugar. Mix them well together. Put the jug in a warm place. When the ferment is risen and just going down again it will be ready. In the meanwhile put two pounds of flour in a basin, rub six ounces of butter into it, also six ounces of sugar, including what you put in the ferment; then pour the ferment into the basin; add one egg. Mix them into a dough, and leave it in the basin for about forty minutes, then place a few small hoops, according to the size you want them, on a flat tin; mould them in pieces that will half fill the hoops, then let them prove nearly to the top of the hoops, and bake them.

A GOOD SODA CAKE.

Take two pounds of flour, one ounce of carbonate of soda, rub it in the flour, also ten ounces of butter; then add one pound of loaf dust and one pound of currants and a little mixed peel; then make it into a dough by adding one pint of milk and six eggs.

DUNDEE MINCE CAKE.

Make first a plain paste; take half pound flour, add three ounces of butter, rub it in the flour and make it into a dough by adding about a teacup of water, roll it out and fold it over twice; then roll it out and put it on a flat tin; spread some mincemeat all over it, about half an inch thick. Then make some cake dough as follows:—Take four ounces of butter, add four ounces of loaf dust, beat them well together with the hand, add two eggs, mix them in, also add half pound flour. Spread this dough all over the mincemeat about the same thickness as the mincemeat. When the cake is baked and cold, make a little white icing, as follows—Take one white of an egg, add four ounces of loaf fine sugar (this sugar must be as fine as flour); beat them well together with a whisk until it gets thick, and then spread it all over the cake thinly. When the icing is dry, cut the cake across each way so as to make square blocks suitable for the table.

VICTORIA SPONGE.

Mix two eggs, three tablespoonfuls of white moist sugar, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, three tablespoonfuls of flour. Add a piece of butter size of a walnut previously melted, mix well together; divide in equal parts, bake on two dinner plates well buttered, in a moderate oven. When cold spread a layer of jam, and fold together. Cost, fourpence; time to make and bake, twenty minutes.

ALMOND ROCK CAKES.

Take two pounds of flour, rub six ounces of butter into it; add also twelve ounces of loaf dust and one pound of currants and a little peel, with one ounce of almonds, chopped up. Add three-quarters of an ounce of carbonate of soda and half an ounce of tartaric acid; then half a pint of milk with six eggs, and three drops of essence of almonds. Mix it, and make it into a dough; get a table fork and fork pieces out about the size of a small egg, place them on a tin or paper, and put them in the oven.

HAYMAKING SONG.

By SYDNEY GREY.

BORNE from afar, and echoing near,
There comes a ripple of mirth and song;
Summer wakens when June is here,
And out we sally, an eager throng,
Lads so busy and lasses gay,
Tossing and turning the new-mown hay.

Never a pleasanter gift she brings,
This lavish June that we love so much.
While the rose to her kirtle clings,
And earth grows fair at her gentle touch,
Fiercer waxes the mimic fray,
Fought in the midst of the new-mown hay.

Merrily, cheerily toss and turn,
The hours of morn will have vanished soon;
Rest comes only when rest we earn,
And here's a nook for the sultry noon;
See how softly the shadows stray
Over our couch on the new-mown hay.

Gaily is opened the meadow gate,
And gaily follows an eager train;
Queens might envy our royal state,
As home we ride on the loaded wain.
What to us is their grand array?
Where is a throne like the new-mown hay

Innocent pleasure, and quickly gone!
But destined yet in the heart to leave Recollections that later on May give a charm to life's noon or eve.
Thoughts of youth and its careless play,
Sweet as the breath of the new-mown hay.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER III.

A WEEK after the memorable episode of the visit to the publishers, Evelyn's boudoir presented an unusually gay appearance. It was always a pretty place, with its odd mixture of Japanese and European decoration—its fans and sketches on the walls, bamboo tables standing about, palms in blue pots, flowers in china bowls and specimen glasses, bits of Oriental tapestry; its piano and bookshelves. To-day, about a dozen girls in their light summer frocks added grace and brightness to the scene.

Although Evelyn was not surrounded by the literary and artistic clique after which her soul hankered, she had a sprinkling of girl friends in the neighbourhood—the daughters of local professional men or wealthy London merchants—who were in some sense congenial, and over whom she honestly tried to exercise an influence for good, collecting them into a society for discussion and reading. This was one of the sessions of the "Mayflower Club." At a table Evelyn, as president, was enthroned, with papers and ink before her, an important look on her face, while Dottie, unusually solemn and intent, sat by her side, holding a manuscript volume.

"The last meeting of the Mayflower Debating Club," read Dot, in a preternaturally business-like tone, "was held on May 9th. Miss Lancaster was appointed secretary, vice Miss Smith, retired. Fifteen members were present. The minutes were read and confirmed.

"Miss Hope then read a paper supporting the proposition that all professions should be thrown open to women. A discussion followed—"

"But you haven't put down any of my arguments," interrupted Evelyn, sotto voce.

The minutes had begun well, and were now falling off alarmingly.

"I couldn't remember them," whispered Dot, ruefully. "Some thought one way, some another—then there was a vote, and the original proposition was carried by 11 to 4."

Until a short time ago Dottie had insisted that she was not clever enough to have anything to do with the society. Evelyn had carried the day in persuading her little cousin to accept the post of secretary, and she had evolved the minutes out of her own idea as to what was fitting, without consulting the president.

"We usually have rather fuller minutes both of the paper and discussion," said Evelyn, smiling benignly round, "but this is my cousin's first experience. Do you confirm these minutes as they stand? Thank you; then I will call upon Miss Joyce to open the question of the day—'Does Tennyson or Mrs. Browning present the truer ideal of womanhood?' Take notes, Dottie."

The latter words were uttered in a severe undertone, and Dottie, stopping midway in the smile she was directing towards a friend across the room, blushed guiltily, seized a sheet of paper, and began to write with much show of diligence.

The paper was very good as far as it went. Tennyson's "Princess" was brought forward and contrasted with "Aurora Leigh." There were a great many quotations, and the speaker ended by declaring that in her opinion Mrs. Browning bore away the palm for appreciation of the needs and ambitions of her sex.

"Will Miss Willoughby read her paper?" requested Evelyn; and the upholder of Tennyson took up the tale.

The well-known lines at the close of the "Princess" were quoted as embodying the true aims and hopes of women, and various characters from the "Idylls of the King" were brought on the scene. Miss Willoughby, a slight fair girl, evidently sympathised in the idea that woman's chief aim was to "—set herself to man,

"QUEENS MIGHT ENVY OUR ROYAL STATE."

Like perfect music unto noble words," and extolled the Laureate's view. Dottie listened round-eyed, with suspended pencil, till recalled to her note-taking by a nudge from the president's elbow.

The paper closed, and after a short pause one and another began to make remarks. Evelyn, from her presidential chair, listened, put in a word now and again, called the members to order when, as frequently happened, two or three of them were talking at once; and whenever her voice was heard it was listened to with respect. The debate had, perhaps, little intrinsic value; the point to be settled was not of sovereign importance—indeed, was scarcely susceptible of decision one way or the other; but the question had the good effect of bringing out the thoughts of members, and it had made them study their authors beforehand. At the close Evelyn enunciated her own views. Tennyson and Mrs. Browning could not be expected to look at the question from the same point—their sex made the difference; their ideal was after all much the same—far in advance of our grandmothers' ideal; but while Tennyson regarded woman more as a complement to man, Mrs. Browning was better able to conceive of her as an individual, competent of individual development whether she married or not. "Therefore," concluded the president, with an air, "I regard Mrs. Browning as presenting by far the nobler picture of womanhood."

"What made you so awfully clever?" whispered Dottie, quoting from "Alice in Wonderland" as Evelyn closed her speech; but disregarding this levity, the president called for a vote. Only three members ventured to disagree with her, and Mrs. Browning triumphantly carried the day.

The session broke up, and the girls closed about their favourite Evelyn, renewing the discussion in an informal way, begging for the loan of some volume from her well-stocked library; asking what such and such an expression meant, and suggesting new topics for debate. They were no select coterie from Girton or Newnham, but merely ordinary suburban girls, endowed with a fair average of brains, and of necessity possessing some taste for literature.

Dottie was conversing in a corner with a new friend of hers, Emily Thorne, a merry brunette with vivacious, dark eyes.

"Yes, I have only just been appointed secretary, and how to write minutes I haven't the faintest idea. All those grand business-like expressions I copied out of a book. Look at my notes now. I can't read them! but Evelyn made me be secretary. She is awfully clever, and makes me do anything. I feel such a little goose beside her. I can't think how it is she came to have such stupid relatives."

"Where does she get her literary tastes from?" inquired Miss Thorne.

"Oh, from her father. He used to write in the Fortnightly, ages before we were born. But her mother wasn't clever at all, and different in every way. We are on her mother's side, you know," declared Dottie. "Her uncle on the father's side, Mr. Hope, is quite different from us, and thinks us the veriest idiots on the face of the earth. But—"

Here a little murmur was audible from the group round Evelyn, and Dottie stopped short in her family chronicle, ejaculating, "She's telling them!"

"Yes, I am going to publish a book," broke in Evelyn's clear voice. "It will be called 'Day-dreams,' and will contain the poems I have lent some of you to read."

"Oh, Evelyn, darling! How lovely! How splendid!" broke from the bevy of girls; and one plain little creature, with a stoop in her shoulders, who adored her brilliant friend, murmured, with tears in her eyes: "You will outshine them all yet; I know it. Oh, I hope I shall live to see it."

"You are too partial, Bertha," responded Evelyn, greatly pleased. "I don't look for fame or money. You remember, girls, what Wordsworth says:—

"'Tis my delight, alone in summer shade,
To pipe a simple song for thinking hearts.'
That is all my ambition."

Evelyn did not as a rule quote poetry in conversation, but her emotions, quickened by the intellectual exercise of the debate, were strongly roused; the colour in her cheek, the light in her eye, showed that she was living intensely. It was a moment of concentrated experience, and it seemed to her as if the glorification and delight she received from her little circle were a foretaste of a wider renown. It was a shock like that of a sudden douche-bath to hear a well-known masculine voice observe, in measured tones, "All her ambition, does the child say? Well, well!"

Evelyn, standing with her back to the door, had not heard her uncle enter; but there he stood, looking with an expression of quiet amusement on the bevy of girls. He seemed to his excited niece just then like an embodiment of masculine scorn at feminine effort. His slim, athletic, well-brushed figure, his grizzled hair and grey moustache laid across his lip, his keen grey eyes, had nothing poetic about them, Evelyn thought with irritation; and now he had come to overhear her poetic quotation and ridicule her aspirations! It was with difficulty she controlled herself sufficiently to greet him, and observe—

"You came in upon us just at the close of a debate, Uncle Austin."

"Pray do not let me disturb any of the proceedings," he replied, seating himself. "I presume you do not meet with closed doors; may not a masculine outsider be enlightened by some of your 'scattered sapience?'"

But the girls were dispersing already, in the unexplained consciousness that a jarring element had come into the scene; and Evelyn was shortly left alone with her uncle.

"So your ambition is only 'in summer shade, to pipe a simple song for thinking hearts'?" inquired Mr. Hope. "I am glad, at any rate, you aim no higher than Wordsworth, my dear. If it had been Shakespeare or Goethe you wished to emulate—well, one might have been doubtful of the result of your attempts, but only Wordsworth!—oh, that's a simple matter enough."

"You are laughing at me, uncle, just because I am going to publish my poems, as I suppose auntie has told you," replied Evelyn, nerving herself for the fray; "but everyone must have a beginning; why not I?"

Mr. Hope's rejoinder was certainly direct enough, making up in frankness what it lacked in compliment.

"My dear child, do you consider your poems are worth reading?"

This was too much.

"Every one to whom I have lent them or read them says so," retorted Evelyn, in scarlet indignation. "The Vicar reads one every now and then at our Penny Readings, and the people always applaud. All my friends about here say they are worth publishing. I would not hear of it for a long time, but now I am two and twenty; I am not a child; I take the opinion of those competent to judge."

"And Mr. Wrexham—what said he?"

"Oh," returned Evelyn, with a sudden distinct and disagreeable recollection of her interview, "he said—what I suppose they generally do say."

What a consolation if she could only have dazzled this cynical uncle with a glowing report from the head of the well-known firm! She did not somehow care to quote Mr. Dalrymple.

As Mr. Hope lifted his eyebrows inquiringly, Evelyn went on in desperation—

"Why, uncle, you know Milton got five pounds for 'Paradise Lost.' Thackeray couldn't find a publisher for 'Vanity Fair—'"

"Good gracious! does the girl compare herself with such men as those?" cried Mr. Hope, lifting his eyes to the ceiling.

"No, no!" ejaculated Evelyn, almost crying with vexation; "but if they, so much the more I. Why should I expect to be differently treated?"

"My dear girl, listen to me," said her uncle, suddenly assuming a graver tone. "I have no authority over you now, I know that well enough, but still, your father was my only brother, and that's some sort of a claim for interest, isn't it? I don't like to see you do what is silly. You are relying on the verdict of friends, who are always partial—at least nearly always," interjected Mr. Hope, who recollected that he could scarcely be deemed partial. "Your poems, from what your aunt has shown me, are not worth publication."

"How dare she show you!" cried Evelyn, in hot indignation, remembering the copy she had made for Mrs. Lancaster of certain "Lines to a Faded Flower."

"What? rush into print, and yet object to one critical individual seeing what you write? That's logical. What's the title, child? 'Nightmares,' isn't it?"

"'Day-dreams!'" cried the poor authoress, furiously.

"Oh, 'Day-dreams!' I knew it was something of the sort. Now I am going to offer you some advice, Evelyn; you will not take it, I know, and will think me a brute into the bargain, but it is this. Wait awhile. Write poetry if you like, but burn it afterwards. Meanwhile, if you really wish to follow in your poor father's steps, study—study—study. Study the best living masters of style; get their thoughts into your brain; use your pen for practice only; then in time you may do something."

"But I have arranged to have my poems issued by Messrs. Dalrymple and Co., and very soon too," replied Evelyn, obstinately.

"I'll not ask how much it is going to cost you; but come now—would you consent if I could stop it?"

"Oh no, no, uncle! I have told my friends; it would break my heart," replied Evelyn, piteously.

"Well, if you like to waste money in that way, it isn't my business, and if you will not take my advice I cannot help it," declared Mr. Hope, rising with a certain dry air that showed he was displeased. "I am always sorry to see an intelligent girl like you rushing into folly, but there's one comfort—you might do worse. I wish in future you would remember that I am willing enough to counsel you on these matters; your aunt and cousin are not 'in it' as regards literature, that I know; but my life and experience might count for something, even to so wise a young lady as yourself."

"Ask you for advice? no indeed!" thought Evelyn, whose whole being was up in arms against this brusque treatment. She scarcely heard her uncle's farewells, nor his inquiry when they meant to start for Switzerland. She wanted him to go, to get away out of her presence—this embodiment of hostile criticism. When she heard the front door slam behind him, she gasped for joy.

"Wretched, wretched man! how came he to be my father's brother?" thought she, impetuously.

Mr. Hope's bachelor life had not fitted him to be counsellor to an ardent and impulsive girl, and his method was too severe to be effectual. Criticism needs to be tempered with sympathy to an ardent young creature who is honestly striving with all her might to do something worth the doing; to be no mere idle, frivolous trifler, but to help others towards enlightenment. Evelyn had a high ideal of life. She believed that her gifts, of which she could not be unconscious, were talents entrusted to her by her Maker, for which she would one day have to give an account to Him. She believed she had the poetic faculty, and she was determined that she would not let it lie dormant. That she overrated her powers, and was premature in offering their results to the public, was not altogether her own fault, poor child. Many and many a girl has done the same, with less ground for self-delusion. Foolish and vain as she was, she might have been more inclined to listen to wise advice if mingled with the sympathy that, after all, is the meed of these young souls striving to impress themselves upon their day and generation.

THE USES OF ADVERSITY.—Adversity has often developed strength, energy, fortitude, and persistence that prosperity could not have produced. The dignity of self-support and self-respect has been gained when an external prop has been removed.

REALLY ALIVE.—We are only really alive when we enjoy the goodwill of others.—Goethe.

THE THICKNESS OF A SOAP BUBBLE.—Newton succeeded in determining the thickness of very thin laminae of transparent substances by observing the colours which they reflect. A soap bubble is a thin shell of water, and is observed to reflect different colours from different parts of its surface. Immediately before the bubble bursts a black spot may be observed near the top. At this part the thickness has been proved not to exceed the 2,500,000th of an inch.

HOW SHE MANAGED IT.—After the death of her husband Lady Dillon lived in Laughlin Castle, in Ireland, a princely edifice which, with the surrounding estate, was assigned to her as her jointure, on condition of her residing in the castle. She fell in love with an Englishman who could not be kept from returning to his own country. It appeared at first impossible to keep both her lover and her jointure, but her woman's wit succeeded in hitting on a plan. She ordered a banquet in the garden, fired the castle, and feasted by the light of the blazing pile. Then after supper, while the towers were burning, she, having no longer the castle to live in, set off to England with her lover.

MEN AND WOMEN.— "The love of flattery," says Swift, "in most men proceeds from the mean opinion they have of themselves; in women from the contrary."

THOUGHTS OF A BRIDE BEFORE THE CEREMONY.—Wonder if my train is straight! Wish I dare look round to see if that Isabel Price is here—hope she is. She wanted George herself, and she'll be green with envy. I have a feeling that the church is crammed. I hope I don't look white. If George hasn't brought the ring I shall die. Dear me, in another minute I shall have to say, "love, honour and obey!" Of course, it's all nonsense to think I'm going to obey George, though he certainly plays tennis awfully well. We always won when we played together. He said he should be my slave for ever—but then men do tell such stories. How fast pa is dragging me along; he is in a mighty hurry to give me away. I wonder how the girls look behind. If Eva treads on my train I'll never forgive her. Ah! George is there, that's all right; but what a perfect goose he looks—now I feel as cool as a cucumber. Here's the clergyman; we're going to begin. Shall I take my glove off now or wait a little while? Poor George! I never saw a man look so nervous. Well, I must attend to the service I suppose.

TYPES OF VIRTUE;

OR,

IDEAL HEROINES OF ENGLISH WRITERS.

TRUTHFULNESS . . . JEANIE DEANS.

LIKE a house which is built up with bricks, each of which, though necessary to the structure, helps to form but one design, so a good character is built from the virtues, all of which must be laid under requisition, as materials, if a complete and consistent result is to be attained. In both cases the structure rises from a solid foundation, and in a fine character the foundation may be said to be truth.

In its wider sense, truth is the mainstay of all the virtues, and its opposite of all the vices; it is in fact almost accepted as a synonym of goodness. God is the Father of truth, Satan the father of lies. Of course in this wider sense, and as applied to ourselves, truth has a threefold relation—to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves; but as a rule, when we speak of truth, we regard it in its second relation only, and we mean by the term conformity between speech and thought, or moral truth, as it is called.

Girls who read their Bible will remember how severe Christ is when speaking of the world, what the world says and what the world does; they may have wondered what He meant by the world. We are all of us the world, we live in the world; and yet we trust that Christ in His denunciation of the world did not include us, or at any rate did not rebuke the kind of life we try to live. In another passage Christ praises the world for being wise in its generation, and He could praise nothing which had not an element of good in it.

We may conclude that He meant by the world the people who live only for this world, or as we should say, worldly people—those who shut their eyes to another world. And yet these people are wise in their generation, and are in a sense put up as a pattern for children of the light. Now in what sense is the world wise in its generation, or as we should say good to itself; and how does it compare favourably with what we may call the Christian world?

In this way. It discovers the virtues which are most necessary to its well-being here, on this earth; forces obedience unto them, in a wonderful manner practises them, and the first and foremost of its virtues is truth, moral truth. Truth is absolutely necessary to the welfare of the State; without it barbarism would rule in undisputed sway. Commerce is founded upon mercantile honesty; law upon the presumption that the majority of men are not perjurers; society upon the ostracism it inflicts upon all who are discovered to be unworthy of credence.

An individual must be honest in his transactions, and truthful in his statements, otherwise he is regarded as an enemy to mankind. The source of this honesty need not be a love of the virtue for its own sake, just as we say "honesty is the best policy," though this would be a very low reason for being honest; in fact, it has been said that a man who acts upon this principle can scarcely himself be considered honest.

Friendship is largely founded upon trust; we love someone because we can trust him, because he will be true to us; we love a rascal sometimes because, though we acknowledge he may be untrue to others, we think that he will be true to us. Emotion, of course, enters largely into the question of love, and emotion or passion, when uncontrolled by reason, will love without trust, or nearly without trust; not entirely so, for there is a feeling that trust will follow, and our love, though we may not know it, is given conditionally. If trust does not follow, the love, in nine times out of ten, will vanish. Trust in love and in business is a belief in the truthfulness of the contracting parties.

It is as a rule easy to be truthful, for the virtue is perhaps the most instinctive that is implanted in our nature, but it is a virtue most difficult to practise in certain exigencies. Occasionally it demands of us to do, or to refuse to do, a very simple act, but which simple act, owing to the greatness of the virtue itself, becomes most momentous. In the case of the early Christian martyrs, who were asked simply to sprinkle a few grains of incense upon a brazier, if they had done so they would have been sacrificing the whole truth which Christ had revealed to them, just as much as if they had declared themselves formal apostates. They knew very well that by performing that simple act, those who tempted them would take it as a sign that they had renounced the religion of Christ, or at any rate would pretend to think so.

Of course as times are now Christians are not called upon to make great sacrifices for truth, but that great moralist and writer of fiction, Sir Walter Scott, has in one of his novels, the "Heart of Midlothian," created a situation in which a simple, honest Scottish lassie is called upon to make a sacrifice for the cause of truth, which is really no less than the life of her own sister.

It is not our purpose to state how those circumstances came about, as they bear no relation upon our heroine herself, and are connected with the guilt of others, our object is rather to show the view of duty taken by Jeanie Deans, how she carried out that duty, and the extraordinary labours she underwent in order to prevent it from bringing about the terrible result it would have had upon her sister. Like a noble character, she felt it was her duty to pursue a certain course, but at the same time determined to do all in her power that by her action others should not suffer.

People are in the habit of saying, "It is my painful but necessary duty" to do such and such a thing, meaning that they are about to do that which will cause suffering to others, whereas by taking more than ordinary trouble the duty might be performed equally well without causing suffering. This is where the real greatness of Jeanie Deans' character shows itself, she does a painful duty, but does all in her power to prevent the result of her action being the cause of suffering to others. She places herself in great danger, goes through tribulation of no ordinary character, feeling that the duty God has imposed upon her must be carried out, and at her own cost. There is a great difference between the way a generous person will make a sacrifice for truth, and a less generous person, who while sufficiently upright to make the sacrifice for truth, does not hesitate to let others suffer for it.

Unfortunately it frequently happens that people make their religious practices a cause of annoyance to others; of course they are perfectly right to perform those practices, but in nine cases out of ten a little self-sacrifice on their own part would prevent it becoming an annoyance. Such as these would do well to study the character of Jeanie Deans. Let them copy her to the letter in what she considered to be her duty, but let them not stop there, but take upon themselves, as she did, all the inconvenience and suffering which the duty had imposed.

Jeanie Deans was not pretty, nor in any way romantically interesting. "A young woman of rather low stature, and whose countenance might be termed very modest and pleasing in expression, though sunburnt, somewhat freckled, and not possessing regular features. . . . A quantity of fair hair, disposed with great simplicity and neatness, appeared in front of her round and good-humoured face." In fact, there is nothing in Jeanie Deans to attract our attention except her purity, the high principles from which all her actions spring, and a certain amount of quaintness begotten of extreme simplicity and single-mindedness. Thus we are attracted to the character by reason of its virtue, and we have sister's life—"I wad ware the best blood in my body to keep her skaithless," said Jeanie, weeping in bitter agony, "but I canna change right into wrang, or make that true which is false."

"Foolish, hard-hearted girl!" said the stranger, "are you afraid of what they may do to you? I tell you, even the retainers of the law, who course life as greyhounds do hares, will rejoice at the escape of a creature so young, so beautiful; that they will not suspect your doing this not for lucre or gain, but to save the life of the innocent, and prevent the commission of a worse crime than that which the law seeks to avenge."

"He has given us a law," said Jeanie, "for the lamp of our path; if we stray from it we err against knowledge. I may not do evil, even that good may come out of it."

Thus Jeanie will not tell a falsehood to save her sister's life, but is willing to make any other sacrifice to do so; and one thing only is no hesitation in saying that when a writer of fiction is able to do this, he must be looked upon as a great benefactor to his race; and that Scott has succeeded in doing it, is proved by the fact that Jeanie Deans is one of the most popular of his creations.

JEANIE DEANS.
(Drawn by John Faed.)

There is perhaps nothing more charming in the whole book than the manner in which she resists all temptations against truth.

When asked to take a false oath to save her tale; that, if they did suspect it, they would consider you as deserving, not only of forgiveness, but of praise for your natural affection."

"It is not man I fear," said Jeanie, looking upward; "the God whose name I must call on to witness the truth of what I say—He will know the falsehood."

"And He will know the motive," said the stranger, eagerly; "He will know that you are possible—to get her sister's pardon by appealing to the Queen herself. The difficulties in the way of such a task would seem insurmountable, even to courageous persons; there was the journey from Edinburgh to London, in the days of George II. a great undertaking; she would not consult her father, lest his curious disposition should interfere with her plan, and frustrate it; she had no funds, and knew but one person in London. Nevertheless, this simple Scottish maid overcame all obstacles; she applied to one friend for a loan of money, a very delicate undertaking, as the friend in question loved her, but she did not return his love; another friend, Butler, whom she afterwards married, gave her a letter to the Duke of Argyle, and she started on her journey with the intention of proceeding the whole way on foot.

She is waylaid by ruffians near Grantham, but escapes, and in the sequel arrives in London. It is not our purpose to describe her interview with the great Argyle, nor her still more important interview with the Queen; suffice it is to say that by her means her sister's sentence is changed from death to banishment.

Truth, as I have said, is the foundation upon which civilisation is built; nothing can be achieved, nothing will be recognised unless it is done in the name of truth. So much for the world's opinion. Religion also teaches us that to resist the known truth is one of the greatest—some theologians have said the greatest—of all sins. Thus both God and man have dignified truth, and given to it a greater importance than any virtue; while its opposite has been condemned, as of all vices the most contemptible and disgraceful.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

DR. PETER DACRE had been of old the least of a tyrant in his family of any man in Oxford, and for a time Mrs. Judy, who loved Master Jackie well-nigh as if she had been the mother who bore him, buoyed herself up and comforted Kitty with the assurance that the Doctor would come round. They would speak him fair, and the offender would be pardoned. But as has been noted, this staunch upholder of the cavalier doctrine, and grim opposer of all who differed from him, was not the old, mild, absorbed scholar, buried in "deep" iambics and "rolling" anapæstics, and willing to let the world go by unheeded. This was a roused, fretted man, who could not keep pace with his brethren, and yet could not rest, but was ready to out-Herod Herod in rejecting any and every stopgap to the threatening tide of anarchy and revolution. He forbade Kitty to approach him on the subject of her brother, saying that women—above all young girls—were not fit for such questions. It ought to be enough for Kitty that her father had banished Jack from Oriel; there was no call on her to dispute the righteousness of her father's decree.

As for Mrs. Judy, her former indulgent master dismissed her with a severe reprimand for the trespass of unauthorised interference in what was still further beyond her province. Had it not been for her great love for the family, including this master of hers who had suddenly waxed despotic and intolerant, Mrs. Judy would have brought her days of service to a summary end.

Lady Ottery was Kitty's great resource. Her wisdom and friendliness afforded consolation and encouragement to her goddaughter; for at the age of fifteen the sky of life soon clears, and the sun of hope is perpetually emerging from the densest mists. Lady Ottery was exceedingly sorry for the division in the family, and for the violent course of action into which her old friend Dr. Dacre had been betrayed.

"But it was just what might have been expected from him," her ladyship went on coolly, with her noted sincerity, and with the habit of speaking her thoughts aloud which was growing upon her with advancing years. "Once go against nature, and she will revenge herself. You don't find your habitually cantankerous people guilty of those acts of harshness that do astound the world; nay, it is some gentle soul who would not have let butter melt in his mouth, as the saying is, or have harmed a fly, that begins all at once to stamp and strike out in a frenzy. He began, indeed, when nobody saw it, the first time he was torn from his quiet days and peaceful pursuits, and launched into the perilous turmoil around him. He hath just woke up to it, poor man! and cannot take it peaceably. His rage, which hath been bottled up hot within him all this long while, doth break bounds incontinently, and deal destruction far and wide."

Recalled to Kitty's presence by her distress, Lady Ottery assured her that the grave trouble which had come into her life would blow over presently: such family quarrels, on the ground of politics, were only too frequent and familiar in seasons of public discord. It was her experience that when the discord passed away, so did the quarrel, until it was quite amazing what breaches were repaired, and grudges cast into oblivion.

Kitty listened wistfully, and wished she could believe it implicitly, because of the dismissed brother over whom his sister's heart yearned, all the more intensely that he represented, after her father, her whole kindred. If she were bereft of Jack, and he were withdrawn from the course of her future life, she was bereft indeed.

In the meantime she heard, that under the President of Magdalen of that day, with the strong tinge which Magdalen, as well as New College, had taken of the prevalent Puritan opinions, above all in the superior importance of the great national struggle which was occupying all men's minds, the outbreak of the students was condoned at the expense of such short terms of imprisonment or fines as Anthony Walton paid for John Dacre when he was paying his own.

For anything farther, Mrs. Judy had learnt good tidings, through humble satellites of her own, since Mrs. Kitty and she were strictly forbidden all communication with the delinquent, and did not dream in their honesty of not obeying orders. When Master Jackie was not in his college he was out at Islip Barnes, which, to be sure, had been a second home to him from his childhood, in the good keeping of his aunt and cousins, the Waltons.

But alas! alas! Dr. Peter held it good keeping no longer—rather the worst of evil keeping; and Kitty, girl as she was, dreaded that Jack's natural and inevitable resort, under what he considered his unmerited disgrace, to such kindred as continued to own and countenance him, would only farther incense her father with him and his views. She could not blame Jack when she remembered that he had nowhere else to go to, under the circumstances, and when she recalled all the kindness and affection which had subsisted till recently between the family at Islip Barnes and the other little family in the rooms at Oriel. Indeed, Kitty, under the joint training of wholesome-hearted Mrs. Judy and sagacious Lady Ottery, was growing up marvellously sensible and forbearing for her sex and years. She was early removed from virulent partisanship, which has such a false show of generous devotion; she was drawn betimes to the larger-minded, larger-hearted side of fairness and candour; she was softened and touched to the quick by the perpetually recurring recollection of old kindnesses which she could now neither respond to nor repay; she had a grateful sense, which she could not escape and did not so much as wish to avoid, of the benefits the Waltons were conferring on her dear brother, totally irrespective of the fact that Dr. Dacre had vilified Anthony, and denounced him as the tamperer with his son's loyalty—his wilful seducer into insurgency and rebellion.

It pained Kitty sorely to be compelled to question her father's absolute wisdom and justice, but she was too honest in her very love for him to deny to herself that he had been, as she had cried out, hard on Jack and unwarrantably bitter against Anthony. Her own little girlish quarrel with Anthony, for robbing her of her brother's company, and changing her Jackie from a merry lad to a care-burdened man, died clean out of existence. She would have done anything now, which her love and reverence for her father did not forbid, to atone to Anthony and all the Waltons for the lamentable extent to which she was sure they were misjudged in the dispute. She would have done it for her father's sake, no less than for Jack's and Anthony's and for her own, to keep Dr. Dacre from doing such despite in the blindness of his anger, which surely could not last for ever, to old and tried friends, as would fill him, when he came to himself, with affront and contrition.

If one can fancy King Lear with a son, in addition to his three daughters, a son with whom he was at enmity, whom he had driven from him, one can comprehend how Goneril and Regan would have stoutly supported their father in his fury of resentment, and spurred him on to yet more irreparable sins against his truer, nobler self. Cordelia, on the contrary, without forgetting her duty as a daughter, would have braved her father's utmost displeasure in order to defend her hardly-treated brother and his friends, whenever she had the opportunity. If no other opportunity was given her, she would still have stood up for them in her heart, and by the very sorrowful silence with which she declined to advocate an unrighteous cause, would have done her father the best service of telling him the truth with regard to his conduct.

Silence was all the tactics which poor little Kitty could practise; silent regret for her father's course of action, silent pity for Jack, silent goodwill to every one of the Waltons, who had never, she was persuaded, intentionally injured her or hers, who were now doing the best they could for Jack thus thrown on their hands.

Kitty did not pretend to judge the right or the wrong of the great quarrel between the King and his Parliament, for older and wiser heads than hers were distracted by conflicting claims. She honoured her King from the bottom of her heart, as her Bible bade her, both because he was her King and on account of the many virtues she had heard attributed to him. She was still of the mind that to die for him would be alike the duty and privilege of each of his faithful subjects. But she remembered also what Prissy had told her when Kitty and her cousins were fritillary gathering in Merton meadows. She had often pondered on it since, and on pithy remarks which Lady Ottery had dropped, until Kitty had come to a sound conclusion. It could not be that such young men as Jack and Anthony Walton, with their distinguished leaders and a large body of the nation, could have no ground for their persistent assertion that the King was ill-advised in his measures, and that Parliament must play its part in withstanding them, else England would become another bound and gagged France under the great Cardinal. Nay, the English Richelieu was gone; the Parliament had already impeached, tried, and sentenced Lord Strafford in the month of May, succeeding the students' riot in January. The big dark man, with the sombre heavy eyes and the fine hands, who had strode haughtily into the hall of St. John's and looked scornfully on the students' play, when he was still Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Kitty Dacre was a little girl taken to have a second glimpse of her King and Queen, had died as undauntedly as he had lived, by the headsman's axe on Tower Hill, amidst a wild conflict of feeling throughout the country.

Another of the great ones whom Kitty had seen at St. John's in 1636, my Lord the Archbishop, William Laud, the energetic Chancellor of Oxford, the liberal patron of scholars, the austere and pious priest, was impeached at the same time as Strafford, and, to the horror of his party in the church, thrown into the Tower, where he still lay.

As if to sound Strafford's requiem, there travelled across St. George's Channel and the Irish Sea in October of the same year the awful news of the massacre, in a rising of the Irish, of fifty thousand English men, women, and children within the space of a few days.

These were signs of the times which reached even young people and children. They penetrated Kitty's startled, shocked ears, and sank into her plastic mind, though she had nobody with whom she could talk them over, who could either arouse or quiet her as to their full import.

Dr. Dacre continued his policy of rigidly ignoring politics in his converse with women. The solitary exception was Lady Ottery, and she was tempted to borrow a leaf from his book and decline, when she thought what she was about, discussing such subjects with a tender, unformed chit like Kitty. She would hear enough of these ominous questions when she was older. In the present chaotic stage of her being, she would be only too apt to trouble her simple head with them, in an untimely fashion, on her banished brother's account. She would, if she were not held in check, be certain to receive a strong warp and bias of judgment either way, which might affect her character and fortunes unfavourably for the rest of her life.

Mrs. Judy had no such wise scruples, and she had the usual appetite for horrors of her class, but she did not choose that her nursing should sup on them before she was fit for strong meat. Mrs. Kitty was, according to this faithful friend's idea, inclined to be too quiet and thoughtful ever since her sad parting from Master Jackie, and Mrs. Judy would not be the person to deepen the inclination. In addition to this, the busy housekeeper's inveterate inclination to see all for the best, and to take a cheerful view of things in general, prevented her own spirits from being heavily overshadowed. On the contrary, she would smile and nod and prophesy all sorts of happy events in the world, till she almost provoked Kitty by the old woman's constitutional buoyancy.

If what Jack Dacre had said was true, that the times were making men of boys, it was not less certain that they would make women of girls; for they in their sweet, green youth, though they come less in contact with the world, have a tendency peculiar to them—a tendency which is neither entirely obviated nor cured, though it is balanced, by the mercurial spirits of their age. Young girls by fits and starts hug misfortune, and take a doleful, sentimental satisfaction in regarding themselves as ill-fated beings, doomed to sorrow.

But this juvenile tendency in Kitty was corrected by her natural good sense—a well-nigh invaluable quality which is too often slighted in this world, in the light of more flashy and glittering attributes.

Still, Kitty suffered a good deal from being deprived of the society not only of Jack but of her cousins. She had grown up to a large extent amongst elderly people, in a retired fashion, as the only daughter in the widowed household of a scholarly gentleman of no great means. Dr. Dacre's residence by courtesy in Oriel restricted visitors and visiting still more. If it had not been for Lady Ottery's parlour and the company Kitty met there, she would have been veritably a flower born to blush unseen. For though the Provost of Oriel had started in his headship of the college with a wife and daughters, his wife was dead and his daughters were married. Kitty had too few companions of her own age, with the occupations and pleasures natural to their years; and there were no more of those happy sojourns for a week, or even a month, at a time at Islip Barnes, which had formed such an agreeable and beneficial variety in the ordinary routine. It was on these occasions she had learnt the cheerful lessons of a family and a country life. She had been instructed by her aunt and Prissy in such household arts as did not come within the province either of Lady Ottery or Mrs. Judy. Kitty had sat and worked and chatted with gentle Prissy. The little cousin had run and rode and sung and danced with Alice, and been alternately petted and teased by Jack and Anthony.

All these good times were over, Kitty told herself with a profound sigh. For her to have proposed nowadays to go and be with her own brother, aunt, and cousins, only a few miles out into the country, would have been like offering a suggestion to forsake her father and the King's cause, and repair to a rebel camp.

Occasionally, while Jack was still at Magdalen, it was inevitable that the members of the disunited family should meet, or catch glimpses of each other, in the streets. Oxford was not large enough to admit of any other possibility. As a matter of fact, Magdalen was beyond the city walls in one direction, as other colleges were in another. But the East Gate and the adjoining posterns were open in time of peace, and the country had not yet gone to war, with its sons biting and devouring each other. When John Dacre and his father met, the old Doctor took care they should pass on opposite sides of the way. When Kitty and Mrs. Judy encountered Jack, they could not believe that it was any forfeiture of their pledge to exchange a brief greeting with him, just to see with their own eyes, and hear with their own ears, that he was well, and not faring very badly, cast adrift and flung on his own resources as he was, save for the good offices of the Waltons.

He always put the best face on his condition, and asserted that he was doing right well but for his separation from his family. And he would ask, how was his father faring? Was he escaping a touch of the ague? And could he in these days of plaguey interruptions, get on with his edition of Thucydides?

It always thrilled the hearts of the girl and the woman to see how tall and manly their Jackie was growing.

(To be continued.)

THE OLD HOME.

THERE are voices in the meadows, that lie along the stream,
The happy laugh of children that stirs my waking dream;
And the birds are calling, calling from the elm-trees gnarled and old,
Where the slanting sunbeam arrows have set a crown of gold;
But the voices and the laughter are all in vain for me,
For they touch the chords of sorrow, and the notes of memory.

The twilight hours are full to me of forms I used to know,
And the tender loving faces of the old home long ago;
And the laughter of the children seems to my dreaming ears
To be echoes of the voices that I loved in bygone years;
And I cannot see the sunbeams, for my eyes are dim, and yet
I had thought that years would soften, and in time I should forget.

The house where the long tree shadows slanted across the lawn,
Where the birds at my ivied window called to me every morn;
Where, in the quiet country lanes, the creaking wains went by,
And the yellow cornfields up the slope fronted the clear blue sky.
Perhaps I never loved them then; but it seems, as I sit alone,
That childhood never knows its joy until that joy be flown.

Where are the happy children who played with me long ago,
When we leaned above the old grey bridge, and watched the river flow?
Or wandered home at sunset, when the path was white with rime,
To sit around the fire, in the happy winter-time?
Ah! they are scattered far and wide in many a clime to-day,
But childish memories are the link that binds our hearts away.

The little green elm-clustered copse, where the rooks caw soon and late,
And where the yellow kingcups grow, below the old farm gate—
But my thoughts fade with the sunset, the light dies from the room,
And the golden path of childhood grows fainter in the gloom.
Ah! though new faces should be there—old landmarks past and gone—
I would that I might see again the house where I was born.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARUM LILY.—Certainly you should put some offering in the plate or bag sent round for the purpose before presenting yourself amongst the communicants. Those who are very poor are not required to give beyond their means by the blessed and bountiful Lord to whom the little offering is made. He never "gathers where He does not straw."

GRACEFUL BIRD should be guided by her mother's wishes entirely as regards the acceptance of presents "from her brother's great friend." We imagine that our correspondent is a somewhat tall and well-fledged bird, being described as "graceful," and therefore beyond the age when treated as a mere child. Little fledglings without tails could scarcely be described as "graceful." They are quaintly pretty, a phrase which you have outgrown, and must accept certain restrictions and responsibilities that your increasing years bring with them.

NINE YEARS' SUBSCRIBER could play with exquisite taste and with good execution without stretching and dragging about her hands, and so ruining their appearance.

B. E. C.—The name and address of the hon. sec. of the Christian Blind Relief Society are—Mr. T. Clarke, 59, Burdett Road, E. The committee meet at his residence. The secretary of the London Bible and Domestic Female Mission, which provides Bibles to poor women, may be addressed at 2, Adelphi Terrace, Strand, W.C. The secretaries of the British and Foreign Bible Society are the Rev. J. Sharp and the Rev. W. M. Paull, 146, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

A PRESBYTERIAN, if a minor, should certainly be guided by her mother's wishes, and even if she have attained her majority she ought to consult her. If she approve of the idea of including their minister in their discussions, well and good. For ourselves we do not accept the responsibility of decided questions of this description, on which there is a diversity of opinion amongst God-fearing people, and especially when appealed to, irrespective of a parent's opinion and wishes on really non-essential questions of personal conduct and practice.

M. R. KIRKMAN.—We thank you for favouring us with suggestions for the improvement of our magazine; we have many would-be assistant editors.

MOI-MEME.—We suppose that the liquid preparation for cleansing the teeth, to which you refer as having appeared in an early number, is the following (by "Medicus"): "A teaspoonful of myrrh, ditto of tincture of bark, added to 2 oz. of rosewater," to be used when the gums are soft and disposed to bleed. "A permanganate of potash mouth wash is made with rosewater and a few grains of the former salt dissolved in it," and is recommended as an antitoothache wash, a little charcoal powder being used afterwards to get rid of the stain produced. A good powder which also strengthens the gums is a mixture of chalk, borax, and myrrh.

MUSCOVITE MOSCOW.—A pure bred pug-dog is of a yellowish or light fawn colour mixed with black, the snout being black, the muzzle broad, the skin very loose, the tail well curled, and the shoulders and chest broad. Feed the dog once a day, in the evening, with boiled Indian meal or dog biscuits, and once a day a few rabbit or chicken bones that will not injure his teeth. Some crusts sopped in a little broth or gravy would make a change for him. But avoid giving him meat and fat and greasy things.

CHAPTER III.

Machinery just meant
To give thy soul its bent,
Try thee and turn thee forth,
Sufficiently impressed."

Robert Browning.

MRS. STACEY had some difficulty in meeting with a house to suit her requirements, but at last took one in Meadowfield, a village a mile and a half from Rochdale. It could boast but of little attraction in the style of its architecture, but a lovely wisteria and a very prolific cluster rose tree had agreed together to beautify the front, whilst a grape-vine, with its sheltering leaves, and a clinging ivy, with its graceful trails, undertook the adornments of other portions, a Cape jasmine and a honeysuckle making the porch their special protégé. A fair-sized grass-plot with flower beds separated the house from the road, and at the back, flowers, fruit, and vegetables lived more or less in social contact, as in old-fashioned country gardens.

On a day in the following summer, Ruth Stacey paced up and down the railway station at Rochdale, awaiting an over-due train, but her patience was fully rewarded when it arrived, bringing her friend Muriel on a visit to Meadowfield. After a warm greeting the girls ensconced themselves in a primitive-looking cab, and were borne out of the town at a jog-trot pace. The road was not new to Muriel, for a walk to the pretty village nestling on the side of one of the hills that partially encircled Rochdale had been always a favourite.

"How well I remember mounting this hill!" she said. "Every thing looks just the same; here is the one shop that used to amuse me so—it might have the very same things in the window—nothing looks altered."

"Indeed," replied Ruth, "we have advanced a little. Look at the nice new vicarage there, across the green—we're quite proud of it. Here is our house, and the dear mother in the porch, on the look-out for us."

As the cab drew up Connie came running down to the gate to give "darling Muriel" a vehement embrace; and though the welcome accorded her by Mrs. Stacey was of a less demonstrative nature, it was none the less a loving one.

Early the next day Ruth took Muriel off to a chosen haunt of hers which she designated her "wilderness study." Taking the path by the side of a miniature ravine which ran up to a small wood, they came to a stone arch at the head of a streamlet. Ruth seated herself on the low parapet, whilst Muriel stood looking down upon the water lilies, resting their white or yellow blossoms on their large glossy leaves.

"I like to bring a book here," Ruth said; "it is so peaceful. You see that small iron gate? That leads into the grounds of Hawthorn Glen; but very few people come up here."

"That is where that blind gentleman lives, is it not? A literary man, I think you said."

"More scientific than literary, I believe, but I have not yet spoken to Mr. Stanley. Poor man! he only lost his sight a few years ago. Mrs. Stanley called on us; she is a very pleasant, homely little lady."

"Isn't it trying that I have not yet got anything to do in the way of earning my living?" Ruth went on, after a few minutes' pause. "I begin quite to despair."

At this moment the gate Ruth had pointed out was opened, and a child's invalid carriage was seen, attended by a middle-aged nurse.

"That is little May Stanley, the Stanleys' grandchild; such a dear little thing! She is nearly seven years old, though she is so small. She has something the matter with her spine."

"Poor child! May we speak to her?" inquired Muriel.

"Oh, yes. I always do," answered Ruth; and she went forward and stooped to kiss the sweet child face, saying, "Here is a lady who would like to kiss you, May."

The child slightly turned her head to receive Muriel's proffered kiss, and gave a pleased look at the kind face bent over her.

"Let us stop here, nurse," she said. "There, now I can see the dear water lilies."

Muriel, seating herself on the stump of a tree by the side of the little girl, began telling her of some of the poor young sufferers she often went to see in the Children's Hospital, and how much good it would do some of them if they could be in a nice home in the country.

"Do you know my papa, then?" asked May. "He goes to see the poor children in the hospital sometimes. He says seeing his little May not well makes him want to help all the poor little things when they're ill, only he can't, for it would take more than all his money."

"Then you live in London, I suppose?"

"No, I live with grandmamma now, because papa's parish is in a part where the houses are built so close to one another that the doctor said I should not get strong there."

"Have you any brothers and sisters?" Muriel inquired.

"No; and papa has nobody but me, for God took mamma to heaven when I was a wee baby. I'm so sorry not to be strong and well, so that I could keep him company."

"I hope you will get stronger when you get bigger, darling," said Muriel, her heart filled with tenderness for the motherless little invalid. "And even if you never get very strong, you may be a great comfort to

"How can I? He always has a sad look in his eyes when he is talking to me, even when he is talking fun," replied May, with a very pathetic look in her eyes, now raised to Muriel's face.

How acute the observation even a sick child will learn to make of the expression of the faces around Muriel had already noticed, and she wondered little that the father had been unable to hide his sorrow from his child.

Ruth having managed to capture some of the lilies by the aid of her parasol, gave them to May, and she and Muriel continued their walk. After reaching the summit of the hill, and enjoying the charming panoramic view, they returned by another path to the main road. As they drew near the principal gates of Hawthorn Glen, a woman ran from the lodge to open one, and a tall gentleman with a long white beard stepped out, and walked along, apparently without fear, though he now and then touched the pathway in front of him with his walking-stick.

"That is Mr. Stanley," whispered Ruth.

Presently he stood still, and waited until the girls approached.

"Am I right in thinking it is Miss Stacey's voice I hear?" he said.

"Yes," answered Ruth, rather astonished he should recognise it.

"You are surprised. I heard you speak last Sunday as we were coming out of church, and I never forget a voice I have heard distinctly. But is Mrs. Stacey with you?"

"No, Miss Egerton, a friend visiting us," replied Ruth, introducing Muriel.

"I was going to make my apologies to your mamma for not calling on her before. I hope to do so soon, but though a blind man, I'm a busy one, Miss Stacey."

As they walked along Mr. Stanley informed them that he was going to the Vicarage to see if he could get any help. He was just placed in an awkward dilemma by his amanuensis, who also acted as secretary, being obliged to leave him suddenly.

"Unfortunately," continued Mr. Stanley, "I am in the midst of preparing a scientific paper to be read at the Royal Institution, and I need a gentleman who is not only sufficiently acquainted with Latin, French, and German, to look up notes in those languages, but one who has some slight knowledge of natural science. So you see it is not an easy matter for me to get anyone at a moment's notice."

Muriel gave Ruth a significant glance, but seeing that she hesitated to speak, plucked up her courage.

"I think I know one who could be of use to you, if you would be willing to try her."

"A lady? Well, why not? they are getting very clever nowadays. Pray, who is the lady—yourself?" said Mr. Stanley, smiling.

"Oh, no, I mean Miss Stacey."

"Miss Stacey! I did not know I had so learned a young lady neighbour."

Ruth recovering from her timidity, told Mr. Stanley how she had been engaged a few months before her father's death in translating some German books on natural history for him, and how glad she would be if she could be of any help until a more suitable amanuensis was found.

"Well, really, Miss Stacey," Mr. Stanley said, "I am inclined to accept your offer if Mrs. Stacey approves. If you will allow me I will go home with you now, instead of going to see our vicar."

After a conversation with Mrs. Stacey and a few more inquiries concerning Ruth's capabilities, it was arranged that she should at once begin going for a few hours daily to read to Mr. Stanley and make such notes as he might require. This ended after a fortnight's trial in his being so thoroughly satisfied with the intelligent and earnest manner in which she set herself to work, that he engaged her for a permanency, giving her very liberal remuneration.

"It is all your doings, Muriel," said Ruth, when she brought home the joyful news.

Muriel and Connie generally accompanied Ruth on her way to Hawthorn Glen, and it so happened that they frequently met May and her nurse, and prolonged their walk to have a chat with her. So fond did the little invalid get of the kind lady with "happy eyes" that if a day passed without a meeting, it was quite a disappointment. Muriel had been invited to luncheon two or three times by Mrs. Stanley; for the child's sake in the first instance, but both she and Ruth very quickly became favourites with her and her husband. It was within a week of Muriel's return home after her long visit, when Mrs. Stanley, always brisk and active, came in with more than her usual animation.

"My dear Miss Egerton," she said, "I have come on purpose to see you. The post brought me such news this morning! You remember I told you my son had been recommended to put our little pet under the care of a doctor who had been very successful with one or two similar cases. Well, he tells me he has made final arrangements with this gentleman that May shall be at his house for a few months. At first my son hesitated because of the locality, but finding the house is a large, old-fashioned one, standing in a really good-sized garden, and being very prepossessed with both the doctor and his wife, he has no longer any hesitation. One thing the doctor stipulated; that is, that his daughter, who is particularly fond of and clever at nursing, is to have the principal charge of May, our nurse being also there."

"Oh, Mrs. Stanley, you don't mean my father, do you?" ejaculated Muriel, with heightened colour.

"Yes, my dear, I do, and I look upon it as quite providential. May is half wild with delight, and we are all very pleased."

"It is kind of you to say so," said Muriel, "and does it not seem as if everything were helping me on to my heart's desire?"

So it came to pass that Muriel's journey home was made in company with May and the nurse, and her first introduction to the Rev. Frank Stanley took place at the station, where her mother had come with him to meet them. At the end of the time specified by Dr. Egerton May had so far benefited by the treatment that he considered it better for her to return to Meadowfield. During her residence at his house, her father's frequent visits there were a matter of course. But May's departure made no difference in this respect. Was this out of gratitude alone?

We will be impertinent enough to listen to part of a tête-à-tête between the Rev. Frank Stanley and Muriel. Of a former day's conversation we say nothing, seeing it had been somewhat of the nature of a confession.

"Indeed, Frank, I think if I had had any idea when May came to us of how I should be induced to relinquish my cherished plans, I should have said it was impossible. Even now a feeling comes over me—can it be right?"

"Our plans are not always God's plans for us, dearest."

"No; but all seemed working together to fit me to carry mine out."

"All has been 'working together' no doubt, Muriel, to fit you for this unthought-of future. It was not ordinary home-girl life that would have fitted you so well to give a mother's care to a little invalid."

"I don't think that would have been a difficult thing for me, Frank, for your sake, even if I did not love her for her own sake."

A year later and the village of Meadowfield is en fête, for to-day the new vicar has brought home his bride.

Again Ruth and Muriel are exchanging confidences, this time in the Vicarage garden.

"After all," Ruth says, "I'm not sure that we have not attained the best of our desires, though they appeared thwarted. Certainly I'm not likely to become a professor," she adds, laughing; "but I'm one in a secondhand way. And you, Muriel; well, your little May will need good nursing yet."

Muriel looks fondly at the child, who walks with feeble steps, holding her father's hand, proud of her newly-acquired powers.

"Yes, Ruth, I think we have. At any rate, I know I have my heart's desire," answers Muriel, glancing at her husband with a glad light in her "happy eyes."

[THE END.]

HOW WORKING GIRLS LIVE IN LONDON.

By NANETTE MASON.

PART II.

ABOUT their place of residence a considerable number of the working girls of London have no difficulty whatever. They live with their parents, or find shelter under the hospitable roof of those on whom they have family claims.

As a rule such girls are fortunate. They are under watchful eyes—which is a good thing, though not always appreciated—and have those over them who are entitled to ask an account of their comings and goings. Friends are already provided; there is a fireside circle ready made, and in trouble and anxiety they have those about them in whom they can confide. A girl living at home has always somebody to espouse her interests; like one we met a short time back, who had six brothers, and when her young man tried to back out of his promise to marry, the six brothers went to him and threatened that if he did they would cut him into small pieces.

A marked advantage that girls often possess who stay with relations is, that they are not called upon to provide entirely for their own support. To find oneself in butter is not so difficult if bread come to us in the shape of presentation loaves. Not unfrequently they are set to work merely to keep themselves in clothes and out of mischief, and if they are sometimes made to contribute towards the expense of board and lodging, these payments are seldom more than a fraction of what they would be were they in the position of strangers.

This is pleasant enough for the girls themselves, but no one can say it is a good thing for the community. It tends to reduce wages, because those girls needing less are content to work for less. In this way life is made a harder matter for all who have none but themselves to look to for support.

Next to living at home, the simplest mode of existence is that in lodgings. It is far from an ideal form of life for a young woman, but there is not much of the ideal about London, and we must describe things as we find them. A girl with no friends in town comes up from the country, say, to a situation in a shop, and she drifts into lodging life by necessity, perhaps, more than from choice. Girls, too, who are London born not unfrequently find their way into lodgings, having had to leave home through no fault of their own. Their mother may be dead and their father have introduced a stepmother to whom their presence in the house is unwelcome. Quarrels, too, are sometimes at the bottom of their leaving home, and now and then we meet with a girl in lodgings who has been enticed away by people influenced by motives of which the less said the better.

Life in lodgings has freedom about it. The restraints are few, and seldom more severe than that which our friend Lucy encountered when her landlady hearing her singing—Lucy is always at it—called upstairs and said, "Stop that bawling!"

Taking in lodgers is an immense industry, no doubt because it is a convenient way of eking out a small income. In the London Post Office Directory lodging-houses and boarding-houses are classed together, and there are about eighteen hundred of them. This, however, fails to give any idea of the actual number, for a great many people—the majority in fact—who keep lodgers and take in boarders would never think of inserting their names in the directory under this heading. Forty advertisements of apartments to let taken at random from the daily papers were recently compared with the list in the Directory, and out of the forty only two gave addresses which appeared in the Directory.

In lodgings an independent girl sometimes lives all alone and keeps company with none but herself. But to live alone is dreary unless one has at command considerable mental resources and a world of philosophy, not to speak of its being dangerous. It is all very well to talk about the advantages of solitude, but there is no question about its being a good thing that nature has made girls disposed to fly in flocks.

Union is not only strength but economy, and even from the point of view of making the most of scanty wages girls are sensible in clubbing together as they do in twos and threes for the use of the same apartment. Sometimes we find sisters living together in this way; in other cases they are friends hailing from the same country town, who have come to London together to encourage each other in the struggle for existence.

It is often a difficult matter to get suitable lodgings, especially for girls. Many people who have rooms to let object to women folk on any terms whatever. A standing objection is that they give more trouble than men; then, having narrower means, they are less liberal in their settlements, and have too keen an eye on every item in the weekly bill. Other reasons, too, will be found suggesting themselves to every landlady of prudence.

The recommendation of friends is the best thing on which to go in taking lodgings, and there are Christian and benevolent institutions from whom girls can now ask advice in the matter. Let them beware of relying wholly on their own judgment, for there are many dangerous lodging-houses, the characteristics of which might not at first be recognised by the inexperienced.

"It is impossible," says a writer in the Leisure Hour, "to be too particular about the character of the inmates of the lodging-house in which one purposes to stay. A word on this point is enough to the wise, but that the word may be rendered more emphatic, we shall supplement it by an anecdote told by Mr. James Nasmyth, the famous engineer, in his biography, about his first coming to London.

"On arriving from Edinburgh, quite a lad, he was accompanied by his father. The two looked for lodgings for young Nasmyth in the neighbourhood of Waterloo Road, so as to be near the engineering work in which he was to be employed. One of the houses they visited was situated immediately behind the Surrey Theatre. It seemed a nice, tidy house, and the father appeared to have a liking for it. 'But when we were introduced,' says the son, 'into the room where I was to sleep, he observed an ultra-gay bonnet lying on the bed, with flashy bright ribbons hanging from it. This sight seemed to alter his ideas, and he did not take the lodging, but took another where there was no such bonnet. . . I afterwards asked him why he had not taken that nice lodging? 'Well,' he said, 'did you see that ultra-gay bonnet lying on the bed? I think that looked suspicious.'"

Even when we are satisfied as to the character of the people living in the house, there are many points remaining that call for the exercise of judgment. In taking lodgings one must be all eyes, ears, and nose. The appearance of the house from the street should be noted, and it is folly, unless driven by sheer necessity, so much as to knock at the door of a house the windows of which look as if they would be the better of being cleaned, or the blinds and curtains of which seem as if they should, long ago, have paid a visit to the washtub. It is true that a lean purse cannot command a palace, but poverty is a lame excuse for dirt.

A man who had an extensive experience of London lodgings, hit on a plan, which he claimed to be infallible, for discovering the amount of attention paid to cleanliness. When he went prowling round looking for apartments, he always made up an excuse for asking such an unexpected question, and said, "I should be glad to have a look at your frying-pan."

That was the test he applied. A greasy, dirty frying-pan, he had found by experience, indicated general dust and disorder, both upstairs and down, and the sight of it saved him the trouble of further investigation.

The distance of lodgings from one's work is of considerable importance. Cheap railway tickets to suburban districts have done much to send girls farther afield than of old; but to many even these small fares are an impossible expenditure. Those who are obliged by their occupations to be late of reaching home should look upon a near-at-hand place of residence as a necessity.

It goes without saying that the cost of lodgings varies with the locality and the accommodation. Lodging-house keepers, like other people, know their value, and if you want to be comfortable you must pay for it. A humble street off an East-end thoroughfare furnishes, perhaps, the extreme of cheapness, just as the other extreme is to be found in the streets off Piccadilly. A working girl who has to cut her coat according to her cloth will find that not much is to be got for three shillings and sixpence a week—a box of a room maybe at the top of a house, cold in winter, hot in summer, and with little furniture, save a bedstead, a table, and a chair.

In connection with rent, it ought to be pointed out to girls who have little to spend and want to get good value for their money, that a neatly-kept house is as a rule cheaper to live in than one managed in a slovenly fashion. People who have not observed much often think the reverse, and jump to the conclusion that when a house has not much care bestowed upon it, the landlady can afford and is willing to let apartments at low rates. It is not so. The character of slovenly landladies is this: what they lack in tidiness they make up for in audacity.

Girls who take rather dismal lodgings may do much themselves in the way of beautifying them. If a room is bare a very little taste will often make it bright. It is wonderful what girls sometimes do in this way, and with such simple materials as a flower in a flowerpot, or a few engravings cut from an illustrated newspaper, and it is worth observing that such efforts are in a woman's line of usefulness. Those who have to earn their own living cannot be expected to have much leisure, or energy either, for housework, but domestic instincts should not be entirely neglected. A girl is quite wrong who thinks it will make her an old woman before her time if she tries in the narrow sphere of lodgings to act as a model housekeeper.

In taking lodgings it is well to have a clear understanding—and understandings should always be in writing—as to charges, not only for the room, but for "extras." There should be no chance of a disagreement as to the price of gas or coals or anything else.

When meals are taken in lodgings, one of two plans may be followed. The landlady may supply whatever is required and charge only her outlay, or meals may be set down in her bill at a fixed price. The latter plan certainly pleases the landlady the best, as she makes most profit out of it; the lodger gains nothing by it, and, in fact, loses one of the delights of independence when she ceases to have command of stores which she can call her own. The most economical way is certainly for everyone to do her marketing for herself.

Girls who worked in lodgings at their business and had a little property there in the shape of tools and apparatus—a sewing machine, for example—were several years ago liable to a great hardship. Their effects might be seized to help to satisfy the claims of the superior landlord, even though they had paid their own rent regularly. This very unfair state of things has been done away with, and a lodger who pays her way need no longer fear having her "furniture, goods and chattels" disposed of to pay a debt with which she has nothing in the world to do.

The law now runs that "if a superior landlord levies a distress on any furniture, goods, or chattels of any lodger for arrears of rent due to him by his immediate tenant, the lodger may serve the superior landlord or the bailiff or any person employed by him to levy the distress with a declaration to the effect that the immediate tenant—that is to say, the lodger's landlord or landlady—has no right of property or beneficial interest in the furniture, goods, or chattels so distrained or threatened to be distrained upon, and that such property belongs to or is in the lawful possession of the lodger. The lodger must also state how much rent, if any, is due by her to her landlord or landlady, and may pay the superior landlord or the bailiff any sum so due."

If the superior landlord, in the face of this notice, is so foolish as to persist in levying the distress, he is guilty of an illegal distress, and the lodger may recover her goods by application to a stipendiary magistrate or two justices.

Working girl lodgers, it is to be feared, however, are much more frequently behind-hand with their rent than their landladies. With the small wages that ordinarily prevail, a girl, once she gets in debt to the landlady—and the first steps in that direction are remarkably easy—has often the utmost difficulty in getting out again. It is an uphill fight indeed, in which few come off victorious.

We remember well a girl we once met in lodgings who had not taken to heart the golden maxim, "Pay as you go, and what you're worth you'll know." She got behind a week's rent. The next week's rent she paid. The week following she satisfied the landlady with fair promises, and so the one week owing became two. The fourth week she paid, after which she missed another week, and thus it went on, till at last she was several months behind. The landlady, a simple, good-hearted soul, was gulled by her plausible excuses, and entertained no suspicions that Mabel would play her a trick instead of settling her now considerable bill.

One fine day Mabel announced that she was going out of town, her employer having given her a short holiday. She took away—if we remember rightly, it was a box and a bag, but she left in charge of the landlady two considerable sized brown paper parcels marked with her own name and "with care" written conspicuously in the left-hand top corner. These parcels, she said, might as well lie, if the landlady would kindly permit it, till her return.

Week passed after week, but Mabel never came back. The landlady at last thought she would open the parcels, which she had comforted herself by estimating as good security for the unpaid rent. We were with her when she did so. The contents of both were much the same—two bricks, fragments of pasteboard boxes, pieces of brown paper, and a dozen or so of old newspapers.

In such shabby actions people too often take refuge when they begin to flounder in the quagmire of debt. So, girls who live in lodgings, whatever your income, let there be impressed on the minds of all of you the maxim which Mabel forgot: "Pay your landlady what you owe, and what you're worth you'll know."

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER IV.

"'Tis pleasant sure to see one's self in print."

With eager eyes Evelyn watched for her first proofs. Her book was to be hurried through the press that she might see it complete before the projected departure of herself, Mrs. and Miss Lancaster, to Switzerland early in August. There was so little of it, it would not take long to set up, the publisher had assured her.

One morning at breakfast-time the anxiously-expected packet arrived. Evelyn seized it with kindling eyes and broke the wrapper. Yes! there were her own verses on the long strips of paper.

"Your poems? Oh, do let me see!"

cried Dottie, rushing round to peep over her cousin's shoulder. "How lovely they look! You needn't push me away, Evelyn. But what is this?"

'Far, far and wide resound amain
The tuneful snores of Arcady.'

And Dottie burst into a peal of laughter.

"How stupid you are, Dot," replied Evelyn, a little crossly; "can't you see it ought to be shores?" Of course there will be mistakes; there always are in proofs."

The embryo authoress gathered up her papers and departed to her own little sanctum in mid-breakfast.

"Dot! Dot!" said Mrs. Lancaster, reprovingly, "your spirits run away with you, my dear; you have quite put your cousin out."

"She'll soon come round again, mother dear," responded the imperturbable Dottie; "it did look so funny I really could not help laughing."

"Well, she is a very clever girl, and in the main a very good one; I will say that for her," observed Mrs. Lancaster; "but her uncle doesn't like this publishing at all. 'You ought to exercise more control over her,' says he to me as plain as plain can be the other morning when he called, and you were having your debating society upstairs. But I told him straight out that I couldn't do it; she's too old and too set in her ways to be said by me. I did show him her 'Lines to a Faded Flower,' that she copied out because I liked them so, but he pished and pshawed like anything, and I'm afraid he and Evelyn didn't get on at all well afterwards, for he went straight out of the house with a slam of the door and never so much as a 'good-morning' to me. These people that are so clever in their intellects seem often a little short in their tempers," moralised Mrs. Lancaster. "Now there's Algy, dear fellow! you see he did nothing much at college, but he is the easiest and sweetest of tempers to get on with I ever did come across."

Meanwhile Evelyn was feasting in blissful solitude upon her proof sheets. She had thoughtfully provided herself beforehand with an advertisement cut out of a magazine, of Macniven and Cameron's pens, a delightful advertisement that shows the tyro in publishing how to correct the many and manifold errors to which printers are liable. She had studied beforehand all the mystic signs and methods of correction, and now was hard at it. First, she flew with energy at the downright blunders that made nonsense of her verses, such as snores for shores, tight for light, morality for mortality; then, when these were deeply scored out, she had breath and leisure for the slighter errors of quotation marks, punctuation, dashes, and the like. It was a charming task, and a couple of hours soon passed away while she was engaged in it.

In the delight of seeing one's thoughts for the first time in print, there is surely something deeper than the gratification of mere foolish vanity. In the printed page there lies the symbol of that intercourse with the outer world, the world outside ourselves, that is a need of our spirits. What constitutes the charm in sharing the enthusiasm of a mighty multitude of which we form a part? Is it not this participation in the thought of humanity? We are not isolated atoms, but parts of a mighty whole, and whatever the barrier may be that sunders us from our fellows, there is an imperious need, now and again, to break it down.

Evelyn congratulated herself repeatedly that she had not complied with her uncle's wish, for her poems looked far better in print than they had done in manuscript, and as she murmured them low to herself in lilting lines, the poor young authoress thought, "These must and will win a hearing—some at least will appreciate them."

Leaning back in her chair, pen in hand, she lost herself in dreaming over the reviews there would be, the second edition (possibly) called for, the letters she would receive from grateful and delighted readers. "Yes, the author's life is worth living," she said, aloud; and then she read through the poem entitled "The Lark," which, as it was about the best in the book, we may quote as a specimen of her powers:—

Fain would I soar but that I cannot rise.

My wings refuse to bear me; yet it seems

I needs must strive to reach the far-off skies,

The fields of air, the region of my dreams.

With panting heart I sigh, and look, and long

To quit the narrow bounds where life is spent;

To pour my heart forth in ascending song,

Then sink awhile to rest, and satisfied content.

I have a nest among the quiet grass, Right soft and warm: and dear it is to me;

None do I know that can mine own surpass—

The nest is sweetest of all nests that be.

I love it well, nor lightly would I roam,

Yet, there enfolded, would not always stay;

Constant my heart is to my little home,

And yet it breaks to soar far upwards towards the day.

Will it be ever thus? or shall I find Some heaven-sent moment when my wings are free,

When I can taste the ecstasy combined

Of upward flight, and earth-born ministry?

Then would my lot indeed be fully blest,

Then would my restless heart for aye be still,

When both in turn were mine—the happy nest,

And Heaven to sing in at mine own sweet will!

Evelyn had written these lines out of the fulness of her heart, when the contrast between the comfort of her home, the kindness of her relations on the one hand, and her unsatisfied longings on the other, was more than usually keen. It was the best of her poems, just because it was sincere, while many others expressed emotion that she only knew at second-hand.

The package bore the word "Immediate," and Evelyn knew she dare not retain the proof sheets. She went out herself when she was quite sure she had corrected them to the uttermost detail, and posted them in the nearest post-office. No other hand might be trusted with such precious freight.

The same experience recurred for many days, with but brief intervals free from the delightful occupation of receiving proofs and correcting them. Then came a blank; and at last, one enchanting and never-to-be-forgotten morning, the carrier left a great package in the thickest of brown paper, with tenpence to pay.

There it was! a thin (a very thin) volume bound in white parchment, with a decorative design on the cover representing a gilt crescent moon and a few stars. The words "Day-dreams, by Espérance," were sketched diagonally across in a very vague and poetic manner. The paper was as unusually thick as the book was unusually thin, and the rivulet of print filtered through immense shores of margin. Evelyn, in the seventh heaven of bliss, instantly presented a copy to Mrs. Lancaster, another to Dottie, and then, in the fulness of her heart, began with the upper servants.

"I don't know whether you'd like a copy of my poems, Ellis?" she observed to the head parlourmaid.

That usually imperturbable personage relaxed into a smile and a look of wonder, as she said, "I'm sure I'm very much obliged, Miss."

Both smile and look of wonder were delicious to Evelyn, who went on with her presentations till she began to see her first consignment of copies would not go very far at that rate. The whole household was soon supplied with copies of "Day-dreams"; they lay thick as leaves about the servants' hall. Let us hope the domestics read them; at any rate they showed them to the tradesmen who called that day, with amusement and pride evenly mingled, and much surprise that Miss Hope had chosen a cover that would soil so quickly.

Then followed the gifts to friends. On the next session of the debating society every member was formally presented with a copy. Evelyn might be sure of readers here! Only, unfortunately, nearly every one had read the poems in manuscript, or heard them recited at penny readings and literary societies. The kind vicar, who took a fatherly and an over-partial interest in Evelyn's efforts, was not forgotten; but when it became evident that every member of her large circle of friends expected the offering as a matter of course, the author demurred.

"I have given away thirty-two copies already," she complained to Dottie; "and did you notice how pointedly Mrs. Mills said this afternoon to auntie, she had not had the pleasure of reading it yet? Why can't she buy the book? It's only three and ninepence with the discount off."

But the last thing your friend will do for you, as Evelyn had yet to discover, is to buy the book you have written. He would gladly lavish money on you if you needed it; he has plenty to spare; but he will not devote three and ninepence to reducing the numbers of your first edition, and lending you glory in the eyes of local booksellers.

If you want him to read your book, he reflects, you ought to give it him; for (so it seems to him) you can, of course, command unlimited copies free of all cost to yourself. This is one of the incidental circumstances of an author's career.

But how delightful it all was! The topic of "Day-dreams" was the most charming that could present itself to the young author's ears. The oft-repeated congratulation never palled; she found herself listening for it whenever she met anyone whom she had not seen since the book was published. If any of her friends who had read the poems would discuss them with her, she kindled into animation instantly. But such friends were few and far between. Undiscriminating praise was rather the rule in Evelyn's circle, and on the whole it was very delicious, though an occasional indication that they who praised had not read, rather disturbed the author's complacency. She had numerous letters of thanks in return for the books she had sent by post, but they all ran: "I am sure I shall greatly enjoy reading the poems." All in the future tense! Why, oh why! could not the recipients have waited a day or two, read the volume through, and sent a discriminating criticism (laudatory, of course) with their thanks? This could not but occur to Evelyn, but it seemed the rule to postpone reading the poems until the thanksgiving letter had been sent.

All this delightful little stir and excitement rather diverted Evelyn's mind from a coming event that filled Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie with anticipation—a projected visit to Switzerland, where Algy was to meet them, and after which he proposed to return to England with his relatives, to begin his career at the Bar. Evelyn scarcely cared, intensely as she loved Switzerland, to leave the little scene of her triumphs.

One day, shortly before the date fixed for their departure, Dottie received a note at breakfast time, which caused her to exclaim:—

"Bertha Maxwell wants us to go and spend a day with her on the Thames, Evelyn. She is longing to see you, she says, and talk over 'Day-dreams.' She proposes to read your poems aloud, while I row. Here is the letter."

Bertha Maxwell, already introduced at the "Mayflower Club" as the plain, delicate girl who adored Evelyn, was staying at a village up the river with her parents for a few weeks. The prospect was alluring to the authoress, never sated with praise, and she accepted the invitation with alacrity.

The weather was lovely; Evelyn was welcomed with effusion, and the three girls started forth after luncheon for a long afternoon and evening on the beautiful Thames. "Day-dreams" was safely in Bertha's pocket.

"What a comfort I can row!" reflected Dottie. She was a good-natured girl, who heartily admired her cousin, but she was getting just a little weary of "Day-dreams." Not so Bertha.

Dottie took both oars and sculled vigorously. Evelyn undertook to steer. Bertha drew forth the beloved volume, and in her plaintive, musical voice began the well-known lines. The authoress abandoned herself to the delight of the moment. It was an exquisite August day; the river gleamed like silver, a breeze ruffled its surface, the trees bent their wealth of foliage down into the water, the summer warmth made the cool rush down stream delicious to the dreaming senses. To recline like this, drinking in the beauties of nature, to hear one's own poetry sympathetically read the while, to revel in vague visions of future brilliancy and success; what could be more enchanting? Evelyn was absorbed in the ecstasy of the moment, when—bang—thump! came a violent collision, mingled with a sharp masculine exclamation. All three girls started in terror at the shock.

Dottie took in the situation at a glance. Their boat had run straight into a punt moored against the bank, from which a gentleman had been serenely fishing. Evelyn had absently tugged with her right arm, regardless of consequences. No damage was done to either craft, but the fisherman was obviously very angry at so gratuitous a blunder, and glared through his pince-nez at them as he busied himself with rod and line. Oh, horror! it was no other than Evelyn's uncle, Mr. Austin Hope.

As this fact dawned on both parties, good breeding struggled with dismay on their side, annoyance on his.

"Well, Evelyn, my dear, you have frightened away the fishes in good earnest. What a remarkable coincidence—a coincidence in more senses than one!"

Evelyn hastened to explain the fact of her appearance on the scene, and to express wonder at her uncle being there.

"Oh, I often come down here for a day's fishing, with a favourite book," he rejoined. "But mind you don't get one of these collisions in mid-stream, or it would not be so slight a matter, unless you can all swim. Excuse my asking if you can manage a boat? Why doesn't one of you steer?"

"I was steering, uncle, but——"

"I was reading aloud to Evelyn some of the poems we all love so dearly," put in poor little Bertha, hoping this would smooth matters down; and she offered the volume, with a smile, to Mr. Hope. Evelyn wished she could sink through the floor of the boat. Save us from our friends! Mr. Hope took it, glared for one brief moment at the ornamental cover, and handed it ceremoniously back to Bertha.

"I quite understand now why my niece could not attend to her steering," he replied. "I should suggest that she read aloud, if you must have reading, and that somebody else took command of the tiller. The effect possibly would not be so engrossing in that case. At any rate, pray don't get spilt, poems or no poems, or you will find your 'day-dreams' come to rather a rough waking."

It was of no use. He would not appreciate, or be anything but extremely unkind, thought Evelyn, bitterly, while, with the volume packed well out of sight, the trio rowed away.

Mr. Hope watched them with a curious little feeling of compunction, as the long narrow boat with its pretty load shot from his sight. He always seemed to get "across" with Evelyn, yet in his way he was fond of his brother's only daughter. "I was obliged to speak plainly to the little goose, or the whole three of them would have been in the Thames directly," he reflected. "When vanity's at stake a woman is blind and deaf to everything else. 'Day-dreams' indeed!"

VARIETIES.

THE DIGNITY OF ART.

John Crome, the landscape painter, "Old Crome," as he is affectionately called, died in 1821. On the day of his death he charged his eldest son, who was sitting by his bed, never to forget the dignity of art.

"Johnny, my boy," said he, "paint, but paint for fame, and if your subject is only a pigsty, dignify it, Johnny."

JOINED FOR LIFE.—What greater thing is there for two human souls than to feel that they are joined for life—to strengthen each other in all labour, to rest in each other in all sorrow, to minister to each other in all pain, to be one with each other in silent, unspeakable memories at the last parting?—George Eliot.

THREE UNTRUSTWORTHY THINGS.—"There are three things," says Southey, "a wise man will not trust: the wind, the sunshine of an April day, and a woman's plighted faith."

EARLY RISING.

A young woman who had contracted the bad habit of rising very late excused herself in the following way to her friends who upbraided her:—

"Every morning," she said, "before I rise I hear a curious cause pleaded before me between Diligence and Sloth. The one advises me to get up and employ myself about some useful work, the other speaks much in praise of a warm bed and the superiority of rest over toil. In a scrupulous attention to both parties I find a great deal of my time in the morning is passed in bed."

THE BAD HOUSEKEEPER.—The more curious a woman is about her face, the more careless she commonly is about her house.—Ben Jonson.

NOTES ON IRONING.—Smoothing irons are of late invention. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth and James I., large stones, inscribed with texts of Scripture, were used for ironing.

HOW THEY BECAME ENGAGED.

"So you would not take me to be twenty?" said a young lady to her partner, whilst they were looking over some music together one evening. "What would you take me for, then?"

"For better, for worse," replied he, and he was accepted.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

THERE do not seem to be any very great changes to chronicle in the regions of dress, as may be gathered from our illustrations, where everything that has been visible up to the date of the present writing has been carefully noted. In the way of bonnets it hardly seems as if they could grow much smaller, for they are like plates, and very small ones too at present. In fact, in Paris they are known as assiette (or plate) bonnets; and where they are concerned the home milliner may certainly be congratulated, for the trimming employed consists only in one of the large flat "Alsatian bows," and generally nothing else whatsoever—not even strings. The shape as purchased, either in straw or chip, is very peculiar in appearance—not round, but more like a long horse-shoe with a roof on it. The front rests on the head, but the fringe of hair is below it, and sometimes even some loops of velvet or ribbon placed directly under the brim of the bonnet. I cannot say that I think they are very becoming, yet they have a certain style, which with their neat, closely-reefed appearance, will be sure to commend them to the English-woman, who has always had, and always will have, a liking for such little bonnets. Chip is to return to fashion again, as well as fancy straws. But for the summer drawn gauze, crêpe embroidered in gold, and black lace will be the correct materials. The new strings are very short and are rather narrow; they are simply tied in a bow with short ends under the chin, and the ends of the bows are not pinned up. The large Alsatian bows are now being a little relieved by a few flowers which spring from their centre.

During April the mourning for the late Duchess of Cambridge has been so very generally observed that amongst the higher classes, and those who really set the fashion, black has been the only wear, and the prevalence of this mourning will of course retard the purchase of new spring things.

Hats seem to me to be in a state of transition; those illustrated in "Three New Styles in Headgear" are the newest. We have not quite lost the large hat, but it has altered, and the front, though large and much bent about at the edge, according to the will of the owner and her milliner, is made of a transparent gauze or straw, and is very generally unlined, and often bent up into a peak. Some of the new hats are made in two materials, the crown of fancy straw work and the brim of crinoline, or vice-versâ. Some crowns are made of material, while the brims are of chip, and gold and silver cord are both largely used in hats and bonnets. The former, with velvet brims and crowns, are ornamented with lace-straw at the edge.

The new ribbons are extremely wide and handsome in appearance, and equally good in quality. In fact, the ribbon trade, which has been in a very languishing condition for some years, must have taken a new lease of life this season, for never were ribbons more worn in every department of dress. They are generally striped in two halves, a figured and a plain, and a gauze is mixed with silk and velvet, moiré with satin and gros-grain, and brocaded stripes with all of them.

It has turned out a perfect season for flowers, and never, I think, were artificial blooms brought to such a perfection of beauty. The violets, mignonette, mimosa, lilac, spiræa, and sweet pea can hardly be distinguished from the natural blossoms. In the violets especially a vast improvement has been made; and much of this beautiful flower-making is said to be executed in London.

Grasses, too, are very pretty, and are made in all species, variegated and ordinary, as well for mixing with flowers on bonnets and hats. The only metal ornaments one sees at present are the long, narrow buckles called "Empire," which are more popular than pretty in my opinion.

In the way of en tout cas, as they are called, there is plenty of change. None of those seen at present are of the parasol species at all. All show more sense in the design, and are large. The sticks are not quite so long as they were last year, measuring about a yard and three or four inches in length; but the bows of ribbon with which they are all decorated make them look shorter. The ribbon is sometimes three inches wide, and is tied round the handle half way up. Stripes running round in two colours seem to constitute the present novelty, and the handsomest ones are in moiré, with a very superior description of handles or tops, in ivory, coral, or carved wood.

Black stockings are as much worn as ever, though they are now embroidered with colour to match the gown. In black silk, spun silk, and fine thread there are pretty varieties, with half-inch lines up the foot and ankle of colour; or the same in cashmere with silk threads.

The old tale is again revived of the re-establishment of white stockings for this summer, but so far as one can see their advent is a long way off, and black and coloured stockings, in our changeable climate, are far too useful to be lightly superseded.

The new coloured cotton and winsey petticoats, brought out for the season, have nearly all of them a deep flounce of nearly a quarter of a yard round the edge. In silk petticoats, however, two flounces seem more the rule. This change has been very naturally brought about by the leaving off of steels in the dresses, which makes a little holding out desirable.

The most recent idea in underclothing has shown itself in a material called "cotton-wool." This is a lightly but well-woven material of cotton, hailing from Germany, as a kind of opponent to the all-wool natural underclothing from the same country, which was introduced a few years back, and has been very universally adopted. The "reformed wear during the spring. Black moiré seems to be the universal lining, even though the jacket be a coloured one. Most jackets are open, with the fronts thrown back, either to display a waistcoat or the front of the dress. What is called "military blue," which is almost a grey lined with red, seems to be the favourite colour just at present, or else tan colour lined with black moiré. There are not many mantelettes, but they are nevertheless worn, and so are the shoulder capes of fur, which were much used on the cold days this spring. The sleeves of the newest mantelettes are very long, and nearly reach the ground, and all sleeves are inserted very high on the shoulder. Broché and plain and striped velvets are all worn for mantles; the first in small patterns seem the newest.

Large, full round cloaks, gathered at the neck, and full round the shoulders, or put into a yoke, are likely to be much worn. We have illustrated one of these, with a high Elizabethan collar, in this month's illustration, "The New Cloak and Mantle." The same kind of cloak is much in use for little children, with a gathered bonnet to match. They have a quaint and pretty effect, as seen in our little figure.

In the new way of making cottons and thin woollens, the folded bodice, the full sleeve, and the new skirt raised at the side (now so much worn) may be seen. The fancy for the mixture of white and black is shown in the jacket with white moiré lapels in the "New Styles in Headgear." "Princess dresses" are being much worn at present; but they seem to need more trimming now that they are not trained at the back. A velvet sleeveless Gitana or Figaro jacket is often worn with them; many of the very newest bodices are fastened down the back, a very inconvenient old fashion, necessitating the services of a maid. In our illustration it will be seen how very much the bodices of striped everyday gowns are cut on the cross, and the skirts also.

The newest gowns (as I think I stated last month) are absolutely without steels or mattresses. This seems more the case in France than here, where most of our best dressmakers either put a little wadding in the folds of the back drapery, or else a steel high up just below the waist. But the fashion of straight skirts and no bustle seems gaining on us, and we probably shall fully adopt it in the autumn.

In consequence of the many orders received, we have arranged to add a pattern of a gentleman's pyjama, or jacket and trousers for night wear, instead of the old-fashioned nightgown, to our list of paper patterns. It is usually made in Oxford shirting, or coloured shirting of some kind, and a cotton cord and tassels are often added to the jacket to tie round the waist. For travellers this pattern is invaluable, and is always the kind used in India, China, and other Eastern countries. It takes about seven yards of material—according to height—our pattern being, as usual, for a medium-sized person, but it can easily be enlarged; price 1s. This month we have the polonaise with pointed ends, Directoire gown, mantle and cloak; each pattern 1s. We have selected for this month's paper pattern one of the new mantles without sleeves, and of cape-like idea, which came in in the autumn and seems to be growing in favour daily. They are extremely simple, easy to make and fit, are very useful, and are of the same stuff as the dress. They take about four yards of material, according to the width, and may be trimmed with gimps, passementerie, lace, or a ruching of the dress material, any of which would look well; price 1s.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale, and one pattern given each month. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each pattern. If tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, including the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and cotton-wool underclothing" is woven from cotton of the longest fibre, the natural hue, which is almost primrose, being preserved. It is claimed for it that when the cotton fibre is undressed, free from lime, glue, and glaze, and left clean and loose, it does not absorb exhalations any more than wool, and when woven in this state into the tricot or knitted stitch, they are better and a more natural adoption for underclothing than woollen, which is hotter and perhaps more relaxing to the skin. In the samples which we have seen there is one drawback, however, i.e., that they are not woven but sewn into shape by the sewing machine, thus leaving ridges of cloth that here in England we are not accustomed to see. In order to perfect this idea such a fault should be corrected. The shapes seem to be peculiar also. There are long sleeves and low necks to the undervests, which appears an unnatural mixture.

AMONG THE WILD FLOWERS.

By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

PART I.
FLOWERS OF SPRING.

LONG before the snow has disappeared from the uplands, while even the westland winds that roar through the leafless oaks and limes, and bend the giant poplars, have a keen cold edge on them, and ere yet there is a leaf-bud on bush and hedgerow, except the burgeon of the early honeysuckle, the downy tassel on the willow, or catkin on the hazel, I begin to think of my long gipsy holiday. I may now be seen examining the springs of my great travelling caravan, or inside looking round to see what can be done to increase the beauty of the boudoir-saloon.

When later on the snows have fled, and buds become living, breathing things; when winter-weary dormice peep out from the hedge foot, and sit blinking in the sun; when hedgehogs themselves wake up and yawn; when the discordant shriek of the wyreneck heralds the coming of the nightingale; when thrushes have eggs, and blackbirds have young, and peewits on the braeland wage strategic warfare with wandering schoolboys; when primroses clothe the banks and copses with scented blossoms, blue hyacinths carpet the woods, and starry anemones peep through the grass and moss—then busy am I indeed with my preparations for the road.

But when at last the winds blow balmy from the south or west, and birds in field or copse or forest are almost hysterical in their joy of song, then I bid good-bye for a time to the rural village in which I live, and the very horses seem to rattle their harness with joy as they go cantering away to the wilds.

We shun the great highways of England and Scotland as much as possible; we avoid cities, and delight to be far from the roar of railway trains and shriek of steam whistle. The byways and the green lanes alone delight us; the hills and lakes, and all the charming scenery to be met with on mountain and moorland, by streamlet and sea. And all the way, in pleasant summers, the wild flowers are constantly with us. They drape the hedges; they hang like garlands over the very trees; they carpet the sward on each side of old-fashioned country roads; they bloom on banks; they play at hide and seek with the bees and butterflies, in ditches or by fences; they creep over old ruins, and beautify many a crumbling wall; they float on ponds; they nod over brook-lets; they even behave like veritable "spooks" and "spunkies," leading one far astray over moorlands and marshlands, and seeming to laugh when the weary wight has lost his way.

Surely everyone loves the wild flowers. There can be neither poetry nor music nor sunshine either in the soul of that man or woman who does not. Those wildlings of nature, too, have I am sure an influence for good on the minds of those who dwell amongst them. They seem to bring one nearer to the gates of heaven itself, just as the song of birds does, or the whisper of the winds through the summer woods.

But the study of wild flowers is as healthful for the body as for the mind. It is a study that can only be carried on out of doors, in the pure fresh air and in the sunshine; a study that embodies every requisite of wholesome exercise, for the whole attention is pleasantly engrossed, while the muscular system is being strengthened and the nerves toned. It is one, therefore, that can well be recommended by the medical man, and from which the very greatest of benefit may be expected to accrue. And it is, moreover, within the reach of all young girls who dwell in the country, or who have the means of indulging in cycling.

A slight knowledge of botany is necessary to commence with, but this need be by no means very profound. About all you do want to know is the English and Latin names of your favourites, and the natural families to which they belong. To gather flowers for the sake of simply tearing them to pieces to get at their classification, is merely to be introduced to them by name, or to have a mere nodding acquaintance with them. You will never learn to love them like this; they must become friends of yours; you must have their colours in your eye so exactly, that any one a shade or even a streak different from its fellow may at once appeal to you as a curiosity; you must know every peculiarity of petals and stamens, and the very attitude of the leaves and stalk; and you must know all the tricks and manners of your flower pets, and where they live and what they love, and the very insects that are on speaking terms with them. If your knowledge is of this kind, then indeed you may be said to be a lover of the wild flowers, and a poet as well.

Ought you to make a collection? Well, yes; this does no harm, but good, in fact. It is nice to be able to point to a dried flower in a book, and to tell its story, and the story of the day you gathered it; and the scenery amidst which you found it blooming. Well, every flower in your collection, with its stalk and root and leaf, should be carefully fastened on, and labelled, not only with its name, but a brief note or two of its history.

Bouquets of wild flowers, if nicely arranged and not too tightly packed, look very beautiful in a room. During the summer my caravan, "The Wanderer," is always gay with wild flowers. Any reader of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER is welcome to come and see for herself, if she happens to come across me encamped somewhere, anywhere, this summer, for my house upon wheels is always turning up where and when least expected.

Now, in these papers of mine, I cannot of course mention even a tithe of the flowers that bloom at various seasons of the year between the South Coast of England and the Moray Firth in the far North of Scotland. I shall only tell you something about a few of my chief favourites, and the haunts in which I found them. I can promise you one thing, however, namely, that everything I do write will be original, and, like the flowers themselves, culled from life and nature.

I think that most of us love the sweet spring-time better than any other season of the year. We who live in the country do so at all events; we look for it, long for it; the first snowdrops that peep up through the brown earth, the first violets and scented primroses that open their eyes in the blinks of early sunshine, are looked upon as old friends come again once more, bringing with them angel-winged hope and a foretaste of summer's joy and gladness. The birds see these flowers, and burst into song at the sight; the wild bees spy them, and fly off to pay them a visit and welcome them back. These wild bees seem to have a great many secrets to tell the early flowers, of how they have suffered from cold and even hunger throughout the long dreary dark winter; how their stores of honey have been exhausted weeks ago; and how the very drowsiness of death was stealing over them, when they crept forth into the light, and saw that the herald flowers of spring had arrived.

It is only the more energetic wild bees that come out to prospect in the earlier days of spring, and even they seem half asleep as they stand at the entrance to their hives preparatory to flight. They take an unconscionably long time with their toilets. Every leg wants seeing to, their wings want brushing, the downy hairlets that cover their bodies must be combed, and their eyes require a very great deal of polishing indeed. While they labour away at themselves they may be seen turning round and round now and then, that every portion of their tiny anatomies may duly woo the warming sunshine and the westlin' winds; but lo! the sun's rays suddenly become more powerful, the clouds are dispelled, and away they fly. "The first day's outing is the worst with them, and many never return, for cock robin dearly loves a bee for breakfast, and the blackbird can do with half a dozen. Pioneers always suffer in this way. But day after day more and more flowers appear, and more and more bees, and fields grow green and the buds on the trees break into life, and the lichens and mosses creeping over stones and old tree-stems add much to the beauty of the woodlands.

In early spring one hardly knows which to admire the most while walking by hedgerows or in forest or copse—the beautiful and extremely varied tints of the young leaves on the trees, or the wild flowers that carpet the ground. The earliest leaf perhaps of all is the hardy honeysuckle's. Oh, it is perfectly weather-defiant, its very colour is in its favour—a dusky purple-green that neither east wind nor frost can hurt. But catkins are at the same time depending from the hazels, and if you look close you may see also the wee modest crimson-tipped female flower. Then a little later on the downy buds begin to adorn the willows, and next come the tender green and scarlet flowers of the feathery larch trees; and from about this date it is quite a treat to watch the smaller pine trees shooting forth their buds. It will take you a whole month or more to study these, and all this time you will be wondering what in the name of mystery the long brown fingers that are popped out here and there are going to come to. Watch and see; if I were to tell you, all the charm would be fled, it would be like reading the last chapters of a good story before you had scanned the first.

Nothing puzzles an artist more than painting spring tints. What an eye he needs, and what daring, for the brilliancy of the colours on canvas seem positively outrageous at times!

Well, there are many other kinds of trees as well as pines that I advise you to watch; notably perhaps the horse-chestnut. Whatever, you may ask yourself, are those sticky brown buds going to come to; they look as if they had all been dipped in glycerine.

"Dipped in treacle" might be quite as appropriate as "dipped in glycerine," but being a reader of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER you have too much poetry in your nature to allude to such a thing as treacle. However, just watch those buds, please, and watch them day after day for weeks; and here is another thing to note, namely, the various kinds of showers that fall from such trees as the chestnut, the lime, the yew, etc., during the course of the summer, or rather spring, summer, and autumn. These would include the early-shed bud-calyxes, which, from trees like the lime, for instance, float downwards in the early summer air like showers of chaff; the petals, etc., of the flowers themselves, later on the nuts and seeds, and last of all the leaves themselves.

Girls who can paint would do well to note also and try to represent, in oil or water colours, different varieties of spring leaves. The autumn tints themselves cannot vie in richness of colour and beauty with the leaves of the dwarf sycamore or plane trees that we find growing by the roadsides and in hedgerows, in the sweet sad season of the year.

But let us now take a peep at some of the more common flowers of spring.

Here is the primrose—the Primula vulgaris—one of the most charming of the order Primulaceæ. Its odour and its wondrous and indescribable colour are familiar to everyone, even to the little gutter-snipes of our London slums. The name signifies “first rose,” and it certainly is the first rose of spring, though not by any means the first flower. It is blossoming now in my orchard, although the frost is hard and the snow has not yet flown away. But April and May—April in England and May in the North of Scotland—are the favourite months of the primrose. We find it on banks of all sorts, in woods and copses, and on the “haughs” by the river’s side.

There is a variety of primrose, common in some parts, of a pinky hue; while far away in the Orkney Islands and in Sutherland is found the beautiful Primula Scotica. The cowslip, the Primula veris of the naturalist that clothes our meadows with pale saffron hues, is a favourite with everyone, though not so much as the primrose. Older writers ascribe a great many virtues to this plant, its leaf and root and flower. Nervous pains and mental fears of all sorts are said to fly before a judiciously concocted infusion thereof, while a distillation from its petals will restore its pristine bloom to the cheek of fading beauty. Under such an application, spots and freckles and even wrinkles disappear.

The oxlip or Primula elatior is rare in England, but is a bigger flower, as the name indicates. The polyanthus of the garden is a cultivated kind of oxlip. The Viola odorata, or sweet violet, is another of our woodland fairies. It is a very modest and most delicately scented wee flower, and though it now and then takes an upward half-shy glance at the sun, it loves to hide away in shady places, but it cannot help casting its sweetness abroad, or lending it to every passing breeze; it is therefore easily found out. There are many varieties of it, and I need hardly say that it is greatly cultivated for the sake of its sweet scented blossoms. It used to be much used as medicine, but the properties and virtues assigned to it are now considered somewhat mythical.

Does the reader know a little flower that blooms on every meadow, called the Bellis perennis? No; not the Llygad y Dydd of the Welsh, the gowan or bairnwort of the Scotch, the daisy or day’s-eye of the English. Now you have it. Says Burns—

“Wee, modest, crimson-tipped flow’r,
Thou’s met me in an evil hour;
For I maun crush among the stoure
Thy slender stem;
To spare thee now is past my pow’r,
Thou bonnie gem.”

Every poet mentions this gowan. Remember the bonnie lines in that sweet auld song, “Annie Laurie”—

“Like the dew on the gowans lyin’
Is the fa’ o’ her fairy feet,
And like winds in summer sighin’
Her voice is low and sweet.”

What associations does this gowan not summon back to our memories! It is for these, more perhaps than for its intrinsic beauty, that we so dearly love it. The ox-eye daisy is a flower of spring and early summer; I mention it here simply because it is called a daisy. It is the Chrysanthemum leucanthemum of the botanist, and it is well known everywhere. By the way, it is called the “horse gowan” in Scotland. It is found growing all along railway embankments and in dry meadows, which it stars over with white. It may be called a white marguerite. Now you know it. It is this flower country girls pull and tear the petals from as they say “he loves me,” “he loves me not,” and so on to the last. And the last petal is Sir Oracle.

Well, it is a pretty flower, but the bright yellow ox-eye of the cornfield, called also the corn marigold, is still more beautiful, and either of these is a charming addition to a bouquet of wild flowers.

There are two little spring ranunculuses that may be mentioned here, namely, goldilocks, and the water buttercup. The former comes in March and April, growing in copses, a bright yellow five-petalled buttercup, with long lance-like leaves. The water buttercup is very abundant everywhere in ponds and burns, most species having their leaves submerged. Some prefer running water, others ponds; the flower is white, with green streaks. I think you will know it from that alone. The lesser celandine must not be confounded with goldilocks, though it blooms about the same time. It has six to ten yellow petals that have more the shape of a star than a cup, and these petals look particularly well varnished. The sepals beneath these are only three. The leaves of the plant are heart-shaped and wrinkled like that of the primrose. There are several species of this flower; but these you must study for yourself.

The Agraphis nutans (Liliacæ), or wild hyacinth, is a special favourite of mine, owing partly to its deep blue colour, and partly to its rich perfume, and because it makes so delightful a spring carpet to the woods near where I live. It is sometimes called the bluebell, but here and there among the others I have gathered pink and pale white wild hyacinths. It begins to bloom about the time the wry-neck emits its discordant shriek in our copses, by way of informing us that the nightingale is coming, and it blossoms on in shady places till well into June.

I should not forget to mention the ordinary buttercup of our childhood’s happy days, although it is more a flower of early summer than spring. Like goldilocks, it is one of the ranunculaceæ family. It is also called crowfoot, from the bird-claw-like formation of its foliage.

The marsh marigold is another of the ranunculaceæ which blooms as early as March. Its characteristic is this: it has no petals proper, its sepals composing the bright yellow cup-like flower.

I earnestly advise you to get specimens of all these yellow flowers which I have named, and study them together. This will be a most delightful exercise, and far more profitable, in my opinion, than dates. It is really a matter of very little moment to us nowadays when Queen Elizabeth was born or Raleigh beheaded; but we cannot take a single walk into the country without coming across these pretty flowers of spring.

Do you know the lady’s smock? It is a flower belonging to the cruciferae family, that you find by the wayside and in dampish meadow lands. It is rather tall and spreading, with pale lilac four-petalled flowers. It is found growing side by side with the marsh marigold, as often as not, and it comes with the cuckoo. Indeed, it is sometimes called the cuckoo flower, and morsels of froth are found on it, which, if opened, will be found to surround a little green jumping insect. This flower is also a child of April.

One of the most charming of our spring flowers is the early purple orchis. The land or ground on which it grows is seldom very rich; it likes high, half-bare localities, in the neighbourhood of furze bushes, and grows plentifully on the sward by the wayside in many of the midland counties. A novice might take it for a kind of hyacinth at first, for at a little distance it resembles that flower, except in colour, which is a purple-red or pink. The leaves are very peculiar, being tall, broad and lanced-like, and spotted or splashed over with brown or purple spots.

There are several other species of orchis to be found in our meadows, such as the man-orchis, the bee and the fly orchis, all of which are very pretty and interesting.

I am at the end of my space, and have not mentioned a tithe of my flower pets. But I will return to them.

(To be continued.)

BIRDS IN JUNE.

By A NATURALIST.

THE swallow tribe are now in the very height of enjoyment as they dash and wheel about—now here, now there—in all directions in search of their insect prey. From early morn till dusky eve they busily ply their vocation, which is to rid the air and land and water of insects which would make our lives very uncomfortable, if not in some instances almost unbearable. The old buccaneers have left on record that the worst foes they had to contend with were insects.

The dark-coloured swift has a wonderful command of wing power that no amount of exertion seems to tire. The more he flies the more he seems to enjoy himself as he goes through the air, screaming out his notes of exultation, sweeping round the grey tower of some old church with his companions. He is not so dull a bird in plumage as he seems to be when you only see him in flight. On a close view more pleasing shades, though still subdued, show themselves. He is the last to come of his tribe, and the first to leave us. Not so the chimney swallow; we have seen him very early in warm springs, and have known him stay late in the autumn. Why he should be called chimney swallow I do not know; he certainly builds in a chimney sometimes, but quite as often on some beam or rafter. He sings quite prettily, and is a very confiding bird. The martins have a different flight to the swallows, which is very easily distinguished at a distance by those who are acquainted with both species. The sandmartins are most interesting little creatures as they flutter round about the entrances to their holes in quite a state of excitement. To see them excavating these in the hard sandrock is a wonderful sight. Who, on looking at the bill of the sandmartin, unless he had seen him at work, would suppose him capable of drilling long holes—little tunnels, in fact; and very quickly he does his work too.

There is a bird very swallow-like in its flight that comes out in the evening after the swallow tribe have retired to rest. He is more heard than seen, though he might be called a giant night swallow, taking up the hunting after the others have left off. By day he rests, lying lengthways on some branch or limb asleep; but when the sun has gone down you will hear his curious jarring chur-chur, like the hum of a spinning-wheel; it is the note of the goat-sucker or fern owl. A most powerful wing he has, and he sweeps over woods, meadows, and streams, now high up, now down, wheeling and twisting in all directions. The plumage is very moth-like in its bars and markings, as you see when you inspect the bird closely, which you can as a rule only do after one has just been shot. The large eyes and wide mouth, with its bristles, fix one's attention first; he is fitted admirably for the purpose for which he was created—that of capturing insects, and not sucking goats, which a silly superstition once supposed to be his delight. A most useful, gentle creature, and he deserves a better fate than to be shot, as he often is.

Those elegant insect-eaters, the wagtails, that run about so nimbly, moving their long tails continually, give life to the meadows and the streams that glide through them. Where cattle are pastured, there you will see the wagtails, for they attend them very closely. It is a pretty sight to see the common black and white wagtails running nimbly round the muzzles of the cows as they feed along, making dips and snaps at the insects the animals disturb by their feeding. They are not at all particular where they run—round the beasts' heads or about the feet they flit with perfect indifference. The yellow-breasted wagtails are very beautiful creatures, they do not affect the feeding pastures so much as do the common species. Where the stream runs over the pebbly shallows, and the pollard willows line the bank, in spots where the sand has been washed, forming little bays, there you will find the yellow wagtails.

In the same locality I have seen that interesting little bird, the common sandpiper, or as we might now say, the uncommon sandpiper. He is a bird of neat appearance as he trips neatly along, dabbling here and there as he runs in and out of the shallows, and crosses nimbly over the sand. A little pond has been formed where the brook runs through a wide shallow hollow, caused by the tearing up of the banks where a clump of trees has been blown down in a storm. The stream runs through it, flags grow round the sides, "spiked reed and golden iris bending over." Here a dabchick has located, or a little grebe; there is his mate; they are most expert divers, and they are very busily engaged just at present; somewhere in or about the flags is their well-concealed nest, which looks just like a lump of damp weed, and nothing more. It is damp, too, just as it looks, both inside and out; but that will not make any difference to the hatching process.

It is sweet to rest here awhile.

"In the faint,

Sweet breath of the wind comes tuneful insect hum,
Mix'd with the rustle of the swaying leaves,
Bass to the birds' clear treble."

NEW MUSIC.

SPRINGTIME not only ushers in the flowers, but it also thrusts upon us the early concert season with such an impetus, that even the fast-lengthening days do not prevent the impossibility of hearing all the good things and fresh things played and sung for our pleasure and instruction. With many excellent performances to choose from, let us first speak of those given by the Novello Choir.

The production in London of their conductor, Dr. Mackenzie's Dream of Jubal, was in every way a success. Apart from the enthusiastic singing of the choir, the interest centred in the revival of the "melodrame"—a recitation spoken above an expressive undercurrent of music. Mendelssohn uses it in Athalie, and in some of the male-voice cantatas, and Beethoven employs it in the prison scene in Fidelio; but our impression is that the melodrame, being on this occasion in the able hands of Mr. Charles Fry, has never been more sympathetically or beautifully used than in this example by Mr. Joseph Bennett. In fact, his libretto in all its details is singularly beautiful, and ranks high in the realms of poetry. The subject chosen is a most suggestive one, and Dr. Mackenzie shows all that versatility which the story demands. Jubal is represented deploring the weakness of the music produced by his tortoiseshell as compared with the myriad voices of nature around him—the murmur of the foliage as the breezes whisper soft, "the deep-voiced torrent, the buzzing insects and choirs of birds." He falls into a sleep and dreams that an angel reproves his presumption in despising God's good gifts, and then proceeds to show him what the future of music, as a divine art, will be.

To illustrate this, Dr. Mackenzie had to compose a chorus of praise in Divine worship, a song of comfort in bereavement, a patriotic march and chorus of victory, the song of a labourer in the harvest field, a funeral march and chorus in honour of a hero, and a duet of lovers. No trifling task, you will observe; but most ably carried out by the talented principal of the Royal Academy of Music.

At a later concert given by the same Society, an opportunity was afforded us of hearing Dudley Buck's Light of Asia, which although written some time ago, was then heard in London for the first time.

If we are to judge from this of the present condition of music in America, things look extremely hopeful, and we trust that we may be permitted to listen to similar productions from other composers "over the water."

We all know and enjoy the Saturday and Monday "Pops," and many of us have, by their means, learnt to understand and estimate at their proper value the finest specimens of classical composition, written for the various combinations of stringed instruments.

The promoters of the Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society are giving the flute, oboe, clarinet, French horn, and bassoon the justice which has already been meted out fully to the strings. In the face of considerable difficulties, and in spite of but little encouragement, this excellent Society lives and is a strong child, and its performances, supported by the finest players of the day, have been, as far as the wind music was concerned, well-nigh faultless. If, in the end, entrepreneurs and audiences alike are persuaded that the alternation and combining of wind music with strings should form part of every chamber concert, that is now exclusively and selfishly devoted to the latter instrument, we suppose that one of the objects of the Society will have been gained; but the encouragement given by it to all players upon wind instruments, and to composers to write pieces for those instruments, is another feature, a prize of twenty guineas being offered for the best quintett written for the five instruments above named. Brothers of any of our girls, who play wind instruments, and would like to join the Society, could get all information, etc., from G. G. T. Treherne, Esq., 26, Brunswick Gardens, W.

A most enjoyable series of pianoforte recitals adds considerably to the reputation of Miss Dora Bright, both as a player and as a composer. Should another series be given, no one should miss the chance offered of hearing what our English lady-pianists can do.

A delightful and novel form of concert, one which we hope to find soon repeated, was the vocal recital given in Harley Street not long ago, and entirely supported by two ladies—Mrs. Florence Perugini and Miss Hutton. The programme consisted entirely of duets and solos. "How monotonous!" we hear you exclaim; but that is the most marvellous part of it. Had you been there, you would have left the concert room, as we left it, simply longing for more.

One could not wish for a more perfect piece of duet-singing; the interchange of light and shade was such as could only be acquired by sympathetic and constant rehearsal, and only maintained by long and mutual regard.

We hope they will soon sing again.

Then, at the Albert Hall, an awkwardly large concert room, many of you doubtless listened a few weeks ago to the very powerful effects, and were struck with admiration at the grand chorus-singing in Benoit's Lucifer. Never has the Royal Choral Society shown more enthusiasm and sympathy with their work, although we certainly feel that the best of the composition is to be found in the first two numbers.

The Philharmonic Society has introduced us to another most accomplished pianist, Madame Backer-Gröndahl, whose playing of Grieg's pianoforte concerto will long be remembered; and, for a second time, to the representative Russian composer, Tschaiakowsky.

These are only a very few of the many concerts of good music which London alone can boast of, and in many of the provincial towns of this "unmusical country" good performances of good music are given week after week.

From a large selection of new music we can recommend the following pieces:—

NOVELLO AND CO.

Original Compositions for the Organ, Nos. 110-112. The first of these numbers contains three Offertories by Hamilton Clarke; the next is a Pastoral by Luard Selby, and the last comprises six easy Voluntaries, composed by Kate Loder (Lady Thompson). A set of songs about the reeds (one is tempted to say "the German Reeds," for they are Lenan's Schilfflieder) is full of original thought and pleasant, simple melody. They are composed by Schlesinger, whose detached songs, published in America, we have already noticed with interest.

PATERSON AND SONS (EDINBURGH).

Wert thou mine and Maiden Fair. Two songs by Alfred Stella; the words of the first by Burns, and those of the second by Professor Blackie. They are both decidedly Scotch in colouring, and are quite simple and ballad-like in design. Like many other things apparently simple, they are perhaps not so easy to sing well, and many hidden beauties will only be brought to the surface by earnest good singers.

Loving Shepherd is the title of a sacred song by W. Harrison. A good, useful setting of the well-known words by Jane E. Leeson.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER
VIII.A WARLIKE OXFORD, TO WHICH THE KING
IS COMING AGAIN.

BEFORE the disorders which heralded the civil war Oxford had been in triumphant prosperity, crowded with students and scholars. A great impetus had been given to study and an attraction offered to scholars, native and foreign, when the princely library was founded by Sir Thomas Bodley. Besides its own magnificent collection of books, it had rescued what was left of such noble libraries, for their time, as those of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, and Kemp, Bishop of London, which had already been bequeathed to the University. These had been decimated and dispersed by the over hot zeal of the Reformers, but were now as far as possible recovered and established in the stately building prepared for their reception, whose grand roof bore the arms of the University and its motto—

"The Lord is my light."

The studies which were attracting the most attention, and replacing to some extent the almost universal devotion to theological questions at the time of the Reformation, were philosophy, especially natural philosophy, and physics, which still included the mystic flights of astrology, the romantic search for the philosopher's stone, and the subtle dreams of the Rosicrucians. With but the threatening of war, all was changed. Who would send their young sons to follow the peaceful pursuit of learning in a town which, from its central position and natural capacity for being easily and strongly defended, was certain to be a bone of contention between the belligerents? The attendance of the students dwindled to a mere fraction of their former number, and the scholars, even such thorough bookmen as Dr. Peter Dacre, were driven to forsake what had been the quiet occupation and serene delight of long lives, for the fire and fury of contemporary politics.

It would have required a Euclid, who could draw his problems in oil on his own body in his bath, while the mob of Alexandria was raging without, or a David who could go on painting in his studio when foreign invaders were entering Paris, to go on reading in Oxford after the Royal Standard was hoisted at Nottingham, a significant close to a stormy day in August, 1642.

Already the King had sent from York to "requisition" money from the University for the maintenance of his army; and Convocation, the great University court, had voted him all the money in the college chests.

For this act the loyal city had incurred the displeasure of Parliament. It was not Gown, but Town, which was considered responsible for this proceeding, and it had sought to clear itself by merely waiting for the departure of a body of Royalist horse, under Sir John Byron, that had been quartered within its bounds, to summon a Parliamentary force to its aid. And the Parliamentary soldiers had signalled their visit by mutilating the statues of the Virgin and Child, which Archbishop Laud, now lying in the Tower, had erected, and by threatening the sculptured relief over the gate of All Souls, in memory of the battle of Agincourt and of the souls of the Englishmen slain in the battle ascending from purgatory.

Oxford was a house divided against itself. Kitty trembled for the new battlemented walls and tower of Oriel, for its great window and for the pomegranate arms of Eleanor of Castile, a prominent device in its decorations. Who knew whether the Parliamentary troops might not conceive they had a ground of offence in castellated walls, an oriel window, and the armorial bearings of Queens and Spaniards?

At the same time Kitty looked with admiration as well as awe on the marching and counter-marching of the real soldiers in their buff coats and steel breastplates. But that was nothing to the interest she took in the University soldiers, for what students remained in the colleges were enrolled in bands and drilled in their different quadrangles—another use this than that designed for them by their founders and early monkish fathers and brothers!

The arms of these student soldiers were a steel back and breastpiece, a pike and a musket, and so enthralling to high-spirited, hot-blooded lads was the martial exercise for which the arms were provided, with the prospect of real warfare for which the drill was a mere rehearsal, that the object for which the schools existed was more and more neglected. The very choir boys and small scholars braved any amount of the birch, in escaping from their tasks, to watch with fascinated eyes the bigger lads at their military manoeuvres. The amateur soldiers in their turn were so engrossed with their duties of learning to keep the step, to present or shoulder arms, to stand sentinel, together with the supposed necessity of a resort for refreshment and a talk after each drill to such taverns as the Holly Bush or the Green Dragon, that the youths entirely lost the habits of students and never regained them. In fact the lax discipline, and the party spirit which permitted it, reached such a pitch that on the eve of the battle of Edgehill a party of Oxford students left their gowns at Town End and ran and tramped the distance to the battlefield, doing the King good service in the engagement.*

Kitty could see, from the terrace in Oriel Gardens, various detachments drilling, and she looked at the companies with her heart in her eyes. For Lady Ottery had thought it best, knowing how the girl pined for tidings of her brother, whom neither she nor Mrs. Judy had seen lately, to tell her that he had quitted Magdalen, where he had finished his terms, and Islip Barnes, and joined the Earl of Essex's army as a volunteer. Anthony Walton had not taken the same course as yet. He had duties as the squire of Islip Barnes, the male head of a house in which his widowed mother and his two young sisters had no other protector. These kept him at home doing what he could for those who were nearest to him, and serving with all his might the cause he had at heart in peace, until some urgent demand should claim his support in the field. As it was, Kitty judged correctly when she believed his active, masterful spirit would have greatly preferred a soldier's part, and it was by a hard effort of self-restraint that he stayed, waiting for what time should bring forth.

How poor Kitty trembled and looked piteously in her father's face, grown so stern, which did not blench, whatever he might feel, when the quiet little household at Oriel were made acquainted with the fact that a battle had been fought at Edgehill, not far from Oxford.

After a few days of sickening suspense Kitty took heart of grace, and trusted her prayers had been heard and answered. Mrs. Judy's prayers had gone with them, ay, and so might Dr. Dacre's in the unsounded depths of a father's heart. If Jack had been engaged he had come out of the engagement unhurt, for not only was no news good news, but Lady Ottery, who was at liberty to inquire openly, and did not stint her inquiries, would have been sure to have heard if any evil had befallen John Dacre.

If it was after the battle of Edgehill, in the reaction of relief from feelings which had been intensified and strained, that Kitty was one day called to order by her father for a matter which had not till then struck her as being of any moment. Kitty had a reading acquaintance with the poets of her day. She was in the habit of reading Herbert and Vaughan to Lady Ottery, though in truth it was a sacrifice on her ladyship's part to listen, in order to further the right direction and cultivation of Kitty's mind. Lady Ottery's taste inclined decidedly to prose, especially to prose which did not indulge in the conceits and allegories from which her favourite Jeremy Taylor was by no means free. Kitty was also tolerably familiar with the lighter poems which the Court poets, Waller, Davenant, and Lovelace, threw off in abundance. These were often in wide circulation before they were printed, admirers copying them carefully, and lending them to be copied again, and preserved in the drawer of the bureau, which held a handful of violets, a withered rose, perhaps a curl of hair or a knot of riband. But lately the girl's attention was drawn to an Oxford poet, at least a student of Oxford, still resident in the town, engaged in the literary pursuits which, in spite of the troubles of the times and the decay of more legitimate study, were still indulged in. A good deal of talk, when men had heart and time to talk, had been aroused in the beginning of the year by the appearance of an Oxford newspaper, the second newspaper ever published in England. It was called the Mercurius Aulicus, and Kitty heard about it because one of its editors, John Birkenhead, had been a "servitor," or poor scholar of Oriel whom she knew so far as to exchange greetings with him. The other editor, Peter Heylin, had been a demy of Magdalen. Doubtless he had infected a second demy with his proclivities, for, eight months afterwards, in the summer of 1642, George Wither, together with the chaplain of Magdalen, Dr. Rynes, started another newspaper called the Mercurius Rusticus. This was a great advance in serial literature, since it purported to be at once satirical and humorous, and to include both poetry and prose in its composition.

Everybody who had the least pretence to an intellectual bent had the sheet on his breakfast-table.

Kitty was not much attracted by the publication, but it set her thinking of her brother and Anthony Walton who must have come across the news print, and, in their fidelity to the traditions of their beloved Magdalen, would value it more than she did.

Neither of them had been contemporaries either of George Wither or of Heylin, but she had often heard them talk of Wither, and knew that he was one of the esteemed guests at Islip. His work, "Abuses Whipped and Stripped," for which he had been in prison in London, was a tabooed subject in general conversation; but her brother and cousin had been wont to quote snatches of his poems, and versicles such as "The Muse," which Anthony held in great regard, and to sing fragments of his songs.

One of these Kitty had caught up, and, though it was a man's song, she loved to echo its gay, defiant challenge, and sudden change to fervent faithful devotion.

"Shall, I wasting in despair," piped Kitty over her needlework, in her own little window of Oriel, "Die because a woman's fair?"

* * * * *

Be she fairer than the day,
Or the dewy meads in May,
If she be not fair to me,
What care I how fair she be?"

She continued toting out the merry scorn of the renunciation with all the supposed spirit of the hero of the ditty.

"What care I how fair she be?" repeated Kitty, with fresh disdain.

"What is that thou art singing, Kitty?" demanded Dr. Peter Dacre, coming into the room from his adjoining den with long, swift steps, and bending his brows on her in a manner which he seldom used to his daughter. "Art thou turned false to thy sex, as others have turned false to their Church and King? In my day a man who celebrated his mistress, did it on bended knee, as it were, and sued for her lightest favour, did not gibe her either to her face or behind her back, with a 'What care I?' Marry, it is a treacherous and rebellious age!"

Kitty looked aghast at so sudden and severe a charge on such small provocation. But she did not dare to rally her father with being ungrateful for the compliment she had paid him in taking his part in the perennial contention between man and woman. He was too moved and displeased for her to do so; she only said, submissively, "I meant no harm, sir. I but sang idly, to keep up my heart, and make an accompaniment to my sewing. I am sorry if my song hath displeased you. I thought I remembered you were wont to smile when it was sung in your presence some time ago. You used to protest that the lover, if lover he were, kept a stout heart, and ought to win his fair lady."

"Mockery and false pretence deserve no reward," he cried, impatiently, "and such a challenge in a woman's mouth sounds doubly false. If I remember right, the words are from one of the songs of that turbulent rogue Wither. Find another and an honest man's verse to serve your turn, or let alone singing, which would perchance be the more fitting and comely behaviour under the circumstances."

"I will, father," said Kitty, with prompter obedience than usual, for she was sufficiently dear to him and cherished by him to question his decisions respectfully, even to object to them occasionally. "I cannot tell why I was so left to myself as to sing in this quiet house. It was very ill thought of me."

He looked at the solitary drooping young figure, and his heart reproached him.

"Nay, Kitty," he said, in a softened tone, "I did not mean thee to give over singing altogether; youth is the time for singing for men and women, as spring is for the birds' notes. Thy mother was a brave singer when I knew her first, and doubtless she would have had her daughter sing as she herself had done in her day. If I am in the mood I like to hear thee liting all by thyself in here. It helps me to get on with my writing in my inner chamber, as I do not question it helps Judy out yonder with the bur-nishing of her silver and the rubbing bright of her crystal. There is a time for everything, and there are songs for every singer. There are the songs of Master Herrick, the Devonshire parson, perfect lyrics, in which you will not discover any flouting and taunting, any insolent disparagement of women; no, nor any scouting of old rule and precedent. Sing them, daughter Kitty, and let that poor thing a-be."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

ONE WILLING TO WORK.—It is well that you have no liking for teaching, as your education is not sufficiently advanced to qualify you for a situation of that kind. But even at your early age, and unable as you are to complete your education, you might be eligible for an engagement as "mother's help." You should advertise for one. This is the only plan we can recommend.

ESPERANCE.—"Her Majesty's Nursing Sisters," at Netley, are sent out to the seat of war when required. You have overlooked our rules; we do not answer more than two questions. If a trained nurse, write for all information direct. They must all be ladies by birth as well as by education, and must have gone through training in a good civil hospital. They wear a grey uniform, and are therefore popularly called the "grey sisters."

DOT AND GO ONE.—The 5th of May, 1869, was a Wednesday. The usual limit of age for becoming a hospital nurse is from 23 to 35 or 40 years of age.

T. T. MUIR.—The Haute Vue Reading Society, already established for a period of ten years, may be heard of through Miss Johnston, Primrose, Kelso, Co. Roxburgh, N.B.

LITTLE WELSH GIRL.—You are too young to be eligible as a probationer or nurse in any hospital. Even for a children's hospital you should be twenty-one years of age at the least. You might, however, inquire of the Matron, Mildmay Home for Nurses, 8, The Green, Stoke Newington, N.

ROSE R.—We should advise you to write to the Cambridge Examiners' Correspondence Classes for students preparing for local or other examinations; usual fee £2 2s. per course. Apply to the Editor, Falstead, Essex. The paper itself is published monthly, by Bagster and Sons, 15, Paternoster Row, E.C., who would give you every information needed, including the answer to your first question.

ELIZABETH.—We think that the book for which you inquire is "The Englishwoman's Year Book" (Hatchards, Piccadilly, London, W.). Should your daughter show taste for house-decoration, painting, and stencilling, perhaps Messrs. Simpson, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C., might give both information and employment. Their advertisement is for "Decorative Work," which may include the branch you name, or one that may suit your daughter equally well to learn. The book which we have named at your request may give you suggestions should this plan fail.

HERMIONE M.—It is difficult to recommend you books when ignorant of any special tastes you may have. If you desire to read of "Biblical Geography and Antiquities," you can procure Dr. Barrow's work, published by us; or the illustrated "Bible Cyclopædia," by Dr. Eadie. There is a useful book called a "Handbook of Specimens of English Literature," by Dr. Angus, likewise published by us. If fond of natural history, there are many from which you might make a selection. We brought out a small one, "The Home Naturalist." We do not know what you mean by "a strap of pearls." Any such gems which you possess you should take to a jeweller, and he will tell you whether they be genuine or "Roman pearls."

CONSTANCE.—To people needing a cheap grammar and exercise-book, there is nothing better than those twopenny books published by the Society for Promoting the Knowledge of Foreign Languages, 12, Great Swan Alley, Moorgate Street, E.C., called "Hossfeld's New Method." They are simple and easy for self-tuition, and can be purchased in French, German, Spanish, and Italian. Sent by post 2jd. A single copy can be purchased at a time, according as you advance in your studies.

HOUSEKEEPING.

HOUSEMAID.—We cannot give an opinion on the relative merits of lighting a fire from the top, and the usual plan of lighting from below, as we uniformly do so by the latter method. But we can give our own original plan of making up one. Never use a poker, but carefully clear away the white ashes under the lower bar with the shovel. Then draw all the hot coals to the front, and place the new pieces at the back and sides, standing up, a little apart from each other, vertically instead of horizontally, or thrown on anyhow. You know that coals grow like slates, in layers, and if you lay them flat they will take long to light, whereas if you stand them up on end (as a tree grows, the lie of the grain running up and down) the coal will light almost immediately.

A. F. O. gives us her experience of the care of sponges, and we are happy to transfer it to our readers. It is that they should be washed in warm water after every time they are used; and "A. F. O." claims for this plan that "the sponges never become slimy." We ourselves discovered that when in this unpleasant condition potato juice will restore them, a raw potato being cut in two and the sponge well rubbed with them, and a little water used to wash them out.

COOKERY.

LITTLE COOK.—You had better apply for the "Directory" at the National Training School for Cookery, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W. For a full course of twenty weeks' training, for a post of instructor in all branches of cookery, the fee is 21 guineas; but you can attend a course of fourteen weeks, in plain cookery, for 8 guineas. Perhaps you might find the instruction given at the College for Working Women, at 7, Fitzroy Street, W., suit you better, where classes are held in cookery and domestic economy.

EMMA WARREN sends us her recipe for making orange marmalade, for which we thank her, and take chance for its finding as much favour with some of our other readers. Slice twelve Seville oranges (of the thickness individually preferred), remove the pips, and to each pound of fruit add three pints of water. Let it stand for twenty-four hours, and then boil all for an hour; then weigh the fruit, and to every pound or pint add one and a half pounds of sugar (loaf) and the juice of three lemons; boil again for half an hour, then pot, and cover.

LAURA.—The best sauce to serve with cold beef is "horseradish sauce." Grate a young root of horseradish very finely, add a "pinch" of salt and little more than a tablespoonful of vinegar, or as much at least as will moisten the whole. To this pour in two tablespoonfuls of cream or milk, and mix the ingredients thoroughly together, and serve cold.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ABRUPT.—We cannot give you any recipe for making your hair grow dark, nor any for "getting rid of a double chin." Be thankful that you have got any hair or chin at all, and that the hair you complain of does not grow on your chin. Inquire at any librarians respecting the prices of books. We did not publish the book you name.

STUMP.—We have given a series of articles on good manners, and how to conduct yourself in all circumstances and relations of life. You should wear a velvet ribbon round the throat, which might be edged with a little black lace, which would stand up and conceal the scars in a great measure.

DOROTHY.—The legend of the "Seven Sleepers" is recorded by various authors, and is found in the Koran, in which latter it is said their sleep lasted upwards of 300 years; and Gregory of Tours, that it was for about 230 years. The substratum of truth which underlies the fable is this: In the year A.D. 250 some Christian youths suffered martyrdom under the Emperor Decius, and "fell asleep in Jesus," and they were buried in a cave in Mount Celion. In the year 474 their remains were discovered, and being regarded as sacred relics were removed to Marseilles. 2. John o' Groat was a Dutch settler at the extreme north of Scotland, temp. James IV. His nine sons quarrelling for precedence, he had nine doors made in his house, one for each son, and had his table made round.

E. H. MOORE could not "make money of the verses" she sends us; they are in every respect incorrect. How could she "watch the roar of the billows"? and when she "seemed to see an angel," and "somehow seemed to slip on her knees," and her "thoughts all flew away." It may have been unpleasant, but we do not think she had a pecuniary loss. Should she have a talent for water-colour painting she should show her work at shops where cards, fans, or painted screens and photo frames are sold, and try to obtain a trade order.

BESSIE.—Your burnt eyelashes and eyebrows will grow again if the skin be not injured likewise. We decline to give recipes for making girls thin. When people are advanced in life and become painfully corpulent, it is then for a doctor to consider what may be done to reduce the size, or arrest the tendency to increase it without deterioration of the general strength and health, and impoverishing of the blood. See our reply to "A. F. O." on the subject of sponges.

MARJORIE H.—We are happy to name some special work carried on by women as subjects for united prayer. At the same time we think your strictures are somewhat officious and presumptuous. You evidently wish to change places with the editor and his staff of workers, and provided you obtain the "lion's share" of the paper, other readers' requirements may be set aside. Zenana missionary work, women Scripture-readers, and parish visitors' work, prayer and Bible-reading unions, inaugurated by women; Homes of Rest, supplied and kept by them, and conducted on religious principles, nursing sisters and deaconesses, the Aldershot Mission and Institute, and Soldiers' Wives Society, conducted by Miss Daniel; Work among Soldiers, by Miss Robinson; and the Army Scripture Readers and Soldiers' Friend Society; Miss Horne's Mission to Coastguards; Miss Weston's Sailors' Rest, and Miss Child's Welcome Home. These are a few amongst the institutions founded and carried on by women.

A VILLAGE GIRL.—Rubbing the warts with the inside skin of the broad bean is said to be a cure, and also washing them with strong soda and water.

A. N. S. O. K.—You seem to be dwelling too much on your feelings for comfort, instead of on the finished work of Christ. There is nothing in yourself that could ever bring you peace. He says, "In Me ye might have peace." If you need encouragement, think of the promise, "He is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God through Him." Many of the unbelieving thoughts that trouble us are direct whisperings of the evil one—not our own—and the way by which you can distinguish between your own and those that are mere suggestions is simple. Do you encourage and adopt them as your own? or do you reprobate them, and ask the Holy Spirit to drive them away? As you say that they distress you, that you "strive against them, and long to find Christ," be assured that the thoughts are not yours; and if they were, the blood of your Saviour has washed away their guilt. You could not desire to find Him unless He had first found you; and you may go to Him without fear, and tell Him all your weakness and all your misgivings. Learn the hymn,

"Just as I am, without one plea,

But that Thy blood was shed for me."

E. F. PHILLIPS.—Table napkins are not given at a supper such as you describe. Everything is cold, except the beef tea served in small tea or coffee cups, instead of tea.

WOULD-BE BOTANIST.—Yes, it is quite true that there is a plant or small shrub that acts up to its name of "weather" or "earthquake" plant. It is the Abrus precatorius, recently brought into notice, and sent to England by Professor Novack, of Vienna. The leaf stems of this marvellous shrub work up and down like railway signals, according to the direction whence atmospheric or other special phenomena, such as earthquakes, may be expected. It would occupy too much space to enter into a detailed account of the appearance and working of this extraordinary production of nature, so gifted with electro-magnetic properties. We can only advise you, for further particulars, to pay a visit to the Royal Horticultural Gardens, Regent's Park, where doubtless you will learn all you desire to know. It is a tropical production, though is also found in temperate climates. The seed is of a beautiful pinkish-scarlet hue, having a black spot at one end, and is used for necklaces and jewellers' weights in India.

GLADYS.—The "abomination of desolation," spoken of by our Lord, alluding to the prophecy by Daniel, is thought by most commentators to be the standards of the Roman army on which were depicted their tutelary gods. These were set up in the most conspicuous places in and close around Jerusalem, on what was accounted holy ground, and Josephus says that after the city was taken the ensigns were brought into the Temple itself, one being placed against the eastern gate, and they sacrificed to them there. Thus an "abomination" was wrought amidst the "desolation" the Romans had brought with them.

ST. GEORGE.—The "Society of St. George" was founded by Mr. Ruskin, about 1870, and he devoted a tenth of his remaining fortune to its support. It is a kind of Arcadian Republic, where steam engines or other machines never penetrate, and man lives by the unaided labour of his hands. Mr. Ruskin founded also the St. George's Museum at Sheffield, and from the secretary of this last you would probably obtain the information you desire.

YORKSHIRE GIRL.—We thank you for the recipe for "German paste," a good one, as you say, for all kinds of singing birds. "Three eggs, boiled hard, 2 lb. of peameal, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of lard or butter, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of sweet almonds, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of moist sugar. All these ingredients to be mixed with water and beaten into a paste, and then exposed to the air and heat until the composition be hard and dry. This will keep good for many months, and is an excellent substitute for the natural food of singing and fancy birds." 2. We strongly warn your friend against the pernicious custom of trying to make herself thin. Nevertheless she might avoid eating much fat, butter, cream, or rice, which latter the vegetarians claim as more fattening than any other esculent.

WEARY BEK.—There are two or three homes on the Continent for governesses and Englishwomen engaged in education, personal or otherwise. At Vienna there is the new Victoria Jubilee Home for British Governesses; and in France there is a House of Rest at Pau, in addition to those in Paris. This latter is not, however, restricted to the use of governesses, for it receives any ladies who, being invalided or overworked, desire rest and a winter abroad. But the expense may be regarded as somewhat high—£1 per week. Address—Miss C. Watson, 32, Rue de Bordeaux, Pau.

M. M. S.—The mention of the society called the King's Daughters, founded in America, will be found on application to "Fidelis," 106, High Street, Lewes, Sussex.

VIOLINIST.—You are right. In Chapter V. of "Mittenwald and its Violins" a wrong figure crept in. The number of vibrations should have been 512.

TRAVELLER.—The only guide to Norway containing recent particulars of the ever-changing routes, stations, etc., is "The Handy Guide to Norway," published by Edward Stanford, Charing Cross.

LADY JANE.—"The Girl's Own Indoor Book" contains full information as to the painting in oil and water colours.

CHAPTER IX.

KING CHARLES came again to Oxford in October, proceeding with great energy to fortify the place, being resolved to make it, according to the historian, the frontier fortress of middle England, since it was already so well defended by the two rivers, the Isis and the Cherwell, which well-nigh surrounded it, that nature herself had rendered it next to impregnable. Then, indeed, there was a transformation wrought in the beautiful, tranquil University city. Such attempts at retaining it for the purpose of study as had been till then feebly maintained were abandoned.

The law and the logic schools were converted into granaries, the music and astronomy schools into depôts of clothes for the soldiers, and New College, with its late leaven of Puritanism, was, with a certain irony of choice, made the powder magazine, while New Hall was turned into the mint, whence crown-pieces were issued.

But where was the precious metal to be found from which these crowns were to be struck, in order to support the King's household and defray the expense of his army? Again the resources of each college were taxed, and this time even the most loyal was rueful, for the massive plate, the magnificent gifts of old college benefactors, followed the contents of the University chest.

Not only did the college plate go, and the students have to drink out of pewter or earthenware, Kitty saw Mrs. Judy sorrowfully packing up every silver spoon in the cupboard, and replacing them on the emergency with horn substitutes, taking out, in a melancholy mood and sending away, Kitty's silver mug which Lady Ottery had given her at her baptism, and Master Jackie's silver stirrups and silver-handled whip, which he had left behind him when he went off on his mad errand to mend the world. Mrs. Judy, if she had dared, would have protested that these were not her master's to dispose of, though without question they had been bought by Dr. Peter's money in the days when he was proud of his boy, and desired he should make a proper figure among his companions. Dr. Dacre's warrant was that all citizens, willing or unwilling, of whatever shade of opinion, were called upon to deliver up every article of silver they possessed for His Majesty's present needs. Mrs. Judy let Master Jackie's property go in her tremulous anxiety to save Mrs. Kitty's thimble, which would be but a drop in the bucket truly, but in the Doctor's temper she was not sure whether he would let even a thimble slip by. It ought to follow the spoons and bowls, which, whether their owners were agreeable to the offering or furious at it, were all going the same road, and the least said the soonest mended.

Kitty saw also Lady Ottery superintending her servants, laying out and bearing away to the mint her branch candlesticks, her silver framed mirror, even the highly-wrought handle of the late Sir Jasper's sword. Her ladyship kept silence for the greater part of the operation, and when she did break forth it was without the consciousness that anybody heard her.

"It is not the first time that some of the gear has been confiscated," she said, "once by the King and now for the King. Well, it is but just that what the King's ruth restored, the King's lack should command. But though they were all melted in a witch's caldron they would never pay for one day's bloody work."

After all, the question was not so much of the dishes from which the hungry were to eat as of the food which was to be found for them. The King and his court, his followers among the nobility and gentry, with their servants and the soldiers in attendance, were all to be quartered in Oxford, stowed pell mell in those colleges which were not converted into offices, and entertained with dignified—if somewhat oppressed—hospitality by the Royalist heads of houses. Other guests were huddled in the castle, where the governor did his best for all military men who could submit to short rations; more strangers jostled each other in the vicarages, or lodged as thick as blackberries with both friend and foe in the High Street, in North Street, and South Street, and at the Quarter Ways, or beyond the walls in St. Giles and St. Clements. There was little room for selection.

As a matter of course many persons of means brought great stores with them, and large supplies were sent in from the country round, which profited in its way from the influx of visitors. But even then the problem of food was not easy to solve, and was certain to grow increasingly difficult.

Dr. Peter Dacre was entitled to his bed and board at Oriel, and the space which courtesy and favour had granted to Mrs. Judy and Kitty was of the smallest. Nevertheless it went without saying that the whole family had to bundle out at once from the grey walls which had sheltered them so long, which Kitty, having known no other, loved so dearly, in order to enable the Provost and the college to entertain more distinguished company. Not for the world would Dr. Dacre have stood in the way of the least of the King's friends. He was proud to relinquish what slender rights he possessed in their favour. He would have put up with a waggon at a street corner. He was careless what became of himself so that some decent shelter might be found for Kitty and Mrs. Judy.

After everybody had thought, planned, and puzzled out ways and means to the utmost, the best arrangement that could be come to by the combined wisdom of Dr. Dacre, Lady Ottery, Mrs. Judy, and Kitty, was that the Doctor should have a room in the house of two old servants of the college in Oriel Lane. They could also have Mrs. Judy in the daytime to help in their kitchen and wait upon her master. Kitty was reluctant to be parted from her father, but she had to go to Lady Ottery's to fill up a few more inches of the space already so stuffed that it appeared as if it must have possessed a magical power of expansion to be able to hold the men and women with their luggage already dependent on Dame Tabitha's domestic economy.

Kitty had an opportunity of seeing Mrs. Judy every evening, since the poor woman could not get a bed where she worked in Oriel Lane. She had to trudge to and fro along the crowded streets. Even then she had to lie down on a mattress fitted in beneath a counter in an ironmonger's shop next door to Lady Ottery's lodging, a primitive resting-place which only her ladyship's interest secured for her.

"It is nought," said cheery, long-suffering Mrs. Judy. "Why, there be honest yeomen, with as comfortable granges as any in England when they are at home, lying heads and tails beside their horses in all the stables in the town. I am finely prepared with weapons to defend myself," glancing merrily at the spits and skewers, flatirons, pokers and tongs ranged around her, "should any ne'er-do-well break into the shop and think to turn me out, not to say run away with me. Partings do you say, Mrs. Kitty? Dear heart, there be nought save partings in this world; but there do be daily meetings as well, and comparing of notes with a deal of amusement at the shifts the stupidest learn. Be content that your worthy father is housed as well as he can be out of his college and without you. And you, Mrs. Kitty, you're in luck, in right-down luck, to meet such a host of fine company in your godmother's house. My lady will never see you pushed into a corner, or passed by, or lightly held. To sleep three a bed, eat at a side-table, do without a fork or a spoon when they're not forthcoming at the very moment, and have your gown and mantle crumpled for lack of a peg to hang them upon or a drawer to lay them in, that thou wilt not mind. Thou art too true a lady, with too fine a temper, though I should not say it, to complain of such trifles. And they do be a small price to pay for so great a gain, which a-many a one of country-keeping young ladies would be wild to share."

Happily for the bones of this genial philosopher, and for the rheumatism which the damp climate of Oxford was too apt to engender, Mrs. Kitty's services in the house in Oriel Lane were so generously bestowed that, on the first opening, the landlady found room for her in one of her garrets.

The King himself was fitly housed at Merton; but who would grudge him its great halls, noble staircases, and well-filled larder? Who that looked on his crowned head, bent with care, his thin face lined with anxiety, his speech faltering more wearily, his dreamy eyes roving more uncertainly, and yet withal his kingly carriage unbroken, would not have felt for him such pangs of pity as brought many a half-declared Parliament man back to his master's side to live and die with him in his tottering, falling fortunes?

Remorse for the fate of Strafford was gnawing at the King's heart. For he had signed his servant's death warrant—after dire compulsion it is true—in spite of the royal pledge that Charles would protect Strafford, who had deserted the side of the people, from the consequences of his bold attempt to make of England another France and of Charles an absolute monarch. Strafford had absolved the King from his pledge; but to a nature like the King's such absolution only meant deeper self-condemnation.

Charles was racked with misgivings as to the fate of another of his servants. My Lord the Archbishop was lying in the Tower awaiting his doom, with a patience and fortitude which became his priestly office better than all his autocratical exercise of his power and severe treatment of those who differed from him.

The King was compelled to face the spectacle of a large body of his subjects in arms in resistance of his government. He was not a man to go back even in thought from his principles. Yet he had to brood over what might have been the blunder of his balked arrest of the five members of the Commons, and of his high-handed attempt to overthrow the Scotch form of the reformed religion. He was harassed on every side by the want of money, which no forced grants and loans with their certain unpopularity, no loyal emptying of University chests at his word, and melting of plate, selling of jewels, and mortgaging of lands by his devoted adherents, no device of creating baronets and exacting the fee for each creation, could to any appreciable extent supply.

Above all, he who was a good husband and a loving father was separated from his wife and children, knowing his wife to be incurring fatigues and perils in her indefatigable exertions—wise or unwise, it was not for him to measure their wisdom—on his behalf.

Kitty saw the King again for the first time since the glimpse of royalty in her childhood, on a strange occasion. Not only was Oxford to be fortified on the side which the two rivers and the locks which united them did not guard, the bellman had summoned all able-bodied householders and college men to give labour, or provide substitutes to furnish the same, at the works on the north of St. Giles. Kitty had been brought by Lady Ottery to witness an extraordinary spectacle, such as she was never likely to see again. There Kitty beheld Fellows and scholars, with their gowns flung off, digging at the foundation, or bringing loads of earth and stones, working side by side with day labourers, soldiers off duty, artisans, and shopkeepers. The latter, representing the Puritan town, were laggard and deficient in their attendance, bringing no good will to the job.

When the King came riding up with some of his gentlemen in their long boots and cloaks, for already it was the depth of winter, to look at the operations, he noticed how badly the townspeople were fulfilling their share of the obligation. Kitty remarked how the gravity of his face deepened into gloom, while he sharply rebuked the delinquents in the ears of their fellows.

But when his Majesty came on a knot of professors, who had allowed neither the burden of years, in some cases, nor scholarly honours in others, to exempt them from the service required of them, he smiled a grateful smile like a winter's sunbeam so wan was it, and so wistful, and raised his beaver hat in reply to the shout of "God save the King," with which they intermitted their task to hail him.

Kitty had to wink away the tears suddenly dimming her eyes, for among these enthusiastic pliers of the spade and shovel who had paused to greet King Charles, she could distinguish the bald head and somewhat lantern jaws of Dr. Peter Dacre. She knew, moreover, that her father's legs, so long stretched quietly beneath his desk, and his arms, unaccustomed for many a year to any weight greater than that of a big book, were trembling in every muscle.

After a long interval of non-intercourse with the Waltons, Kitty had a letter which came by a special messenger from Islip Barnes, and was written by her cousin Prissy. It was given to Kitty by Lady Ottery in presence of Kitty's father on one of his frequent calls at Lady Ottery's lodging. He did not forbid his daughter to read the letter, for he had entertained no thought of including women in his prohibition of intercourse between the two families; neither did he ask to see what she read, for so far from being disposed to act the spy on girlish confidences, he had been accustomed to regard all women, old and young, with a chivalrous deference and indulgence.

Kitty, on her part, made haste to communicate the contents of the letter. In former times they would have sounded as of the greatest importance: It showed what the repressed excitement and distracting stir of the present life had become when such tidings, though they still thrilled Kitty with delighted sympathy and curiosity, had lost half of their weight.

Prissy wrote with pretty modesty struggling with her half-girlish, half-womanly engrossment in her tale. She took shame to herself for intruding her poor private affairs on her friends at a juncture when great public events were occupying their attention. She had also some scruple in calling on her neighbours to rejoice with her when so many of them had much cause for grief and care. But her natural guardians and councillors, her dear mother and brother, with another person among those chiefly concerned, had not seen aught in the troubles of the times to prevent their entering into a treaty of marriage on her account. Whenever there was a prospect of peace in these quarters, and the intending bridegroom could be released from his urgent military duties, her hand was to be given to Colonel Windebank of Bletchington. She had known and greatly esteemed him for the last four years, indeed ever since she grew up and he was stationed at Bletchington.

The proposed marriage had the entire approval of all his friends and hers. So far as she was permitted to judge, she had every reasonable prospect of happiness with a man whose high principles, excellent parts, and many good qualities she could honour and love, while his breeding, tastes, and fortune were all suitable and in accordance with her own. She could not rest contented in her unmerited good fortune without telling her cousin Kitty what Prissy was sure her cousin would be interested and pleased to hear, and without asking her for her prayers and good wishes. Perchance some day, when all these cruel dissensions were happily ended, she would be able to introduce Colonel Windebank specially to her, when Kitty would wonder that so proper a man had made so humble a choice.

"A very well writ and becoming letter," said Lady Ottery, who had heard it read, and was satisfied with its sentiments. "I should say the gentleman is not so humble as he is fortunate in his choice."

"Oh, yes, Lady Ottery!" cried Kitty, eagerly. "Prissy is the dearest, kindest girl, so dutiful a daughter, so affectionate a sister, so good a mistress. Everybody loves cousin Prissy!"

"Then everybody must be pleased, for her sake, to have her well settled in days when a young woman's friends have so little leisure and opportunity to settle her judiciously," remarked her ladyship, with a sigh.

"I wish Colonel Windebank may get no harm from so doubtful an alliance. I do not mean with regard to the young maid, but with respect to her people," said Dr. Dacre, gloomily.

"He must be the best judge of such danger, and can guard against it," said Lady Ottery. "He is of some soldierly rank for what I take to be his years; and is there not one of his name about the King's person? He may have interest in high quarters."

"There is one Francis Windebank in his Majesty's suite, who has been had up for papistical leanings. This other fellow is like to go off in the opposite direction," declared Dr. Peter, a little sourly.

While the others talked, Kitty was lost in a pleasant reverie all about a gallant lover and bridegroom at Islip Barnes. She was trying to recall her half-childish memories of a fair man, quite old compared to Jack and her (Kitty), and alarmingly grave, who had gone in and out with Anthony. She was thinking of some careless words which bore on this matter, that her cousin Alice had spoken on that spring day which looked so sunny and so far away, when she had gathered fritillaries with the Waltons in the Merton Meadows, and the girls had been entertained right merrily by the lads in their Magdalen rooms.

Kitty was full of speculation as to what Anthony would do without his favourite sister, as to how her mother and Alice would miss Prissy, and whether Jack would be at his cousin's wedding. Kitty was sure it would be quiet if Prissy had her way. Even though a compromise such as people sometimes spoke of were effected between the King and his Parliament, and peace proclaimed, it did not seem very likely after what had happened that Kitty would be at the wedding. Yet she had loved and depended on Prissy even more than Jack had treated his cousin as a kind elder sister.

But perhaps Jack was among the people connected with Prissy with whom it would be damaging for Colonel Windebank, a distinguished officer in the Royalist army, to have anything to do? Jack was in the other army, and, woe's me! he and Colonel Windebank might meet in battle and recognise each other as kinsmen in the very act of discharging the musket or dealing the sabre stroke which laid an enemy low.

But Kitty would not think of such terrible casualties, which God in His mercy forbid; she would rather trust and pray that Colonel Windebank might prove worthy of his promised wife. Prissy thought nothing of herself, and cared for all around her before she minded her own interests. She was the gentle, sweet sunlight of her home, purifying and ennobling in its influence; perhaps all the more so because it was a trifle subdued under the circumstances. For it shone on a widowed household, the mistress of which was an ailing woman of uncertain cheerfulness.

EVENINGS AT THE OBSERVATORY.

By SIR ROBERT S. BALL, F.R.S., Astronomer Royal for Ireland.

PART II.

HE opportunities for observing the planet Saturn are not nearly so frequent as those in which the moon may be advantageously observed. We must choose the time when Saturn comes nearest to the earth. This will take place when the earth lies nearly between Saturn and the sun. Supposing that such an occurrence is now taking place, the earth will in a short time have moved away from the true position, and the distance from the earth to the planet will be on the increase. When a year has elapsed, the earth will have returned to its original position, but it will not then be exactly between Saturn and the sun, for the great planet has moved. Like the earth, Saturn also revolves around the sun, but the magnitude of his orbit is much greater than that of the earth, and consequently the time that Saturn requires to complete a single revolution is about twenty-nine and a half of our years. Hence it follows that Saturn will have moved in the course of the year, so that the earth must pursue its journey for another twelve or thirteen days before it will again have resumed its position between the planet and the sun.

Saturn, like our earth and like the moon, is entirely indebted to the sun for its supply of light. Bright as the planet may seem, it has no intrinsic luminosity—all we see is merely the reflected solar beams. Its globe is of noble proportions. Were that globe divided into six hundred equal parts, and were each of those parts rolled into a globe, it would be a larger ball than this earth of ours, eight thousand miles in diameter.

This mighty globe also revolves on its axis, but its day is much shorter than ours, as each revolution of Saturn is accomplished in ten hours and fourteen minutes. Owing to the high speed of rotation, the bulging out at the equator of Saturn is much larger than in our more torpid earth; in fact, the departure of Saturn from the shape of a perfect globe into an elliptical form, is sufficiently shown to be at once detected without any delicate telescopic measurements. The surface of the globe presents but few features of interest, and indeed there is little on it which can be depicted in a drawing. It is of a nearly uniform whitish yellow colour, occasionally, however, marked over with faint bands. It is obvious that what we see is merely the outside of a great casing of clouds, in which the entire planet is shrouded. In fact, it seems very doubtful whether Saturn bears any resemblance to a solid body at all. Our first impression might perhaps be that the planet was a sort of rigid globe like our earth, covered by a coating of cloud, much deeper and denser, and more uniformly distributed than the somewhat intermittent clouds of which we on the earth have so often to complain. But it is not easy to see how far the interior of Saturn can, with propriety, be likened to a dense globe like ours, and for the following reason:—our earth is composed of rocks and metals, and the entire weight of the globe is about five times the weight that a globe of water would have of equal bulk. It may seem a very difficult problem to weigh the planet Saturn, and so to compare its mass with that of an equal globe of water, but the task is not beyond the resources of the practical astronomer. Whenever a planet is provided with satellites, or little attendant moons, it is possible to put the great globe into the weighing scales and to determine how heavy it is. I cannot here delay to explain fully the details of the process; suffice it is to say that it can be done with great accuracy, and the result in the case of Saturn is truly astonishing. We learn that the globe has so little resemblance to our earth that it is actually lighter than a vast globe of water would be were its dimensions the same as that of Saturn itself. Indeed, if we could imagine a model of the planet just as large and just as heavy as the planet actually is, and if that globe were cast into a great ocean of water of suitable proportions, the mighty planet would float buoyantly on the surface. It seems hard to reconcile these facts with the belief that there can be much solid matter in the interior to the planet.

But if the mere globe of Saturn offers but little attraction to the astronomer who is in search of the picturesque, the wondrous appendages to that globe give to the Saturnian system an interest and a beauty which make it peerless in the solar system. When we compare Saturn with objects not belonging to the solar system, of which we shall afterwards have to speak, it will be admitted that while some of the great star clusters awaken emotions of unparalleled sublimity, yet that in the qualities which go to make up the conception of elegance Saturn is unrivalled in the visible firmament.

It is impossible in any picture to represent the exquisite delicacy of Saturn as revealed in a great telescope, but to make our description plain we have to present a sketch which will at least give a general notion of the wondrous ring system, and let us hope will stimulate the reader to secure some opportunity for observing these objects in a telescope.

We must notice that the rings are not fastened to the globe, or, what comes to the same thing, that the globe is hung without support in the centre of the rings. There is a tendency for the rings or their material parts to fall down on the globe of the planet, but that tendency is neutralised by a rapid spin or rotation of the rings around the globe. The rings are shown slightly turned towards us in the picture. Were we able to look square at them they would be circles; when we view them edgewise they are found to be so extremely thin that they elude our vision almost entirely, except in the most powerful instruments. We speak of them as rings in the plural, because it will be seen that they are threefold. The two outer are separated by a broad line of demarcation which can be traced the entire way round. These two outer rings are apparently of the same general nature, and there are some other dark lines or divisions of a somewhat fainter description, of which one at least, the outer ring, is a permanent feature of the system.

The most delicate part of this beautiful structure demands a telescope of ample power; it has only been discovered in comparatively recent years, and is the third ring of the system. It extends from the inner margin of the second ring, half-way in towards the globe of the planet. The name assigned to this mysterious but lovely object is the crape ring, and the appropriateness of the designation will be apparent when the hue of the object as well as its curious semi-transparency is noticed. The globe of the planet can be seen through the substance of the crape ring.

The structure of the rings of Saturn suggests problems that have exercised the profoundest mathematicians. It was speedily seen that the rings could not be thin plates of solid material. No doubt a superficial glance at their appearance will suggest that such is their nature. However, it can be demonstrated by mechanical principles that the very existence of the rings would be impossible if they were what this notion would suggest. In this instance, as in many others, the pen of the mathematician has proved a more potent instrument than the telescope. What the astronomer could hardly expect to find out in his observatory has been demonstrated by actual calculation made by pen and paper. It has been proved that this wondrous set of rings consist of a multitude of small objects, each pursuing its own voyage round the planet like a little moon. These bodies are so numerous and so close together that the most powerful telescope can hardly be said to recognise their existence, though occasionally no doubt the rings do seem subdivided in a way which renders to the true view of their nature some degree of telescopic confirmation.

It is only in this way that we can offer any reasonable account of the semi-transparency of the crape ring. The little moonlets (if I may for the moment coin a word) which go to make up the rings are in the outer of the structures, so close together that they reflect what is generally seen as a continuous sheet of light; but in the crape ring the moonlets are either not so numerous or not so large as in the outer rings: the consequence is they do not appear as a continuous sheet of light; we are able in some degree to see between them, and this is how we explain the semi-transparency of the crape ring.

Nor is the Saturnian system wanting in other attractions which would render it of great interest, even were the supreme feature of the ring system absent. The planet is attended by no fewer than eight moons, some of which are easily visible in the most modest telescope, while others demand the employment of exceptionally powerful instruments.

I hope that everyone of my readers will obtain some opportunity of observing Saturn at a suitable time and with a telescope of sufficient power; assuredly they will be delighted and fascinated with the spectacle. But I ought also to add a word of warning. I have before now met with people who were woefully disappointed with the planet, even when the circumstances were indeed favourable. It is by no means uncommon to find that people on their first view of natural objects find what they actually see to be so very different from what they expected to see, that they are inclined to think some gross fraud has been perpetrated somewhere.

I remember many years ago taking a bright little boy of six to the Dublin Zoological Gardens. It was his first visit, and all the way he prattled to me delightfully of what he expected to see; the principal object of his desires being an eagle. Perhaps he had been duly instructed in the semi-fabulous stories of children being borne away by eagles; probably he was also acquainted with the much more legitimate and charming adventures of Sindbad the Sailor and the Roc; at all events, we made our way to where there was a large cage containing several fine sea eagles. I awaited his rapturous delight, but in vain. I saw the poor little chap assume a most crestfallen aspect. "They are so small," was all he said, but I could easily divine that he had expected to see something about twenty feet high, and that one of his pretty childish idols had been smashed to pieces.

On a more recent occasion I visited the Falls of Niagara. When we reached the station in the middle of the night, one of my fellow-passengers, who was not by any means a child, remonstrated with the conductor, who came round to tell us that we were at Niagara Falls. "That cannot be," said the individual in question, "for I know two things—first, that the station is not two miles from the falls; and secondly, that the noise of the falls can be easily heard twenty miles away, and as I hear nothing I know that this cannot be the station." But it was nevertheless. The conception of the thunders of Niagara in the mind of the tourist bore no more relation to the actual fact than did the Roc which the boy expected to the actual eagle which was all I could show him. Nor did I fail to observe the utterly disgusted and disappointed demeanour of my unhappy fellow-traveller the next day, when he perceived the contrast between the wretched trickle of the real Niagara and the splendour of that ideal cataract which all this journey had been taken in the hope of seeing. Had the entire of the Atlantic Ocean been seen pouring down from the moon it would not have done more than realise the expectations of volume and of altitude which so ruthlessly collapsed by the fact.

It is obvious that to properly appreciate natural scenery persons must either be naturally gifted with intuitive taste, or else they must wait until experience has taught them what to see, and what it is reasonable to expect to see. Let not anyone, therefore, be disappointed if their first glimpse of Saturn falls far short of what they expected; the beauties of it are not so glaring that they can be discerned without nice and careful observation. Remember that the crape ring is so subtle an object that multitudes of astronomers gazed at Saturn for ages and never saw it at all. Even the immortal William Herschel, with his excellent instruments and with his indefatigable perseverance, never noticed the crape ring. Let the casual visitor bear this in mind, and not expect to see Saturn exhibited as a vast panorama which he that runs can read: let him rather expect to find an exquisitely wrought miniature, which will demand the closest attention, but which will reveal ever new beauties to those who know how to woo the real loveliness of nature in the only way in which it can be won.

Widely different, indeed, are the attractions of the next object we have to mention from those of which we have just been speaking.

Saturn is a planet lighted by a sun, while the globular cluster of stars in the constellation of Perseus is itself a group of suns.

Girdling the entire heaven is that beautiful but somewhat irregular band of light, the milky way. It is composed of myriads of stars, too small and too faint, by reason of their vast distance, to be severally visible; but their different rays unite to give us the beautiful "via lactea." This is a star cluster on the grandest scale, but the several components are too much scattered to give us a brilliant or effective telescopic picture.

In the sword handle of Perseus there are two densely-packed groups of stars, which form the two celebrated clusters. They are visible to the unaided eye as faintly luminous spots, but in a grand telescope they unfold into spectacles of the most gorgeous sublimity. Each of the two clusters—and they lie close together—is sufficient to crowd the field of view with a multitude of brilliant stars, in which the curious eye will find charming configurations; in one of these clusters notably a horse shoe, in the other a beautiful system of triangles. Many of the stars are of a ruddy hue, and as contrasted with other clusters the smaller and inconspicuous stars are comparatively absent. We can, as it were, see right through the entire group at every part, to the deep blue space beyond. Such a collection of gems, and so exquisitely set, will extort admiration from everybody; I do not remember to have seen anyone disappointed at this spectacle. But it requires some previous acquaintance with a few facts in astronomy to fully realise all that the picture expresses. Unhappily we are not able to supply the most important piece of information which will naturally be asked: we are not able to give the actual dimensions of this system. The case is in this respect very different to that of the moon or of Saturn. There the arts of the astronomer have been successful in the attempt to measure and even to weigh; but in the stellar regions proper our knowledge of the weights and the distance is always scanty, and not unfrequently entirely wanting. This is so in the case of the cluster in Perseus. We do not know the distance at which it is separated from us. The methods which astronomers are in the habit of using in such investigations have, I believe, never been yet applied to the cluster in Perseus. The belief is, no doubt, that the only methods available would be inapplicable to such an object. In seeking the distance of a fixed star, the ordinary method is to select some other star in the neighbourhood apparently, but which is really very much further behind, though in the same line of sight. By a careful series of measures made in the course of an entire year, there is an apparent displacement of one of these stars relating to the other, caused by the fact that the earth has been ever changing its position in the course of its annual revolution around the sun. The method fails if the star's distance be greater than a certain limit, as it actually is with the great majority of the bodies to which the method has been employed. The difficulty of applying this process to the cluster in Perseus, is that we have no clue to guide us in the choice of the pair of stars which would be suitable; one of them must lie in the cluster, the other must be far behind it. If we had any means of identifying a pair of stars which were certainly so situated, the inquiry would be certainly undertaken; but it would not improbably happen, if a pair of stars were chosen at random, that they would be both in the cluster, and thus the attempt would be abortive. It is doubtless this feeling which has prevented astronomers from devoting their attention to an arduous and protracted series of observations, of which the result would not improbably be futile.

We may, however, feel certain that the distance of this group is quite comparable with the distances of stellar bodies which have been ascertained, and this fact is sufficient to create a conception of the true splendour and magnificence of the cluster. We know that many stars in space are really suns, of a brilliancy and a size comparable with that of our own sun; but we do not see these objects as suns, we can only perceive them as points—bright and beautiful, no doubt, but still quite wanting in the surpassing glory that our sun possesses. They are simply dwarfed into comparative insignificance by their appalling distance. Were our own sun to be taken away from us to the distance of even the nearest star, it would have to be about two hundred thousand times as far from us as it is at present. Even to our glorious orb of day we must apply the same laws of measurement as are employed in the much more humble purpose of determining the candle power of a gas flame. We know that if a candle be moved to a double distance its light is diminished to one-fourth; if it be moved to a threefold distance the light is reduced to the ninth part; and if it were taken to a tenfold distance the light is reduced to one-hundredth part of its amount. People do not always remember how greatly light decreases when the distance of the source diminishes. I remember being shown the reading room of a superb clubhouse in London, one of the attractions of which was the beautiful illumination which the incandescent electric lights in the ceiling were supposed to diffuse. But I thought the light for reading purposes very poor indeed. The fact was the designers seemed to have forgotten that a single candle one foot away is quite as good as an electric light of one hundred candle power which is even ten feet distant. It is this cruel decrease of light with distance which pales the stars to insignificance. Were our sun himself situated at the distance of the nearest of them—that is, 200,000 times as far away as he is at present—you would have to divide his present light into 200,000 equal parts, and then subdivide each of those parts into 200,000 again before you obtained a just notion of the reduction of his brilliancy. The sun in such a case would decline to the lustre of a small star not nearly so bright as many of those which twinkle around us every night.

To render due admiration to the glory of the clusters in Perseus, we must think that each of those gems which adorn it is itself a sun. I do not assert that those suns are as large as that to which we are so greatly indebted, but it may very well be that some of them or all of them are so. We know nothing which would seem to render this impossible or even unlikely. Whether there can be dark bodies in that system which revolve around these suns as this earth revolves around ours is a matter of which we are utterly ignorant. No matter how vast a dark body might be, it would be utterly invisible to us by the mere reflected light which it would emit. Let us reverse the situation for a moment and suppose an eye from the cluster in Perseus was gazing at our system, in which the sun had dwindled to a star, what likelihood would there be that such an eye could see either our earth or the planet Venus, which is a globe of about the same size? Venus no doubt, as the evening star, is a glittering and lovely object, but its beauty is only due to its raiment of sunbeams, of which it receives just so much as fall upon it. Now the sun radiates over the whole vault of heaven, and emits many millions of times as much light as Venus could intercept, hence from a distance the sun must look hundreds of millions of times brighter than Venus, and if the sun then be only a star, what chance is there that a body so inconceivably less luminous should be visible at all?

The cluster in Perseus is thus a vast associated group of many hundreds of brilliant suns diversified by various hues, from white to red. Here is indeed a spectacle on which the astronomer is never weary of gazing. Every time I look at the system I do so with renewed astonishment and admiration. It but too often happens that the pursuit of the purely technical parts of his occupation is apt to make the astronomer oblivious to the sublime and the picturesque feelings which such objects are calculated to awaken. I do not, however, think that even the most unimpressible of observers can ever renew his acquaintance with the cluster of Perseus without some sensation of rapture.

OUR AMERICAN SALE, AND HOW WE WORKED IT.

To those whose lot it is to work among the poor in London or any large city, it becomes a very pressing problem—How, with strictly limited resources, are we to meet the constantly increasing demand for aid in cases of sickness or poverty? I am sure that all who do work of this kind—district visitors, Sunday-school teachers, and others, of whom there are many among the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER—have often wondered how they are to meet the demands made upon them. The visitor—the “visiting-lady,” as the poor call her—when she goes her rounds, finds that the cases of sickness or want caused by the breadwinner being out of work are, as a rule, far more than the slender monthly allowance for relief will enable her to help as she would like to do, and she feels that it is very hard to have to go on in the work without enough of money to supply the sick and needy. And then in every parish and district there are sure to be very deserving objects in want of funds. The “Mothers’ Meeting” may be in debt; the Sunday-school library may sorely need some new books; the Temperance Society may find it hard to make both ends meet; the day schools may want help of one kind or another. It does not always do to look to the same people over and over again for support, and it is always desirable to extend the circle of money-givers, and make all who possibly can help in good works.

An “American Sale” proves a most excellent method of raising money, and it has the advantage of drawing it from other than the ordinary sources of parochial revenue; and the poor have a direct interest in making it a success, as the larger the receipts are they directly or indirectly benefited.

Now some of my readers may naturally ask, “What is an American Sale?” Well, the answer, shortly, is this:—An American Sale is a sale of all kinds of clothing, household requisites, furniture, carpets, etc., etc., which are contributed by kind friends to be sold to the poor of a parish. I do not mean new articles, but the clearing out of wardrobes and houses of many things which their original owners would never either wear or use again, but which prove very acceptable to their poorer neighbours. Why this should be called an “American” sale I know not; perhaps the idea originated there; but the scheme is a most excellent one, as our experience will show. It has been tried, I believe, in several places with very great success, and it is with the idea of making its usefulness more widely known, that I venture to describe it in this article. Some people may object, and say that the poor are not likely to buy these kind of things, or that it is only in certain places that it may succeed. All I can say to this is, just try it, and if your district is anything like the one I have in my mind, where our experience is gained (a parish within ten miles of London), I do not think you will find it fail.

Let me now describe how we set to work, and what success attended our efforts. First and foremost, it is necessary to get someone to act as secretary, who must be exact and methodical in the work; it will not do to go about it in a slipshod way. We were most fortunate in securing the services of a gentleman who entered into it most zealously and systematically. A committee of ladies, nearly all district visitors, was then formed to collect articles for the sale. Then a circular was drawn up by our secretary, stating the things most likely to sell well, and this, as you will see, was a most exhaustive one. Here is the substance of it. It began by stating that an American sale would be held on such a date, and in such a place, and requested contributions from friends of any of the following articles: “Upper and under clothing for men, women, and children, especially cloth clothes and flannel garments, socks, stockings, collars, scarves, handkerchiefs, gloves, neckties, boots and shoes (especially women’s and children’s), slippers, hats, caps, bonnets, bed-linen, table-linen, umbrellas and parasols, pieces of floor-cloth and linoleum, and carpet in strips (if not too large to be sent in a parcel), mats, rugs, curtains and fittings, articles of furniture, if in fair repair (but not large ones if sent from a distance), perambulators, bedding, and blankets; toys of all kinds, children’s picture books, Christmas, birthday, and other cards (if not written on), pictures in frames or mounted on cardboard; razors, scissors, smoking pipes, purses, etc., etc.; crockery, china, glass (but not jam pots or ordinary bottles), old dinner, breakfast, and tea services,* or parts thereof (but crockery and brittle goods should not be sent from a distance), hardware, kitchen utensils, brushes, etc., kettles and scuttles, but these should all be in good repair (leaky saucepans are of no use); knives, forks, spoons, etc. N.B.—Iron or other heavy goods and very bulky things should not be sent from a distance. Small contributions of money will be gladly received from those members of ——— parish and congregation who are unable to help in other ways."

Such was the circular we sent out, and I think the reader will admit that it was of a fairly exhaustive character, and that there are few households which could not furnish some articles, useful or ornamental, to place upon the stalls.

In most places it would not be difficult to get together enough articles to attempt a sale, at least on a small scale.

When we had sent out our circular a reasonable time was allowed to elapse, and then the exact date was fixed. The next question which arose was with regard to the tickets of admission. We found that the poor in all the districts were very ready and willing to secure them. At our first sale we had two classes of tickets; those at twopence admitted the holders to the sale half an hour before the holders of tickets at a penny each; but we found after the first experiment that this did not answer, and we have since then only issued tickets at twopence each, and opened the doors to all at the same hour. These tickets were bought up most eagerly by the people; the only restriction to the district visitors (through whom the tickets were sold) was that they should not sell them to any persons who had shops for the sale of "old clothes."

A few days before the sale the things begin to come in, and they are received by various kind friends in the parish, who take care of them until the day of the sale.

When that important occasion arrives, the heterogeneous collection of goods, consisting of all kinds of clothing, carpets, books, pictures, crockery, ironmongery, lamps, etc., which had been sent to the various centres, was collected and brought to the parochial schools, where the sale was held. This was done early in the day, and then the various stallholders came and commenced the work of pricing those things which were allotted to them. In this they were guided on the first occasion by an experienced hand in these matters, but the sellers quickly learned what the things were worth. As a rule to each stall we appointed two or three ladies and one or two gentlemen, whose duty it was to protect the sellers when the rush came. We generally divide our goods among the following stalls:—1, men's clothing; 2, women's clothing; 3, hats, bonnets, and umbrellas (at this stall remember to have a looking-glass); 4, fancy articles (this includes pictures, books, ornaments, toys, etc.), 5, carpets and curtains; 6, crockery and china of all kinds; 7, ironmongery; 8, underclothing for women and children, and men's collars and ties, etc.; 9, boots and shoes of all kinds; and last, not least, a refreshment stall where for a penny a cup of tea and biscuits or cake could be procured. This stall was very fairly patronised when our numerous clients had exhausted themselves and their purses, and met together to discuss their bargains.

These various stalls were ranged round the walls of the schoolrooms, and in front of them a stout barrier of timber and rope was fixed to prevent the crowd getting in the way of the sellers. It was found desirable to secure the services of two stalwart policemen, to prevent a rush at the first opening of the doors, and to watch over the proceedings generally.

Our hours were from 5 to 8 p.m., and, as we always hold the sales upon a Saturday, it seems to answer very well, it has never, however, been of so long continuance, as we are generally pretty well cleared out in a little over an hour. When the moment of opening draws near, every stallholder has to be at the post assigned to him or her. The moment the doors are opened the crowd, which has assembled outside some half hour previously, comes in with a rush. Like eagles upon their prey they swoop down upon the stalls, and the sellers have at first a very warm time of it. The stalls which are at once most fiercely attacked are men's clothing, women's clothing, and the carpets. The last named is generally cleared out in about half an hour, which leads us to suppose that we, as a rule, price these things too low. Around a fairly good bit of carpet the battle of the purchasers rages very fiercely, and those whose duty it is to protect the fair saleswomen have no easy task of it. The rush on the men's clothing stall is also very great, and in a marvellously short time it follows the example of the carpet and curtain stall, and the sellers are free to help others. It is quite a novel experience for those who are accustomed to ordinary bazaars, where every effort has to be made by the stallholders to attract oftentimes unwilling purchasers, to find themselves surrounded by a crowd who are only too anxious to buy, and whom it is necessary to repress in order that those who are not first in the field may have a chance of getting something.

The stall for hats, bonnets, and umbrellas often affords no small amusement, and the looking-glass has a busy time of it, as all who try on the hats or bonnets must have a look to see how they suit the would-be purchasers' style of beauty. Among the men's hats we found that silk hats were always a drug in the market; the British workman does not seem to care for such things, and often very good hats would not be taken on any terms. Felt or soft cloth hats went very fast, but it is a curious thing that it was very difficult to find one to fit the working classes. In almost every case the hats sent in by gentlemen were much too large. Whether this is due to a superior education and more reading, or not, it is hard to say, but in dozens of instances we found this was the case.

The boot and shoe stall is one which is much patronised; the articles there are often of a very miscellaneous kind, including wading stockings (sent in by some enthusiastic salmon fisher), dress boots, pumps, slippers, shooting boots, etc. Here there is apt to be a considerable congestion of purchasers, as it takes time to try on the boots, and it is necessary to have some space round the stall and some chairs or forms near at hand.

The ironmongery does not, as a rule, find so many customers, nor do we generally get in so many articles for this department, the reason being, I suppose, that while the things are fit for use, the owners do not part with them, and after that, it is not easy to find purchasers for a saucepan which, although it may be very clean and bright looking, yet refuses to hold what is put into it; and the same remark applies to kettles, coffee pots, tea urns, etc.

The refreshment stall generally gets a good many supporters when the people have spent what they have on clothing, for then they repair with their very miscellaneous bundles to refresh themselves with the harmless cup of tea, and to discuss their purchases before carrying them off in triumph.

It takes usually about two hours to clear out our stock, and at the end of that time empty stalls and weary stallholders are to be found.

We made a rule that no small children (except those in arms) should be admitted, but somehow this rule gets broken, and in the rush in at 5 p.m. we find that the wary mothers often manage to bring in a small boy or girl with them, and the said boy or girl as often gets temporarily lost in the crowd, but quickly is brought back to the mother by either the kindly policeman or one of the staff of helpers.

So much, then, for our sale, and its various incidents. Now, it may be asked what profit is likely to be made by such efforts? That depends, of course, very much on the resources of the place, and the number of kind friends who will help in the matter of sending in articles for sale. There need be no fear of not getting buyers if the thing is properly made known in the parish. Ours is probably a very typical parish of which there are hundreds about London and any other big town, and we find the people most eager to purchase tickets to admit them, and ready, only too ready, to buy when they get there. There are in every household heaps of things which the owners do not need, and which must be got rid of some way, and as a rule we have not found any difficulty, if the work is begun in time, and sufficient notice of the sale given (say three months or thereabouts), in getting articles sent in. The expenses need not be very heavy. Printing is the chief item, and the necessary help in getting the room ready on the day of the sale, and the hire of, say, cups, etc., if the parish has not got a supply, as most parishes have. The expenses of police and a man to take tickets at the door complete the list, except where the carriage of articles has to be paid, but this will not always happen.

We have had three American sales, and we find that the net profit of these, after the payment of all expenses, comes to £118. This sum was taken from the people themselves in a parish of under 8,000 in ten months!

Almost all of this money went back again to the people in the shape of extra relief, to the district visitors to meet cases of sickness, and to deserving people in misfortune. Some of it was given to mothers' meetings, some to school repairs, and all, as I have said, to the direct benefit of the working people. It would not be wise to attempt these sales more than twice a year; there were exceptional reasons for our having had three in one year.

I hope what I have said in this paper, in calling attention to this means of raising money to help the poor, may be useful to some interested in that work, and that they (if they attempt an "American Sale") will meet with the same success as we have done.

ONE WORD.

(From the German of Carmen Sylva, the Queen of Roumania.)

By THE REV. JOHN KELLY, Author of "Louisa of Prussia, and Other Sketches," etc.

It said it plainly—"Mother!"
My child hath said to me;
It laughs, again repeats it,
When asked, right winsomely.

Quite plainly—"Mother!" Ponder
This word so potent still:
I wish that I, by coaxing,
Could draw it forth at will.

But when I would to others
My skill with pride display,
Then does the silly infant
Quite dumb remain away.

Then do they laugh, and tell me
That I myself deceive;
And then the child repeats it
When they the chamber leave.

As if it were a secret,
'Tis only said to me,
And I would fain proclaim it
To all men publicly.

O men! I am a mother!
Ye winds, the tidings bear!—
My child hath mother called me—
Ye birds, the news declare!

I feel quite wild and foolish;
My happiness runs o'er,
My heart to my mouth leapeth
And laugheth evermore.

My dear old native language,
This lovely word is thine,
And every day to hear it
With fresh delight 'tis mine!

HOW TO PLAY THE ZITHER.

FROM time immemorial the inhabitants of the mountainous districts of Germany have had an instrument not unlike the dulcimer and guitar, called a zither or zither. The modern zither is so fast becoming a favourite in England that a few words about it and its advantages as a drawing-room instrument may not be wholly uninteresting.

I say modern zither, because during the last few years the mechanical appliances and power of tone of the zither have been much improved.

Perhaps our respect for this little instrument may be heightened when we remember that it is the descendant of a long line of stringed forefathers—from the semi-barbarous "kissar" of the Nubian, to the "lyre" of the highly-polished Roman. All ancient nations of whose musical instruments we have any knowledge have had their own peculiar form of stringed instruments, more or less primitive in construction, but bearing a certain resemblance to one another.

In Persia, Hindostan, and other Asiatic countries we find the "sitar," so called from the word "si," three and "tar," string. The instrument has practically five strings, which are struck with a small plectrum or hook, made of leather or horn; and modern sitar players in India are still said to enrapture their audience—not a European one, we presume!

The "kissar," or Nubian lyre, is made of wood hollowed out in the form of a bowl, and covered with sheepskin. It has five strings, usually made from the intestines of the camel, and they are also twanged with a small plectrum. The ancient Greeks had their "cythera," and the early Assyrians a lyre of ten strings; while among the Hebrews the "kinnor" took a prominent place. It was a triangular lyre, formed of two flat pieces of wood joined at right angles; across it were stretched eight or nine strings. It was held under the left arm, and played probably with a plectrum; and with an instrument such as this David subdued the "evil spirit" of Saul.

The Romans delighted in the lyre, the origin of which they ascribed to Mercury, who, according to mythological tradition, constructed it from the shell of a tortoise which he chanced to pick up on the banks of the Nile.

From primitive instruments such as these, others more elaborate were constructed and universally played. In England three hundred years ago citterns were very popular. They had now assumed larger proportions, while some of them had four double strings of wire. We are told by Playford that Queen Elizabeth "did re-create herself on a most excellent instrument, not unlike a lute, but strung with wire." And there is good reason for supposing that this was the larger kind of cittern here mentioned. Shakespeare also refers to the "cittern head" in his play of Love's Labour Lost.

The loan collection of musical instruments at the Inventions Exhibition contained several specimens, not only of the old English lyre, but also of the zither. As yet, however, these instruments were played perpendicularly, and appear to have fallen into disuse, superseded doubtless by the spinet, the harpsichord, and finally the pianoforte.

It is to the Bavarians we are indebted for the charming zither, which I beg to bring to the notice of my readers if they are not already acquainted with it. Those who have travelled in the Bavarian Tyrol will know that the zither is to the mountaineer what the bag-pipe is to the Highlander—no Tyrolese home is complete without it.

There are different kinds of zithers—the ordinary Prime, the Concert, and the Elegie. Besides these there is the Streich zither, which is played with a bow, and requires an accompaniment. It is not, however, so perfect an instrument as the other description of zithers. My reader will observe that the engraving is of a thirty-one-stringed zither, and that it is played horizontally on a table. The five strings on the keyboard are used for producing the melody. The performer presses them with the fingers of the left hand, just below the metal frets, in the same manner as a guitar is played. At the same moment the thumb of the right hand strikes the strings, a plectrum of silver or gold—called by courtesy a "ring"—being worn on the thumb-nail.

The accompaniment strings, which are made of catgut and of silk and wire, are played with the first and second fingers of the right hand, the third being reserved for the bass notes. This union of a sustained melody, with a staccato or harp-like accompaniment, renders the zither one of the most perfect of instruments. It has a remarkably sweet and sympathetic tone, its distinctive traits being richness and purity combined. The lover of music is astonished at the impressive effects, and the light and shade which may be produced by the hand of a masterly player. Elegant in form, as well as beautiful in tone, the modern zither may be favourably compared with any drawing-room instrument. One of its advantages is its exceeding portability.

There is another reason, however, why the zither should become popular in this country. It may be commenced by those who have not had the advantage of learning the pianoforte as children, and who yet feel desirous of playing some instrument. The chief requisite being an accurate musical ear, without which tuning could not be satisfactorily accomplished. This leads me to think that the zither is specially adapted for the blind, who are usually endowed not only with an exceedingly correct ear, but a delicate and sensitive touch and power of expression, which would cause the instrument at once to respond. Those who have heard bands of zithers in the Bavarian Tyrol, or the Black Forest, will, I think, unite with me in wishing that a similar union of sweet sounds may some day be heard in our schools and colleges for the blind. My readers must not infer that the zither is to be mastered with but little trouble. Beginners must expect to meet with and to overcome difficulties which at the outset will seem very hard indeed; and for the first three months the would-be zither player must exercise much patient perseverance to enable her to master the first principles of the instrument.

Those who persevere, however, will be richly rewarded by finding that their improvement increases more in proportion than it would, if they were to devote that same time to—let me say the pianoforte or the violin. In other words, it is the first step in the zither which is the most difficult, and one year of patient study of an hour a day ought to result in playing calculated to give pleasure to oneself and to those who listen. A complete and perfect mastery is not obtainable without hard work and much time, but a simple melody, played with feeling, will give an exquisite sensation of pleasure, and is more in accordance with the nature of the instrument than elaborate and brilliant pieces. It forms an exceedingly pretty accompaniment to the voice, and duets on two zithers are most effective.

Being moderate in price, the instrument is within the reach of many. A good one may be bought at Metzler's for £5. A higher sum secures a first-rate zither; while on the other hand a small prime, suitable for beginners, may be purchased for 25s. To those, therefore, who feel the power of music strongly within them, I recommend this little instrument, at once delicate, and yet capable of expressing the strongest emotion, certain that it possesses all those attributes dear to true lovers of music.

Let me conclude by quoting the eloquent account of the zither by the late Anthony Trollope: "Reader, did you ever hear the zither? It combines all the softest notes of the human voice. It sings to you of love, and then wails to you of disappointed love, till it fills you with a melancholy from which there is no escaping, from which you never wish to escape. It speaks to you as no other instrument ever speaks, and reveals to you with wonderful eloquence the sadness in which it delights. It produces a luxury of anguish, a fullness of the satisfaction of imaginary woe, a realisation of the mysterious delights of romance, which no words can ever thoroughly supply. While the notes are living, while the music is still in the air, the ear comes to covet greedily every atom of tone which the instrument will produce, so that the slightest extraneous sound becomes an offence. The notes sink and sink so low and low, that the listener dreads that something will be lost in the struggle of listening. There seems to come some lethargy, on his sense of hearing, which he fears will shut out from his brain the last, lowest, sweetest strain, the very pearl of music, for which he has been watching with all the intensity of prolonged desire. And then the zither is silent; and there remains a fond memory, together with a deep regret."

POETS OVER-SEA.

A GOSSIP ON THE RECENT POETRY OF AMERICA.

By GLEESON WHITE, Author of "Some Poetry we Read," "Ballades and Rondeaux," etc.

PART IV.

FRANK DEMPSTER SHERMAN (1860), who has published so far but a single volume, "Madrigals and Catches," is one of those who having done small things supremely, give hope of their doing great things equally well. While much of his verse is of the light, half-gay, half-grave order, dear to popular taste now, it has poetry in it, and never descends to be merely facile rhyming. At first sight the title of the book and the look of its contents suggest the lightest of the class Locker and Calverly made famous, but in many of the lyrics a more serious note is struck. These two give some idea of Mr. Sherman's style, but the variety of treatment and riper quality of his recent work reaches higher than the level attained even in these.

THE MARCH WIND.

Blow, wind of March, and sing
Your song unto the timid buds and grass—
Unclasp the fetters of the woodland spring,
Hushed in its house of glass.

Blow, wind of March, and thrill
The languid pulses of the barren trees,
Until their empty hands with blossoms fill,
And tempt the honey-bees.

Blow, wind of March, and wake
The sleeping violets with gentle words;
Spread your green canopy of leaves, and make
A shelter for the birds.

Blow, sturdy wind of March,
And burst the winter's frosty prison-bars;
Blow all the clouds from heaven's azure arch,
And stud it with white stars.

Blow, wind of March, ay, blow
Until the orchards heed your voice, and bloom;
Then whisper softly where the wild flowers grow
About the winter's tomb.

A CATCH.

If any grace
To me belong
In song,

Know then your face
Has been to me
A key.

For pitched in this Delicious tone
I've known,

I could not miss
What music slips
Your lips.

If faults be found
In any line
Of mine,

To mar the sound
Of notes that try
To vie

With yours, my sweet,
Then, always true
Do you

The words repeat,
And make sublime
My rhyme!

In "Songs of Sleepy Hollow" (1839) S. H. Thayer has written many graceful and facile verses on the district which entitles the book. While there is not any striking newness in his poems, they are neatly wrought and pleasantly written. Throughout the book suggests the work of a scholar and student, with less reminiscences of accepted models than is usual in work of its class. The idea in the following sonnet is well expressed, and musically set out in words that build up lines of considerable beauty.

A SONG WITHOUT WORDS.

Sometimes a silence breaks upon the air,
Full laden with a music mutely deep,
That lulls the senses to oblivious sleep;
No silvery chords or murmuring lips may dare
To vie in sweetness with this songster rare,
Or share its harmonies, which, voiceless, steep
The sacred revery of the heart, and keep
The spirit kindred to the spell of prayer.
The purest notes, trilled by impassioned voice,
Are wasted then upon the listless ear;
The wakened memory is left no choice
But to be wooed in flight to some old year,
When mother-lips in holy prayer were heard,
Or maiden love once spoke its sovereign word.

Maurice Thompson (1844), in his one volume, "Songs of Fair Weather" (1883), has so rare a collection of poems that a new volume from his pen is a thing to wish for. He has peculiarly marked the intuition that directs the exquisite rhythm evolved by the order of the words, quite apart from the actual scansion of the lines. There is distinction in his work, and while faithfully portraying nature, the result is not mere photography in black and white, nor even clever colour studies, but reflections of light and movement, and of the human interest that we call poetic. Whatever the ultimate standard he acquires in the Walhalla of American song, such refined and artistic poetry deserves special note. Not only do his lyrics read easily, but like a real melody they recur again unsought yet insistent, after being read but once.

AT NIGHT.

The moon hangs in a silver mist,
The stars are dull and thin;
Sleep, bending low, spreads loving arms
To fold the whole world in.
The air is like a spell; the hills
Waver, now seen, now lost,
The pallid river wanders by
A vast unquiet ghost.
A horned owl on silent wings
From out a cavernous space,
Speeds like a bolt of darkness hurled
Athwart the shimmering space,
Above the vale, from wood to wood,
And leaves no trace behind,
Like some dark fancy flung across
A pure and peaceful mind.

In "Etchings in Verse," Mr. Andrew F. Underhill hit upon a very happy title, after the accepted model, "Proverbs in Porcelain," and other fanciful designations. One, a humorous plaint to Mrs. Herrick, said to be the censor of poetry to the Century magazine, would be worth its space, could it be spared here. The other verses are sprightly and sad, but always graceful in their expression.

David Wasson's Poems, collected in 1883, are marked by lofty thought, in dignified, stately utterance. Their largeness of view and nobility of purpose stamp them at once as poetry of no mean order. One that has been called "a classic, and unrivalled in American poetry," entitled "All's Well," seems hardly to justify such eulogy; it is besides too long to quote here, but the two that are given may bear witness of the importance of the book.

LOVE AGAINST LOVE.

As unto blowing roses summer dew,
Or morning's amber to the tree-top choirs,
So to my bosom are the beams that use
To rain on me from eyes that love inspires.
Your love, vouchsafe it, royal-hearted few,
And I will set no common price thereon;
Oh! I will keep as heaven its holy blue,
Or night her diamonds, that dear treasure won.
But aught of inward faith must I forego,
Or miss one drop from Truth's baptismal hand;
Think poorer thoughts; pray cheaper prayers, and grow
Less worthy trust, to meet your heart's demand?
Farewell! Your wish I for your sake deny;
Rebel to love, in truth to love am I.

TIME.

I. From Below.

"I have a tyrant-master, Time,
Whose small apprentice I am bound;
To each desire of his must rhyme
My ceaseless duty in servile round.
Two haughty officers, Night and Day,
Still whip and wind me every way;
Were Destiny my better friend,
This harsh apprenticeship had end!"

II. From Above.

"There is a shadowy weaver, Time,
Thwarting his threads below me far;
With lidless eye, from height sublime,
I look upon him, like a star,
But dwell in calm, cerulean sky,
Above that region where his ply
Makes changing season and chequered year
Eternity my mansion here!"

One great personality, whose utterances in spite of their unconventional melody and rugged disregard of the accepted attributes of poetry, wield a gigantic influence, has been left unnoticed here. But the canvas was too small to include Walt Whitman, and, curiously enough, his disciples seem so far almost exclusively upon this side of the ocean. To-day in England dozens of pages of our younger poets show unmistakably traces of close study of his works, and keen appreciation of his genius; but among his fellow citizens hardly a line recalls him, however faintly. Later on in these columns I hope to atone as far as possible for the apparent neglect.

The few poets here quoted are but a tithe of the large number who, in spite of the too often repeated axiom that nobody reads or cares for poetry now-a-days, brave the neglect of the cold reception, and put forth volume after volume. It is said that only those who write verses themselves ever read other poetry. If so, the would-be poet has a very large audience—one, too, that is to some extent trained by unconscious education to a standard of perfection, however low their ideal may be. But had not space forbidden, Will Carleton, whose ballads, somewhat akin to those of Mr. G. R. Sims, are the delight of amateur reciters; Edmund Clarence Stedman, whose own fame is shadowed by his altruistic attempt to acquire fame for others, for his "Victorian Poets" and its companion volume "American," are probably the most comprehensive treatises upon contemporary workers that any art has seen in any age; Richard Watson Gilder; Charles Warren Stoddard; Charles Henry Phelps; Colonel Hay, whose curiously bold rhymes charm the very readers they repel; James Whitcomb Riley, whose "Old Fashioned Roses" has lately been published in England, and whose dialect verse has become very popular; Joel Chandler Harris (Uncle Remus), with his plantation rhymes; Burns Wilson, Sidney Lanier, F. W. Loring, Charles de Kay, George Parsons Lathrop, and many other names come to mind with self-consciousness of culpable neglect in omission. Yet to include them were well-nigh impossible, and as Mr. Douglas Sladen, who introduced to us a new world of poets from Australasia, is even now working in America upon a similar scheme to set forth specimens of its living poets—this time, however, with the vast resources of a continent, not in the first stage of civilisation, but in many respects ahead of the mother country—the reproach that we know so little of the contemporary poets of the United States may cease to exist. And, in sober truth, it is to be feared a similar series of gossips upon English versifiers, in an anthology restricted to the "coming men," would reveal to most of us depths of ignorance that we scarce suspect.

Canada, with Professor G. D. Roberts, whose "Orion" and "In Divers Tones" are notable volumes, and Bliss Carman, a young writer of whom more will be heard, can hardly be noticed under the "Poets Over-Sea." They are indeed geographically near our cousins, but rightly come into English limits, and take place with our next-door neighbours, as Englishmen who write for English audiences.

So these papers end, with a feeling of regret that the space already usurping the fair proportions allotted to it in a magazine with so many tastes to cater for, was not a hundred times greater, but with a much keener regret that such valuable opportunity could not have been made a perfect storehouse of flawless examples.

A cluster of jewels tossed into a common box look mere crystals, more or less brilliant, but hardly rarer in value than the torrent of coloured fragments that pour from a broken kaleidoscope. Yet there may be gems among them that, if detached from their fellows and set apart, whether in the diadem of an empress or reposing upon velvet in a jeweller's window, would make their royal worth apparent.

Out of such treasure trove as the whole mass of American poetry offers, though an Aladdin's lamp has given access thereunto, time admits only of the lucky seeker loading his wallet with such scant purpose as he may. He throws down here an armful of the glittering things, leaving behind, perhaps, some of the rarest jewels, and proudly exhibiting some mechanically built-up imitations. But that is the greedy treasure-hunter's error, and no fault of the treasury whence they have been so indiscriminately drawn.

NOTE.—"The Heart of the Weed," quoted as by Nora Perry, on page 231, was published anonymously by Houghton, Mifflin and Co., and is the work of Lilian Cabot Perry.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER V.

AWAY from England! with the white cliffs receding gradually from view, the green waters churning into yeasty foam behind the good ship, the great hillocks of the Channel, so unlike in form to the conventional idea of a wave, rising and subsiding as the vessel cuts along!

There was a stiff breeze on the August morning when Mrs. Lancaster, Dorothy and Evelyn left Dover, and the sky was stormy; but Evelyn delighted in the rough caresses of the wind and the tossing of the sea. She was a good sailor, and the fact increased the consciousness of general superiority to the majority of her sex which had of late been gaining force in her mind. Happy, glowing with health, expectant of the coming delights of Swiss scenery, she made a pretty picture as she stood in her blue serge frock, all blown about on the upper deck, while Mrs. Lancaster, Dottie and the maid were extended helpless in the ladies' cabin below.

The journey into Switzerland, via Laon, is no longer a novelty; and it is needless to describe how the travellers sped straight away from the Calais pier, through north-eastern France; and how the early morning broke upon the romantic gorges, climbing forests, and white cliffs of the Jura. At the busy station of Bâle they alighted for breakfast, and were soon off again en route for Lucerne.

They had chosen for a temporary resting-place, in preference to one of the large hotels, a pension on the hill side, from the balconies of which they could look down upon the two quaint spires of the cathedral, then away across the end of the lake, busy with its landing-place, steamers, and station, to Mount Pilatus, contrasting in stern and gloomy desolation with the lively scene below.

The pension was not large enough to accommodate all its guests, and Evelyn and Dottie, to their great joy, were lodged in a sequestered house in a grove of walnut trees, about five minutes' walk away.

"A fit haunt for a poetess," cried Dottie, in high glee, as after breakfast they retired to this lonely domain to unpack and rest. "Mariana in the Moated Grange!"

"Only it isn't moated, and it isn't a grange," rejoined Evelyn.

"Oh, you shouldn't be too literal! Isn't this a dear, delightful place? We shall be able to enjoy it to the full these few days before we go up to Engelberg."

Over the long tables in the cheerful salle-à-manger, the two girls cast a curious eye as they entered it for luncheon that day. Evelyn and Dottie were not yet blasées by manifold experience. It was only their second visit to Switzerland, and Evelyn specially, eager and receptive, was ready for new impressions on every side. Among the forty or fifty guests—British matrons, fresh young girls, spinsters of that peculiar antiquated type only to be discovered in foreign boarding-houses—she quickly singled out one lady as being original in appearance. This lady, small, spare, middle-aged, was remarkable for the perfect whiteness of her hair, brushed up in Marie Antoinette fashion above her brow; and the whiteness, in another and a yellower shade, of the skin of her face, which was creased into wrinkles in a curious way, and reminded one of soft parchment. With these two shades of white contrasted the brilliancy of her black eyes, which literally gleamed from beneath her delicate but finely marked eyebrows. There was something in her appearance as if she had been prematurely withered physically by too hot a sun or too rapid living, while her mind was evidently in its vigour of youth. The adjectives, weird and dainty, might both have been applied to her at once, incongruous though they seem.

Evelyn was inly meditating as to her nationality as she stood on the balcony that evening, when she found the little lady at her side. A commonplace question as to Evelyn's acquaintance with Lucerne at once revealed the stranger's nationality. She was American, but she pronounced it Amuh-ican.

"You are going up to Engelberg? So am I too," she observed. "I am all alone, except for my maid. Are you fond of reading?"

This abrupt question was suggested by Arnold's Poems in Evelyn's hand.

"My countrymen read a great deal of poetry," she continued in her undulating tones. "We have some fine poets of our own, but none to approach your greatest."

Mrs. Lancaster, who was reposing her ample form in a chair near Evelyn, thought this a favourable opportunity to remark affably—

"My niece writes poetry herself. She has just published a book."

"Ah, this is very interesting. You are a poetess!" cried the bright-eyed lady. "And now you can tell me all about English literary society."

Evelyn found it most embarrassing to have to confess, as she quickly had to do, that she did not enjoy the personal acquaintance of Browning, Tennyson, William Morris, Lewis Morris, nor Matthew Arnold; that she had in fact never seen one of them; that she had read very little of Browning, and could not understand anything she had read, excepting the "Pied Piper," "Home Thoughts from Abroad," and a few shorter poems; that "Paracelsus" was a sealed book to her, and so forth.

"Then are you any relation of Browning's 'Beautiful Evelyn Hope' who died?" inquired the lady, archly.

"My father gave me the name Evelyn because he was fond of Browning, and of that poem in particular," replied the girl flushing.

Without seeming to be impertinent, this bright-eyed little woman proceeded to put her through an examination from which Evelyn came out, as she felt in a sort of rage, with anything but flying colours. Then had she read any American poets? Well, Longfellow was tolerably familiar, but she knew little more than the names of Bryant, Whittier, and Lowell.

"You have a great deal of pleasure to come," remarked the lady, with a tinge of surprise in her voice. "And as you have read so little, you will have the greater opportunity of being original. You will lend me this book of yours?"

Evelyn rather wished she need not comply, and for the second time felt a desire to conceal "Day-dreams" from the public gaze. But she was obliged to produce one of the little store of volumes she had brought, and then excused herself from further conversation by the fact of her long journey and desire for rest. Mrs. Lancaster was already nodding in her chair, unmoved by the fair vision before her of gleaming Lucerne and dusky Pilatus.

The next few days passed, as days at Lucerne generally do pass, in excursions on the lovely lake, and to the top of the Righi. Evelyn saw a great deal of her American friend, Miss Aurelia Q. Wentworth, and was by no means sure whether she liked or detested her. Miss Wentworth's familiarity with almost every standard English work was discouraging to Evelyn, who, though she imagined she had read extensively, had in reality made her Tennyson and Mrs. Browning go a very long way. To find an American perfectly at home in English literature, and with all sorts of unknown quotations on the tip of her tongue, was distinctly galling to pride—and Miss Wentworth did not allude to "Day-dreams" at all; an evident proof of lack of appreciation, and a stab to the authoress's self-esteem. Still, the bright little woman's intelligence and the charm of her conversation, enhanced by the curious accent, were so great that Evelyn could not shun her society. Dottie frankly declared she thought her "delightful fun," and carried on sparring matches with her, relative to national institutions, in which the English champion had decidedly the worst of it.

"Miss Wentworth says she's coming with us to Engelberg," said Dottie, as the two girls made their way to the Moated Grange. "She says she and her maid will join with us, and the carriage holds six—two outside, four in. She says we're just the nicest English people she ever met."

"Frank, at all events," cried Evelyn, laughing. "But I think she might have waited till we asked her."

Miss Wentworth, however, was not inconvenienced by over-much shyness, and showed a happy confidence that her arrangement was the best for all parties.

So the four ladies, with their two maids, drove away one cloudy August morning from the lovely pension on the hill—down the steep road into Lucerne, round the head of the lake, and along the pleasant country on its western bank, with Mount Pilatus frowning above them, until they reached the bridge across the narrow channel that separates the Alpnacher See from the rest of the lake. Lucerne is of strange and irregular shape, as all those happy people know who have been privileged to glide over its surface, and is rather like an aggregation of lakes than one alone.

The carriage rattled across the frail wooden structure to Stansstadt, with its square-pinnacled tower, then through orchards and pastures to Stans.

"Oh, look at that monument! What can it be?" cried Dottie, as they passed the square adjacent to the handsome parish church, and caught sight of a marble group in a niche on the further side.

"Well, that is a monument to Arnold von Winkelried," responded Miss Wentworth. "Miss Hope will tell us all about him, for I see there is a sonnet to Liberty in her 'Day-dreams,' and she apostrophises Swiss patriots among others."

But Evelyn could not remember anything about Arnold von Winkelried. She had a vague idea he was a hero; but as to when exactly he lived, or what he did, she had no accurate knowledge. Her transient vexation at this renewed failure to distinguish herself in the American lady's eyes was, however, soon forgotten, for they quickly began to see that they were really entering the mountain land. They were driving along a narrow valley, watered by an impetuous river. On either hand, lawn-like slopes of exquisite greenness and smoothness ran steeply up into forest, overtopped by gigantic crags, the summits of which were sometimes veiled in cloud.

"The sun only shines here for one hour in the morning during the winter," announced Evelyn, glad to show that she did know something definite about their new surroundings.

At Wolfenschiessen, a spot of exquisite loveliness, the party lunched at a quaint and simple hostelry. Then they drove on again. The scenery grew in beauty, and soon Evelyn, who loved waterfalls, was loud in rapturous exclamations at the sight of wild leaps of water coming down from wooded heights. What a glorious region she was entering! Surely, the girl reflected, she should gather material for new efforts in this world of fairyloveliness! She would write another book of poems, and call it "Echoes from Engelberg." Her whole nature thrilled with happiness. Dottie, too, was in the highest spirits, and Mrs. Lancaster's round face glowed with pleasure, a little mingled with apprehension at the coming climb. For had she not read that the way past Grafenort was excessively steep? And was she not accustomed only to smooth and easy bowling along the roads to and from London?

Beyond Grafenort the scenery became magnificent. The road turned a corner, so to speak. And what a corner! A corner of mountain clad in forest; and across the river a lofty wall of precipice piled on precipice. Through a beautiful forest the road now began steadily to ascend in long windings. Soon the roar of the torrent grew louder, and the road came out upon the edge of a steep descent to the raging waters below.

"Evelyn! Evelyn, my dear! I must insist on it that you sit by the driver, and tell him to be very careful," cried Mrs. Lancaster, whose customary calmness was disturbed at once by any imaginary danger in driving.

Evelyn's superior knowledge of German gained her this distinction, which she obediently accepted, displacing a maid. The driver was loquacious, but his remarks were not encouraging. This was nothing to what was coming; oh dear no; wait and see the Pferd-Himmel—the heaven of horses!

"What does he say, Evelyn? I must insist on knowing!" cried her aunt, as the carriage stopped.

"He says we must some of us get down and walk, and that we shall soon come to a good place for afternoon tea," replied Evelyn, translating the latter part only of their coachman's remarks; and suiting the action to the word, the girl stepped on through the forest in unspeakable delight. She did not want Dottie's lively chatter by her side, nor Miss Wentworth's inquisitions—she wanted to be alone in the temple of Nature, into whose mystic shrine she was penetrating with joy ineffable.

"Where are you going, Evelyn?"

faintly called Dottie, panting far behind.

"I am taking the 'short cut for walkers,'" responded Evelyn, proudly, as she ascended the path that leads steeply from turn to turn of the more gradual carriage road.

But let walkers to Engelberg beware, especially if they are deep in poetic reverie; for after being landed safely on fresh turns of the road two or three times, Evelyn took a path which was not a genuine short cut at all. She climbed on and on, surprised that she did not see the familiar level of the high road loom before her; and at last, as her path narrowed off, she became aware that she was encompassed by forest alone; in fact, that she was certainly lost.

This situation, however acceptable from its poetic side, was not without its practical drawbacks. Evelyn was fortunately too sensible to run hither and thither, and get more and more bewildered; neither was she enticed by the lovely profusion of yellow foxgloves and tall dark-blue gentian around her, the trailing ivy and the luxuriant moss on the rocks. She quickly decided that she had better go back by the path she had taken; and, descending it with no little trepidation, she was at length rewarded by seeing the high road again. The great thing now was to overtake her party. She toiled along, fearful lest she should never reach them; but at last she came upon a woodside hostelry, with tables on the opposite side of the road, at which Mrs. Lancaster, Miss Wentworth and Dottie were sitting. The expression of dismay upon their faces quickly gave way to delight when they saw Evelyn.

"Oh, we thought you were lost, Evelyn! Now we can have our tea in peace. Where have you been?" cried Dottie, making room for her cousin.

"Oh, my dear girl, I have been so terrified!" ejaculated her aunt.

"A short cut is not always so very short," remarked Miss Wentworth. Evelyn was too tired to do anything but accept the situation. She wished somehow that she were not always showing, in some little way, to a disadvantage before Miss Wentworth, who continued to utter gentle gibes at the poetess and the unpoetic beaten track. But after all it was but a trifle.

And soon they were driving along

"Pferd-Himmel;" so called, perhaps, because of the ease with which both horses and freight could quit the present life. Yet with the practised Swiss drivers there is no danger. Down, down, shot the precipice to the raging torrent incalculably far below, and the man poured into Evelyn's ear the gratifying intelligence that he had driven along the brink once at midnight. The great thing to prepare for Pferd-Himmel was, he said with emphasis, to drink enough—not too much, but enough—that was really necessary! Evelyn was an abstainer, and tried to improve the occasion, but in vain. And poor Mrs. Lancaster's terrors were not of long duration; for the road now turned abruptly to the left, and a fair green Alpine valley spread out before the travellers. Above, the snowfields of the Titlis stretched in dazzling whiteness high into heaven, and farther on, rocky pinnacles stood up from regions of snow and ice, seeming to shut in the narrow vale. It was a scene of peaceful loveliness, and the monastery bell was ringing out the Ave Maria. For it was toward evening, and they had now reached Engelberg.

THE MARY WARDELL CONVALESCENT HOME FOR SCARLET FEVER.

By ANNE BEALE.

THE jubilee of our beloved Queen, June 21st, 1887, was variously celebrated all over the world. On that auspicious day a touching little ceremony took place at the Mary Wardell Convalescent Home, Brockley Hill, Stanmore, which not only gives a pretty scene to the imagination, but shows the reality of the isolation necessary in cases of recovery from scarlet fever. The foundress of that noble institution wished to mark the day; but how? She organised a little fête champêtre among the trees, to which all the convalescents were bidden, but to which no extern could be invited. Adults and children, nurses and servants, matron and sister, however, formed a goodly company, and "the lame, the halt, and the blind" managed to gather to the feast. A prominent feature was a splendid cake, properly sugared, and ornamented with a V. R., and other royal emblems, presented by the baker in token of gratitude for a child restored to health at the Home. But the prettiest feature of the fête was the planting of a rose, a shamrock, and a thistle, by three of the juvenile convalescents, the youngest of whom was just three years of age. All the party wore medals commemorative of the jubilee, and if the reader will conjure up the scene, he or she will understand something of what scarlet fever means.

Such patients as were able to walk reached the spot set apart for the little festivity readily enough; but there was one to whom the fell disease had left the heritage of spinal-complaint, and who had to be carried; others who were blinded for life, one crippled; and all more or less shaken, albeit on the road to recovery. Their benefactress, Miss Mary Wardell, moved fearlessly amongst them, and the nurses looked like so many big poppies in their costume of Turkey red. Of course they had white caps and aprons, but the scarlet predominated. This colour suggests more than meets the eye. There was a terrible panic in the neighbourhood when this Convalescent Home was first proposed, for everybody knows how infectious is scarlet fever. Even the nurses would spread the malady! So they were attired in this most conspicuous of colours, which made them visible from afar to all who feared contagion. And who does not? Every one, apparently, except the doctors and the invulnerable few; for the fine house and grounds have been isolated by high walls and a cordon of orchard, over which the patients may not pass.

As they sat, grouped about on that auspicious day, they saw only the said house and grounds, and thanked God that there was a receptacle for those who, when dismissed from hospital or otherwise situated, were tabooed by their fellow creatures. It is estimated that 20,000 scarlet fever patients annually infect our already fetid London atmosphere. It is no wonder, therefore, that all the celebrated medical men in the metropolis rallied round Miss Wardell, and that one of the patriarchs of that benevolent brotherhood said—

"I wish I were a young man, that I might plant my foot into the work, and help you with all my might."

To return to the jubilee party and what they surveyed. A large, roomy mansion on a hill, with one storey for private patients, who could afford to pay three guineas a week for convalescence, and another storey for those who are admitted for fifteen shillings, and for children who may, with God's blessing, be restored at the smaller charge of twelve shillings. Those on-lookers knew that the process of disinfection went on from morning till night; and that even the drainage was, so to say, isolated. In the outcry of the public, it was stated that drains convey infection, and so an expensive system of drainage has been carried out which communicates with no outside drains. Everything, in short, that philanthropy, aided by modern science, can do has been done to render Stanmore Convalescent Home an isolated place of recovery from a fell and infectious malady.

While our jubilee party enjoy their al fresco retreat, we will glance through a few of the rooms they have vacated. They are all tastefully painted and furnished so as to please the eye of the invalid. Pictures and portraits, presented by friends, adorn the walls, and in the rooms named after different benefactors, their portraits are conspicuous. Books, toys, ornaments have been presented by many generous benefactors, and various firms have given of their manufactures. Of the liberality of the heads of great London establishments one cannot write too warmly; for they seem ever ready to contribute to the well-being of the multitude. Here is even a piano given by Messrs. Brinsmead, and as to books! the Religious Tract, Christian Knowledge, and Bible Societies have all helped to form a library. Indeed, we are inclined to believe that good overrides bad in this happy England of ours, for no sooner is a great work contemplated than means to complete it flow in. Scarcely ten years ago Miss Mary Wardell first imagined this Home, and in four years she had collected £12,000, and it was opened by the Prince and Princess of Wales, ever "ready for every good work." Meetings and a Rose Show at the Mansion House; Concerts at Grosvenor House and Dudley House; a Drawing-room Meeting at Mr. Gladstone's; a Lawn Tennis Tournament, and helps everywhere, aided our foundress in her arduous work. She had seen poor children rejected from charitable institutions, and grown-up people returned to their homes to spread infection, because there was no retreat such as this for the convalescent; and it was "laid on her heart," as she expressed it, to find some place of refuge for the infected until all danger of contagion had passed. And thus, from the efforts of one lady, this Home arose. Medical men tell us that such places should be multiplied; for it is when the poor patient has spent his allotted time in the hospital and is dismissed, that the Home steps in and sets him on his feet again to resume the work for daily bread. Numbers of working-girls, stricken by contagious disease and sent off to fever or small-pox hospital, return to their business before their health is set up, or the disease radically cured. They spread infection even through the very work they do; and it is to avoid this and complete their cure that convalescent homes are such inestimable boons.

At Brockley Hill there is even a private omnibus to fetch the patient, and so prevent the terrible calamity of taking the disease in railway carriage or cab. The carelessness of the world is great, and amounts to intense selfishness. Friends carry off a patient for change of air, heedless of consequences to others. An unsuspecting fellow-passenger, or successor in cab or omnibus, takes the disease, and perhaps loses a life. Or the lodging-house keeper lets rooms, non-disinfected from germs of a disorder left by some previous inmate, and the new-comer falls ill. Therefore we cannot be too thankful for the omnibus that travels almost from Dan to Beersheba, or in common parlance, from Edgware to Earl's Court, from Whitechapel to Watford, to bring patients to Stanmore free of expense. If, however, the distance be great enough to require a second horse, the patient pays for the additional animal. As for the omnibus, it must be tired of the disinfecting process, for it performs this species of quarantine between every fresh journey. The poor vehicle must be tightly closed, while a solution of hydrochloric acid is poured upon half a pound of chloride of lime and placed in an open pipkin inside it. And as for the house, it takes one's breath away to hear of all the acids, sodas, carbolic soaps, sanitas, and what not employed in rooms and laundry. Truly a convalescent home for fever patients is no sinecure.

Passing from the jubilee year to this year of grace, 1889, just five years since the Home was opened, we would ask our readers, far and near, to help it on by their prayers and alms, and to make it generally known, so that the patient may be restored to health, and the spread of disease arrested. Miss Mary Wardell will herself gladly communicate with friends interested in her work. She resides at 55, Stanley Gardens, Belsize, London, N.W.

It is difficult for people who have not themselves suffered to realise the various legacies left by scarlet fever. Not, alas! such as we receive thankfully from departed friends, but such as a partially defeated enemy may be supposed to leave behind him. He generally makes himself remembered, and many a life-long bodily ailment may be traced to him. Truly his legacies are not to be desired. It behoves us, then, to strive to be independent of them. We should observe to the utmost of our power, the laws of health, cleanliness, sobriety, and "moderation in all things." The scriptural motto, "Cleanliness is next to godliness," should be written up in all our houses, and followed, as all scripture ought to be. Then, both disease and death would often be averted. Let our girls especially take this to heart, since much depends on them. Each woman can do something to make home, however poor, clean and attractive.

We seem to be straying from our subject, but we are not. No one has a charmed life, and uncleanness ministers to all sorts of infection. Even the doctor, nurse, Bible-woman, and other workers among the poor have taken refuge in our Stanmore Home after scarlet fever, caught while doing their duty. But lately a Christian doctor and his wife have left, convalescent; and during one year, 1887, the report records "eight trained nurses and nineteen nurses or relatives, who had been in attendance on patients," as having been at the Home. These were out of a total of 306, of whom nearly 200 were children.

Thus, we see the necessity of all the disinfecting, care, cleanliness, and isolation practised at the Home, and would urge on the multitudes outside liable to the disease to use every precaution against it, since "Prevention is better than cure."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

COOKERY.

INDUSTRY should boil all the marmalade chips first—in water, of course.

MAYBLOSSOM will find "Oatmeal Scones" on page 607, vol. vi.

MADGE.—To make oatmeal or wheaten cakes take $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of coarse oatmeal, and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. flour, or $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of coarsely-ground wheatmeal, one dessertspoonful of sugar, one heaped teaspoonful of baking powder, mixed together; melt 2 oz. (or 3 oz.) of butter or lard in half a teacupful of milk, make a light paste, cut it into cakes, and bake in a moderate oven. The oatmeal or wheatmeal should be sifted to get rid of the chaff. If intended for use with cheese, of course there should be no sugar in the cakes.

MARGERY.—A "toad in a hole" is made thus: Beat two eggs, stir in two tablespoonfuls of dried flour, half a saltspoon of salt, and a pint and a quarter of milk. Beat the batter for twenty minutes, grease a pie-dish, pour in the mixture, and bury in the latter $1\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. of beef or mutton, then bake in a moderate oven for an hour and three-quarters.

P. CHUMP.—The reason that the icing on your cakes becomes brown after the baking is because you employ too hot an oven. Perhaps, also, you do not cover it with white paper. Keep a cool oven, at a steady heat, and take a longer time, throwing into the recipe a little more of patience, which is a very valuable ingredient in cookery, as in everything else you undertake. It is perfectly legal to marry a first cousin, or any cousin, provided that he be not also a brother-in-law.

HOUSEKEEPING.

MAORI.—You can make the mixture of Epsom salts for frosting the window more satisfactory and permanent by adding a little gum to the water before you put in the Epsom salts. Only enough water should be used to melt them. Apply with a brush. There is nothing to prevent your making a pattern on the panes, by using a long ruler and the end of a pencil, and scraping the salts off in lines, so as to form diamonds or squares on the pane. This will give you more light, as you suggest, but unless carefully done the thing will certainly look "home-made."

BRITOMART.—Rub the saucers with a little ammonia and water.

WATFORD.—A little lemon rubbed on the fingers, or rubbing with a piece of smooth pumice-stone, will generally take off stains of all kinds.

NINA.—"To take ink-stains from linen" see page 607, vol. vii. "Iron moulds," see page 95, vol. ix. The leather bag may perhaps be improved by a little benzine; see also page 96, vol. vii.

MATILDA R.—The vinegar plant makes the cheapest vinegar, we think, and is used as follows: Take a large white glazed jug, holding three or four quarts of water, mix in it half a pound of coarse brown sugar, half a pound of treacle, and two and a half quarts of water. Stir the mixture till all be melted, then put in the vinegar plant on the top, and tie a paper over the top of the jug. If the weather be warm, the vinegar will take about six weeks to make; if cold, two weeks longer. Strain it carefully, and then boil for about ten minutes, and when cool pour into bottles for use. Yes, the plant grows certainly during the making of the vinegar, and it can be used many times over.

WORK.

M. M. R.—The best gymnasium suit is made with a pair of trousers, like a divided skirt, and a long, loose jacket, reaching nearly to the knee, with a belt. Some people prefer a combination, and a small skirt, put on over the combination, with a belt.

COLWYN BAY.—Some articles on the rearing of silkworms are now being given in the "G.O.P." It is a most interesting subject.

LADDIE'S DARLING.—A bicycle cap is generally made with a round crown and a straight band round it, without a peak—a smoking or military cap, in short. We think if you are clever, and have the size of the head which it is to cover, you will not need a pattern.

GRACE.—To clean beaver fur, you should use hot bran or oatmeal, which should be well rubbed in to take out grease. Brush, and beat it with a switch afterwards.

RES AUGUSTA DOMI.—The infant's clothes to fasten in front can be made like a princess shape. This was the idea; and you could easily carry it out yourself by getting a small shape and cutting out one or two patterns to try.

BESSIE LAMBERT.—Take up knitting for the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, or work for the Kyrle Society, or for the poor near you. Or if you do not like any of these fields of usefulness, join a correspondence class, and take up a regular course of reading and study. As you live in the country, can you not keep bees or poultry? Both of these are interesting and profitable pursuits, and lead to much out-of-door life.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A. S. S.—You write very sweetly and freely, with a poetic fancy. The emphasis is wrongly placed at times, and the number of feet incorrect; but you should study the rules of metrical composition, and persevere, we think. The poems sent are rather long for insertion, and would need too much correction.

A. P. L.—There is an institution for trained nurses for Leicester in Ayleston Road. You could inquire there as to age and terms.

H. S. B. writes for a hospital for incurables in London; but does not say for what disease, age, nor what sex; nor whether the patient can pay. Unless we knew something more we could not answer.

BROKEN-DOWN COOK has our hearty sympathy. Why not consult a doctor and get some proper treatment? All the symptoms she mentions point to the liver being out of order, and she must diet herself to avoid such breakdowns, and leave off beer, if taken. Many thanks to her for thinking of the recipe.

ROSEBUD.—Over-watering is the general rock on which amateur window-gardeners come to grief. No water should be given till the earth feels dry to the fingers, and no water should be allowed to stand in the saucers.

LA PETITE.—Of course your brother should avoid colds and coughs, should wear flannels, and take cod-liver oil to keep up his health and strength.

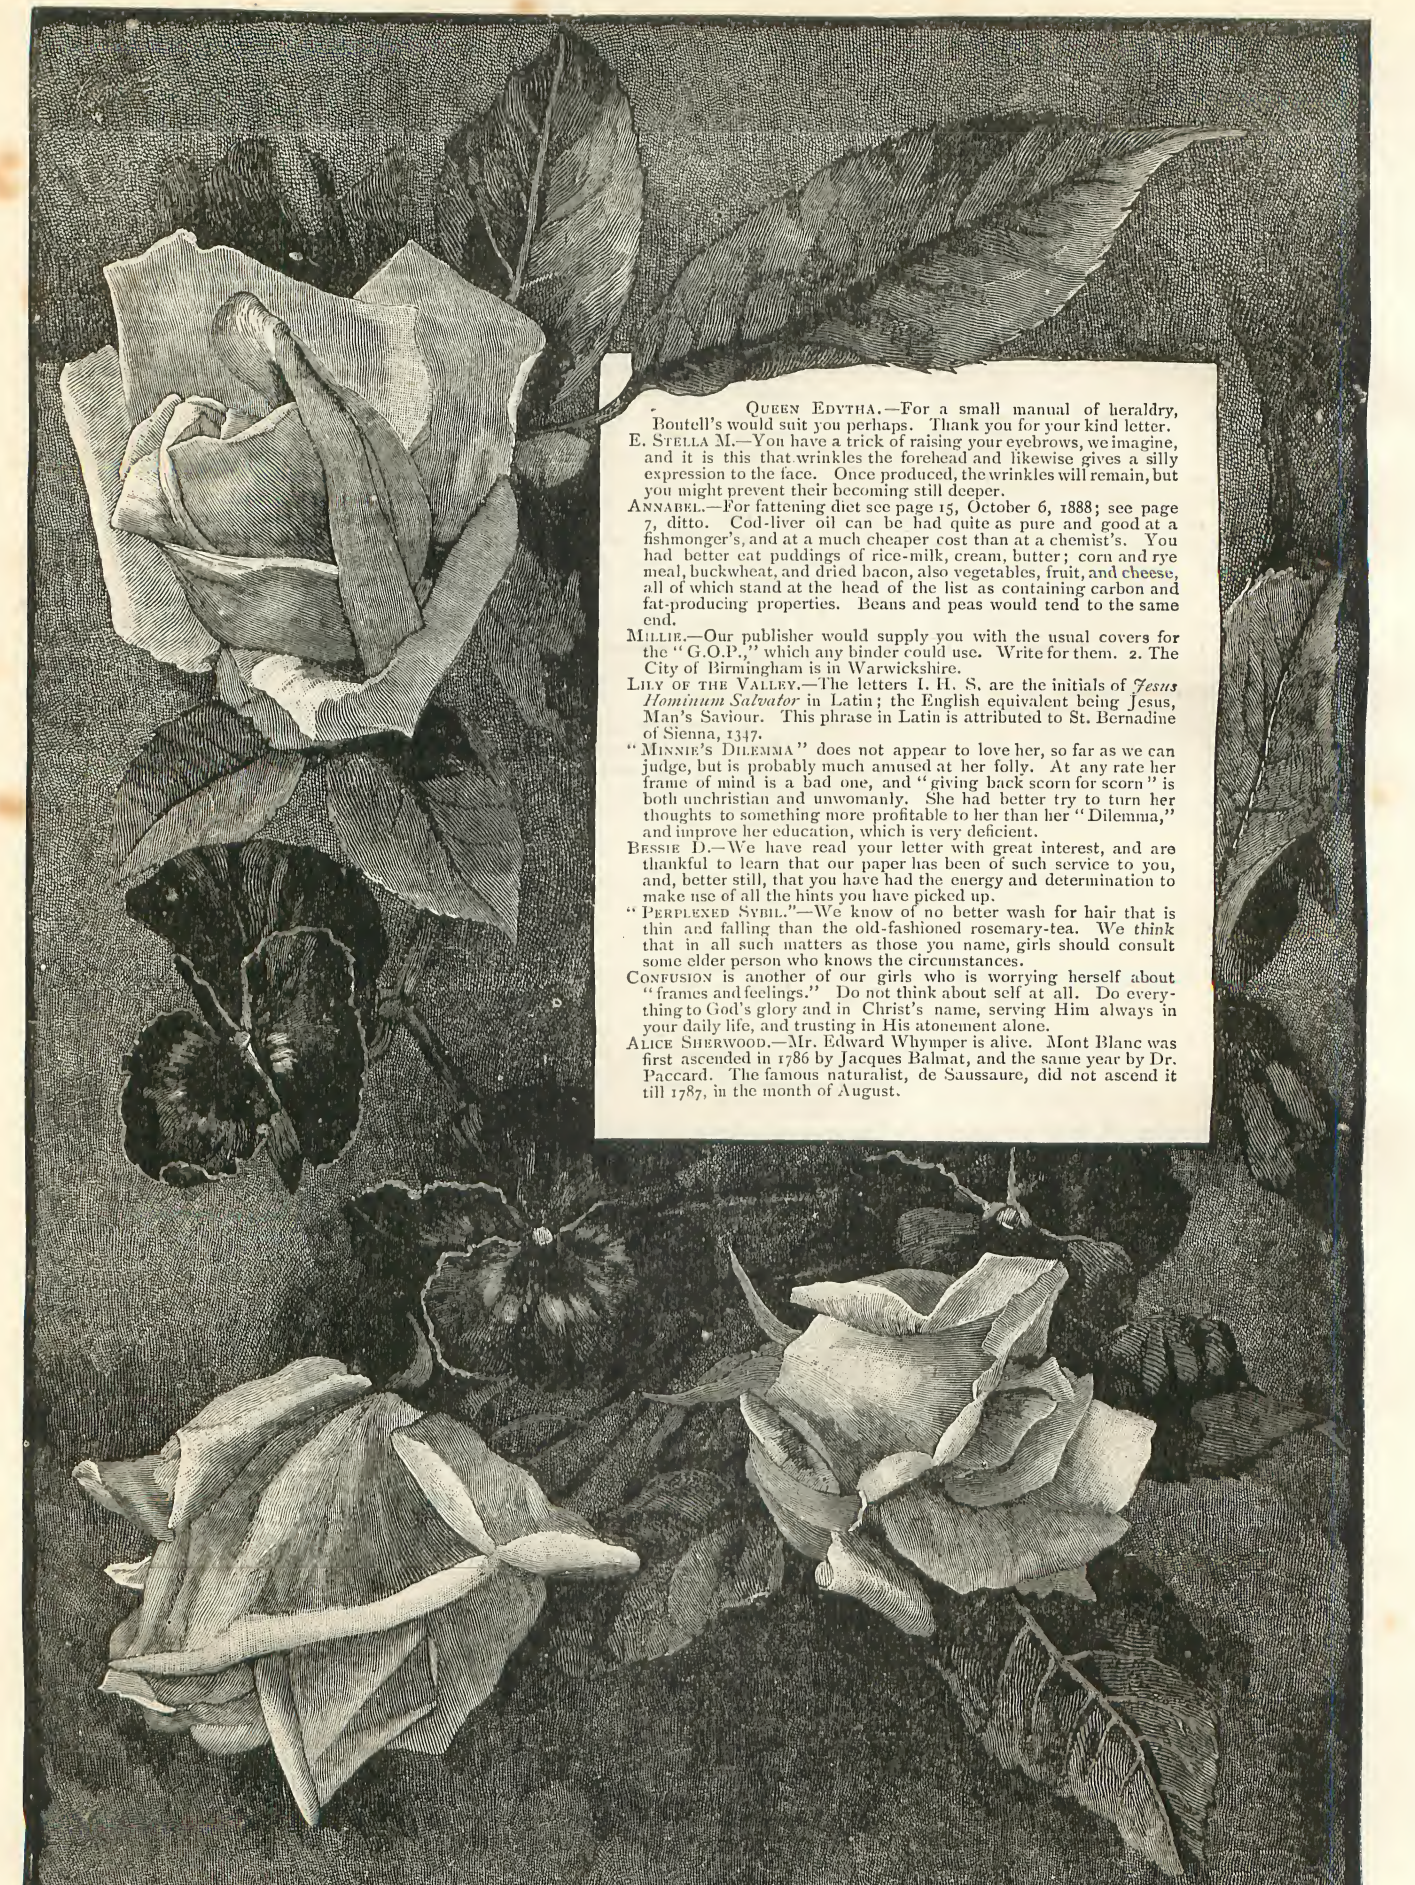

M. B. B.'s poem of "The Dying Child" is very sad and dreary, and also very incorrect in every way. The use of "I'll," "you've," "he'll," is quite wrong, even in writing prose.

MARIE ANTOINETTE; A NORTHUMBRIAN.—The verses do not scan correctly, and lack originality of thought.

A TROUBLED ONE appears to have entered upon an engagement of marriage which her conscience and her common sense do not approve in any way. We can only advise her to be guided by them; but we fear, by her writing to us, that she does not want to listen to them, and would like our advice to be of a contrary nature.

LILITH.—We were glad to get your letter from that far off "City of the Angels," and you have our sympathy in all your troubles and afflictions.

AN OLD MAID.—"Oh, for the touch of a vanished hand," is from Tennyson's poem, "Break, Break, Break." "The good unasked in mercy grant," is a line from a hymn by Merrick.

QUEEN EDYTHA.—For a small manual of heraldry, Bontell's would suit you perhaps. Thank you for your kind letter.

E. STELLA M.—You have a trick of raising your eyebrows, we imagine, and it is this that wrinkles the forehead and likewise gives a silly expression to the face. Once produced, the wrinkles will remain, but you might prevent their becoming still deeper.

ANNABEL.—For fattening diet see page 15, October 6, 1888; see page 7, ditto. Cod-liver oil can be had quite as pure and good at a fishmonger's, and at a much cheaper cost than at a chemist's. You had better eat puddings of rice-milk, cream, butter; corn and rye meal, buckwheat, and dried bacon, also vegetables, fruit, and cheese, all of which stand at the head of the list as containing carbon and fat-producing properties. Beans and peas would tend to the same end.

MILLIE.—Our publisher would supply you with the usual covers for the "G.O.P.," which any binder could use. Write for them. 2. The City of Birmingham is in Warwickshire.

LILY OF THE VALLEY.—The letters I. H. S. are the initials of Jesus Hominum Salvator in Latin; the English equivalent being Jesus, Man's Saviour. This phrase in Latin is attributed to St. Bernadine of Sienna, 1347.

"MINNIE'S DILEMMA" does not appear to love her, so far as we can judge, but is probably much amused at her folly. At any rate her frame of mind is a bad one, and "giving back scorn for scorn" is both unchristian and unwomanly. She had better try to turn her thoughts to something more profitable to her than her "Dilemma," and improve her education, which is very deficient.

BESSIE D.—We have read your letter with great interest, and are thankful to learn that our paper has been of such service to you, and, better still, that you have had the energy and determination to make use of all the hints you have picked up.

"PERPLEXED SYBIL."—We know of no better wash for hair that is thin and falling than the old-fashioned rosemary-tea. We think that in all such matters as those you name, girls should consult some elder person who knows the circumstances.

CONFUSION is another of our girls who is worrying herself about "frames and feelings." Do not think about self at all. Do everything to God's glory and in Christ's name, serving Him always in your daily life, and trusting in His atonement alone.

ALICE SHERWOOD.—Mr. Edward Whymper is alive. Mont Blanc was first ascended in 1786 by Jacques Balmat, and the same year by Dr. Paccard. The famous naturalist, de Saussure, did not ascend it till 1787, in the month of August.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON,

Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

"OH, Dottie! I never saw anything so lovely in my life!" cried Evelyn, as she drew her curtain on the morning after their arrival. The cousins occupied rooms with a door of communication between the two. The view from the windows embraced, first, the green floor of the valley, diversified by woods and river, then, away to the right, the pine forests steeply climbing towards the dazzling snows of the Titlis. The pure, softly curving whiteness of these vast fields invests the mountain with a peculiar charm. It is not of stupendous height, nor of any specially grand proportions, but it displays so much snow that it is always a vision of serene and heavenly beauty. Beyond the Titlis the stern rocky peaks of the Great and Little Spannort contrast with the rounded snowfields of the greater mountain. Opposite there rises the Engelberg, a strangely-shaped, abrupt hill; and forests clothe the lower heights, through which the white leap of a torrent gleams ever against the dark tree-tops. In the foreground lies the village of Engelberg, with its great building that Evelyn recognised, from pictures she had seen, as the monastery beside the church. It was a picture of exquisite beauty, and the bell sounding forth through the morning air seemed to lend a mystic charm to the scene.

"This will soon bring forth a second volume of 'Day-dreams,' won't it, Evelyn?" cried Dottie. "Oh, the perfect loveliness of everything! How glad I am we are going to stay here instead of tearing about all over Switzerland! I only hope Algy will like it."

"He can't help it," replied Evelyn. "You said he was coming in a week, didn't you?"

"Yes, in a week or ten days, from Leipsic, with some acquaintances he has picked up there—a Herr Lichtenstein and his wife, whom he seems to like very much."

When the two girls descended to breakfast in the vast salle-à-manger, with its long tables and polyglot assemblage of German and English, Mrs. Lancaster and Miss Wentworth were already there to greet them. All were full of exclamations of pleasure at the lovely morning view, and of satisfaction that such a charming spot had been fixed upon as a resting-place.

"Your poet Wordsworth, you remember, has a sonnet on Engelberg," remarked Miss Wentworth to Evelyn.

"Has he? I don't think so," replied Evelyn, confidently. "I don't think he ever came here."

Miss Wentworth's bright black eyes twinkled a little, but she said no more. After breakfast, when the hotel guests were streaming forth upon the terrace, and sitting in the covered verandah to enjoy the prospect of the day's pleasures in a brief space of dolce far niente, Evelyn felt a volume slipped into her hand, open. Yes! it was Wordsworth's Poems, and the sonnet was really and truly there in black and white.

"ENGELBERG, THE HILL OF ANGELS.

"For gentlest uses, oftentimes Nature takes

The work of Fancy from her willing hands;

And such a beautiful creation makes As renders needless spells and magic wands.

When first mine eyes beheld that famous Hill,

The sacred ENGELBERG, celestial bands, With intermingling motions soft and still,

Hung round its top, on wings that changed their hues at will.

"Clouds do not name those Visitants; they were

The very Angels whose authentic lays Sung from that heavenly ground in middle air,

Made known the spot where piety should raise

A holy structure to the Almighty's praise.

Resplendent Apparition! if in vain My ears did listen, 'twas enough to gaze And watch the slow departing of the train Whose skirts the glowing Mountain thirsted to detain."

When sunset came that night, Evelyn could appreciate the exquisite beauty and appropriateness of the poet's fancy. All day long mists had been forming, hovering and fleeting round the Hill of Angels; but at eventide it glowed with a celestial radiance below the wreathing clouds; and, gathering slow, they floated upwards in majestic procession away and away, folding their wings and leaving the mountain to its rest. Dreamlike and transcendent was the beauty of Engelberg at seasons such as these.

"It is a strange thing how little in general people know about the sky," says Ruskin; and it is a fact of ordinary experience that to invite men and women to look at the pageant constantly spread out above and before them—of sunset, of shifting cloud and sunlight, not to speak of the splendour of the dawn which few ever see at all—is a sure way to irritate them! But at Engelberg people cannot be blind, choose how they will, to the beauty and wonder of the sky, the clouds, the light. Ever shifting, ever forming combinations of perfect and marvellous loveliness, the atmospheric effects would make the despair of an artist, while they thrill the most commonplace observer with rapture.

Evelyn felt that she had come to the fit home of a poet. Her table was all set forth in her room with paper, pens, ink and blotting-paper, ready to record inspiration at any hour of the day or night; yet somehow she could not write; and attempts to record her ecstasy at the cloud-angels soaring away from the hill at eventide proved so abortive a failure that she tore up the paper in disgust.

"I must wait a little while until I am more thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the place," she thought.

Of course the great monastery church was one of the first places visited by the four ladies. In the vestibule a notice, "Avis aux Etrangers. Respectez la croyance des fiddles," with particulars as to sundry items of misbehaviour to be avoided, gave a rather unpleasant impression as to the manner of conduct sometimes adopted by those who differed in belief from the worshippers. The spacious interior, with its faint smell of incense, and its brilliant paintings on the roof and in the chapels, its altar-piece gleaming behind the closed screen, struck Evelyn as being a wonderful spectacle to behold in so remote an Alpine valley.

One painting in particular, a "Descent from the Cross," by Deschwanden, thrilled and impressed her. The face of Mary, with its agony of tenderness gazing upon the lacerated form of her Son, made tears spring into the girl's eyes. She looked and looked again, and could not turn her eyes away from the group representing the mystery of that sublime Passion that has power to stir the heart to-day, even more than it stirred the spectators long centuries ago.

Strange was it to think that here, in this lonely village, the immortal story went on appealing to the consciences of men—in differing form and guise from that which Evelyn had learnt to love and reverence—but still, touching the same Christ, dying for men, rising to bring life and immortality to light.

The first few days were spent by the party in learning to know the clean, bright village, the church, and the immediate surroundings; and to know Engelberg is to love. Then Evelyn felt the need of some further departure.

"Do you see that little house far away on the height, auntie?" she inquired, one evening after dinner, as, according to their wont, the guests thronged on the verandah.

"No, my dear, I can't say that I do. Why, there's only snow up away there."

"No, no, I mean on the ridge, beneath the snows of the Titlis; on the wall of precipice above the forest."

With this explanation Mrs. Lancaster at length declared she saw it.

"Though it looks more like a square box than a house; and for all the world as if it would tumble over the very next wind that blows."

"Well, that is the new hotel they are building on the Trübsee Alp. I want to go up there, and on farther, up the Joch Pass and on to the Engstlen Alp, just to spend one night. Oh, do let us go, auntie!"

"My dear, I could not think of such a thing. Why, it looks as if you would have to crawl up the face of that hill there like flies on a wall."

But Miss Wentworth came to the rescue.

"If you will let the girls go, I reckon I can take care of them, and I will enjoy going too," she observed. "It's quite safe, and the weather is settled."

Mrs. Lancaster, who was the soul of good-nature, was not long in consenting to the plan, and about eight o'clock the next morning the three departed—Miss Wentworth on a horse, the two girls on foot. They crossed the floor of the valley, entered a beautiful pine forest, and ascended slowly, in long zigzags, until they came out on a wild track of moorland, the Gerschni Alp.

The path led across this, and then began to ascend the precipice that had looked so alarming from the hotel, the "precipitous Pfaffenwand," as Baedeker calls it. It was very hot, and Dottie and Evelyn often paused to rest at a turn of the path. The unfinished hotel standing on the brink looked very far above them; but it gradually grew nearer, and at last they reached the summit.

A cry of delight burst from the girls, for a lovely mountain basin lay before them, flanked by the snows of the Titlis, that stretched up and up in immense fields of dazzling whiteness. It seemed as though a vast lake had anciently lain here. The actual inn of the Trübsee was on the further brink of this hollow, with a little tarn lying beside it. And far above the inn rose the craggy moorland heights, over which wound the path of the Joch Pass. The travellers found, as always is the case with these altitudes, "Hills piled on hills, and Alps on Alps arise."

The way they had to climb looked still more distant and remote than it had done from the other side of the valley, when they had espied it from the gardens of their hotel.

"This reminds me of those lines I read to you. Do you remember them?" asked Evelyn, and quoted—

"The aims whence ever anew shall arise the soul;
The goal that is not—and ever again the goal."

Dottie, it is scarcely needful to say, did not remember the lines, but Miss Wentworth, who caught the remark from her elevation, was interested at once, and would have gone off into a literary discussion, had the jolting and uncertain pace of her steed rendered it possible.

Outside the little hostelry of the Trübsee they saw, as they approached, a mule standing, with a lady sitting on its back, the driver resting by its side. She was evidently declining the voluble solicitations of the little landlady to descend and enter, and a glass of milk was finally brought out to her.

Evelyn suddenly uttered a loud exclamation as she saw the lady's face under the broad hat.

"What is the matter, Evelyn?" cried Dottie.

"Oh, Dottie! Don't you see who it is? Mrs. Allingham West. I should know her in a moment, although she looks so different."

"And who is she?" inquired Dottie, innocently.

"Why, Dot! you are really too provoking. Don't you remember the conversation of the Royal Society?—the authoress? Oh, you must remember! And here she is!"

Evelyn rushed forward to impart her information to Miss Wentworth, and was somewhat embarrassed by the way in which that lady received it.

"Oh, yes. The gifted author of 'Transmigrations!' A very fortunate and gratifying thing to meet her. I'll just get off my horse, and introduce myself to her."

"Please don't! I'm sure she wouldn't like it," begged Evelyn, in an agony, as she saw Miss Wentworth preparing to suit the action to the word.

"And why not? I should think she would appreciate an interview!" replied the American.

To Evelyn's unspeakable relief the lady herself took the initiative, for lowering her parasol and bending a little forward, she addressed the two girls in a clear, decided voice. How well Evelyn remembered and loved its tone!

"Can you tell me if the way down to Engelberg is too steep to ride in comfort?"

"I should not like to ride down the Pfaffenwand," replied the girl, in a tremulous tone, while the colour rushed to her cheeks. "The rest of the way is easy."

"Oh, thanks! My man is so stupid, and only talks patois; it is useless to ask him. And now, as you come from Engelberg, perhaps you can tell me—the place very full?"

"It is crowded," replied Evelyn, with truth.

"And the best hotel?"

"They are all good; but we like the one where we are staying—the Abendglüh."

"And that is full, I suppose? Yes? Dear me! we ought to have written for rooms from Meiringen." A line was on the lady's brow.

A thought flashed into Evelyn's mind. She interchanged a word with Dottie, then spoke.

"It will give me so much pleasure, in case of any difficulty, if you will take my room at the Abendglüh. When we return I can share my cousin's. Please do. I know you by sight. I should think it the very greatest honour to be of any use to you."

"You are really very kind," replied the lady, with a faint intonation of surprise; "but I could not possibly cause you such inconvenience."

Evelyn urged her point with much earnestness, and explained that she would not be home that night, and that her room and Dottie's were so far at the full disposal of Mrs. West, who was, it appeared, travelling with her maid, and hoping to meet a party of friends after a few days at Engelberg. At length she condescended to accept the proffered help, in case of need, and Evelyn proceeded to write, with a hand trembling with excitement, a few lines to the landlord on a leaf torn out of the authoress's pocket-book.

Miss Wentworth, who had several times attempted to edge herself into the conversation, now broke in—

"It gives me great pleasure, as an Amuh-ican, to meet the gifted Mrs. West. I can assure you that in my country your name is a household word; and—"

"Thank you, very much," said the lady, cutting short Miss Wentworth's eloquence unceremoniously. "We shall meet again at the Abendglüh. Good morning." And she moved away, followed by maid and driver, while Evelyn stood rooted to the spot in a trance of delight at this wonderful and enchanting encounter.

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER IX.

FEMALE VIOLINISTS.

"The power of the first wave of violins in a symphony cleanses us of all our dullness and dryness, and carries us straight out of ourselves."

"My violin is mine and I am it."

—Charles Ancherster.

It will not, I think, be out of place if we finish up these articles with some notice of the women whose names have become associated with this fascinating and wonderful instrument.

Quite a revolution has taken place in the feeling and opinion of society as to the suitability of the violin in the hands of woman. The opposition to her study of it was formerly so strong that she had to crush within her all enthusiasm and genius for it if she would not become a mark of unwomanliness to her friends; indeed, it was of frequent occurrence that for fear of the world's frown she hid from all eyes this special talent.

A woman is now no longer considered mannish and fast whose talent exhibits itself in the love and mastery of the violin; on the contrary, it is fostered and cherished, and forms part of a high-class education.

We have come to see that the piano is not the only instrument suited to a woman's capacity, and that there is no reason why the wide field of stringed instruments should be closed against her.

It cannot be urged that they are out of place in a woman's hands, seeing that Norman Neruda and Vittorine de Bono are living contradictions of that plea, and certainly we have daily proof that the violin loses none of its exquisite grace in the hands of a woman.

That grand results may be achieved by women in the study of it we shall be able to prove, but we need for the present turn only to Norman Neruda. When she appears in public she is judged as a violinist, not as a woman, and she neither asks for nor receives any allowance because of her sex before beginning a solo.

All women cannot, of course, look for her success, yet it is well to remember that she who sets limits to herself will always be expected to remain within them. In one way the violin will never disappoint her; it will be to her the most sensitive and fascinating companion, and an interpreter of her inmost thoughts and longings.

Outside genius, the qualities indispensable to the mastery of this instrument are enthusiasm and patience, two qualities possessed in a much larger degree by women than by men; indeed, there is every reason why she should make this instrument her own. The study of it opens out a new field for her skill and intellect, and enables her to add to the attractions of home music, which is greatly enhanced by the introduction of the king of instruments.

Just as in violin-making so in the field of composition, women have done very little; not because they could not, but simply that harmony and counterpoint have been considered out of the question in their education. They have had ability to grasp and deal with the science, but until quite lately fashion, etiquette, and education have all been dead against them. For this, if for no other reason, it will be interesting to note the career of those who, in spite of the difficulties which surrounded them, have made great names in the world as violinists.

Before speaking of these I must mention that the Empress Frederick, our own Princess Royal, is an accomplished player on the violin. Scarcely a day passes but she amuses herself for an hour or two on it, and carries it with her wherever she goes.*

And now we will take the lady violinists in the order in which they appeared.

First, Madalena Lombardini Sirmen, a much-loved pupil of Tartini, was born at Venice in February, 1735, and educated in the Conservatorio dei Mendicanti there. On leaving this institution she went to Padua to study the violin under Tartini, who wrote her a wonderful letter upon the art of playing this instrument, a rare and valuable specimen of musical literature, the original of which is, I believe, in Venice.

We are fortunate in having a translation of it made by Dr. Burney in 1771, eleven years after it was written. We can only give one or two passages from it, for it is a long letter, but it would well repay the trouble of seeking it out and studying it:—

"Confine your principal practice and study to the use and power of the bow, in order to make yourself entirely mistress in execution and expression."

"Study the true manner of holding, balancing, and pressing the bow lightly but steadily upon the strings, so that it shall seem to breathe the first tone it gives."

"If the tone is begun with delicacy, there is little danger of rendering it afterwards either coarse or harsh."

Instructing her as to the shake, he says: "Practise it slowly, moderately fast, and quickly; that is with the two notes succeeding each other in these three degrees of adagio, andante, and presto."

These will suffice to show the character of the letter. Madalena Sirmen was a highly accomplished singer, but it was her extreme excellence as a violin player which won for her an almost European reputation; the boldness of her bow and the delicacy of her playing were marvellous. She made a great sensation in various parts of Italy, and both in Paris and London played with complete success. Later in life she still charmed but did not excite, because she resolutely refused to change the old style of playing represented by Tartini, for the new which Viotti introduced.

And now we come to a very interesting violinist, Madame Mara, whose maiden name was Gertrude Elizabeth Schmeling. Shortly after her birth in 1749 her mother died, and very sad and neglected was the condition of the baby girl. Her father, who was a poor musician, found her very much in the way, and did not in the least know what to do with her. He thought it best to secure her in an arm-chair, where the poor little mite remained from morning till night, while he went about his work. She never knew what it was to be dandled in a mother's arms, or the charm of crawling on the floor. Naturally the child fell into a very crooked and rickety condition, from which it was long ere she recovered.

Schmeling contrived to earn a little extra money by mending musical instruments, and one day the little Gertrude, then four years old, got hold of a violin and began to draw musical sounds from it. Strange to say, this made her father angry, and he punished her, but without any result. The temptation was too great to be resisted, and she seized every opportunity of practising on such instruments as were left about whenever her father's back was turned.

One day, not so very long after he had punished her, he returned home suddenly, and to his astonishment found her playing correctly the scales on a violin. Struck with what he believed to be a special gift, he changed his tactics, and gave her a few lessons.

So apt a pupil did she prove that she was soon able to play duets with him before a few gifted amateurs, whom he called together for the purpose of asking their opinion.

But even now, in her fifth year, the lonely, motherless child could not stand without support, and her father was obliged to carry her to the room where she was to play before this her first audience.

The effect she produced must have been gave up the violin, and devoted herself to singing.

She is said to have declared that should she have a daughter she should learn the fiddle before she sang a note, for she remarked, "How can you convey a just notion of minute variations in the pitch of a note? By a fixed instrument? No. But by sliding the fingers upon a string you instantly make the slightest variations visibly as well as audibly perceptible."

She married Mara, the violoncellist, about the year 1771, and died at Revel in Livonia (a province in Russia) in January, 1833.

Next in order comes Regina Sacchi, or, as she was more often called, Strinssachi. She was born in Mantua in 1764, and educated in the Conservatorio della Pietà, in Venice. She was a most distinguished violinist and a great friend of Mozart.

At a very early age she visited the various countries and capitals of Europe, with great success. In her twentieth year she played at Vienna, where her beauty and talent gained for her many admirers.

Mozart, in writing to his father, mentions her as "the celebrated Mantuan Strinssachi, a very good violinist, and showing much taste and expression in her playing."

It seems that this lady begged Mozart to write something for their joint performance at her concert. He promised gladly, and accordingly he composed and arranged in his mind the beautiful sonata for piano and violin in B flat minor, but unfortunately there came forth no visible sign of it.

The day approached and not a note was written. Strinssachi, getting very anxious, earnestly entreated him for the notes, but it was not until the evening before the concert that the manuscript arrived, and was found to contain her notes only. Thankful to get even these, she studied them all night.

The concert-room was crowded, and the aristocracy and Court were all present. The sonata commenced; the composition was beautiful, and the execution of the two performers perfect. Had Mozart played it over even once with the lady it would not have been so wonderful; but he had never heard it with the violin till he played it in that crowded room. The applause was deafening, but the Emperor Joseph's enjoyment exceeded all other. From his box just over the head of the performers he saw there was nothing on Mozart's desk but a sheet of blank paper. At the close of the concert he beckoned Mozart to his box, and said in a low voice, "So you have once again trusted to chance?"

"Yes, your majesty," was the answer, half in triumph and half in confusion.

Mozart in his later years gave up violin playing altogether, but he was always in sympathy with its nature.

But to return to Strinssachi; she entered the service of the Duke of Saxe Gotha, and remained in it till her death. Her violin passed into the hands of Spohr, who played on it at the Norwich Festival in 1839. If people had only known!

We next come to Paravicini, who was born at Turin in 1769. She was the daughter of a great singer and a pupil of Viotti, whose music she played with great perfection. Her fame as a violinist was widely spread. It was at Milan that Josephine, the wife of Buonaparte, heard her play, and was so struck striking, for it was by the help of one of these amateurs that Schmeling and his child were able to visit the fair at Frankfurt.

Here the little girl's performance excited such wonder and admiration that a subscription was set on foot to give her a better education. By the time she was nine years old her health had greatly improved, and we find her giving concerts in Vienna with great success.

The English ambassador there was so pleased with her execution on the violin that he advised her father to take her to England, and not only furnished him with letters of introduction, but gave him the means to undertake the journey. She is said to have had the most wonderful facility of dashing at all musical intervals, however difficult and unusual, the result, probably, of her very early practice.

Here in London the child was petted and patronised by all the noble and influential ladies, but, alas! she was persuaded by them that violin playing was indecorous and unfeminine, and from that time forward she by it that she engaged her to instruct her son, Eugène Beauharnais, and subsequently took her to Paris. Here, for some unexplained reason, she fell into disfavour, and became so distressed in circumstances that for some time she lived upon the sale of her wearing apparel. By the kindness of Italians resident in Paris she was enabled to travel to Milan, where her abilities procured for her a competency. It is said that her method of bowing was so graceful as to triumph over all preconceived ideas of the awkwardness of the violin in a woman's hand.

Mlle. Deschamps (later Madame Gautherot) was only eleven years old when she played for the first time at a sacred concert in Paris, during the Easter of 1774. One of the leading Parisian journals said, "Her playing is vivid and brilliant, and the greatest difficulties alter neither her precision nor her strength." She continued her artistic career with great success, and married in 1782.

Two years later we find her again before the public, calling forth applause and admiration. One of the journals, speaking of the correctness, precision, and talent exhibited in her playing, says, "Her success is all the more praiseworthy since it is very rare to see women succeed with this instrument, which does not seem made for them; and since Madame Sirmen, no one perhaps has brought it so far as Madame Gautherot." During the years 1789-90 she made great impression on the Londoners by the ability she manifested.

Caterina Calcagno was born in Genoa, 1797. When quite a child she was a pupil of Paganini; and at the age of fifteen she astonished Italy by the fearless freedom of her playing; but, strange to say, one can find no trace of her after 1816.

The sisters Milanello—Teresa and Maria—were very famous violinists. They were born in Piedmont in 1827 and 1832, and commenced their career in Italy; but it was in Paris they made so great a name. Maria, the younger, died here in 1848. Naumann speaking of them, says, "At the present day, when the musical world possesses such a performer as Neruda, the sisters Milanello, excellent as was their performance, would hardly make such a sensation now as they did at that period, when the appearance of two female violinists constituted a new feature of the concert-room."

One or two others have gained reputation as violinists, but it is difficult to obtain details of their career, viz., Luigia Gerbini, Madame Krahmen, Fräulein Schultz, Eleonora Neumann, of Moscow, Madame Filipowicz, a Pole; Mlle. Singelli, Medora Collins, Bertha Brouil, and Marie Soldat.

No name is better known in the present day than that of Norman Neruda, the queen of the king of instruments. She has become so much one with her violin that it is scarcely possible to think of her apart from it. She, above all others, has shown what a woman can do with it, and what power lies hidden within it.

In obedience to her bow and in her loving arms, it almost "hales men's souls out of their bodies," and stirs depths of joy and sorrow in the human heart never touched before. Watch the faces of an audience while she stands forward, forgetful of everything but the messages with which she is charging her violin, and notice the yearning, the admiration, the trouble and the longing which flit across them as the trembling strings pour forth their strains!

Such power and such genius as Norman Neruda's can only appear now and then, and when they come let us thank God that it is in our day. Such a gift as she possesses is not a selfish one—it makes the whole world purer and better.

When an interpreter of all that is best within us stands out from the rest of the world, a sovereign in her power of interpreting, we naturally long to know something about her early life, her surroundings, her difficulties, her character. But as a rule the knowledge to be gleaned is very meagre. We find out when and where she was born, whom she married, and what the journals of the day thought of her playing; but of her weary work, her sleepless nights, the overpowering mastery of her genius, the thousand-and-one self-denials endured for the love of her art, we learn nothing. Of one thing only in her life are we quite certain—viz., that perfection such as hers is attained only through much sorrow and pain.

From such details as have come to us we learn that her forefathers dwelt in Prague and were great musicians. She herself was born at Brünn, in Moravia, where her father filled the office of organist at the cathedral. The little Wilhelmina was a born genius, and could bring tones from her violin before she herself could speak or scarcely toddle.

At the age of six, when most little children are carefully guarded in the nursery, she appeared at a concert in Vienna in company with her eldest sister, a pianist, and attracted the attention of the audience by the power of her bow, and her execution notwithstanding her tiny hands, which were a delight to those who watched them.

In a charming little biography of her in Men and Women of the Day, the writer believes that whereas great poets, sculptors, and painters have frequently arisen spontaneously from the earth, the stars of the musical firmament are the results of hereditary development, and quotes Neruda as an example of this.

Little Wilhelmina was one of five children, all of whom were more or less musical. Her earliest tutor was the celebrated Leopold Jansen, who insisted upon long and incessant practice, and no doubt the poor little girl was often weary, and would gladly have thrown her violin on one side while she joined in the childish sports natural to children. But her tutor knew that her genius, great as it was, would, without toil, neither satisfy her as she grew older nor the world who was to be her judge. Something in her face, I think, shows that her childhood was a hardworking rather than a joyous one.

Jansen did not die until 1875, and must therefore often have heard his pupil in the zenith of her power and fascination as a violinist. One would like to know how he felt when listening to her.

This concert at Vienna was but the beginning of her public work. From that time forward she visited Leipzig, Berlin, Hamburg, and many other cities, giving concerts everywhere, and working and studying as she went. At the age of nine she came to London, and made her first appearance at a concert of the Philharmonic Society with much success; but she left almost immediately, and continued her travels chiefly in Prussia, till in her womanhood she came to Paris (1864), and the reception she met with there is said to have been extravagantly enthusiastic.

This year of her life was an important one for her, for she became the wife of Ludwig Norman, a Swedish musician, and was known to the world henceforth by the name of Madame Norman Neruda. She came to us again in 1869—twenty years having passed between her first and second visit, and it is said that notwithstanding her great success at the Philharmonic Concerts, M. Vieuxtemps had great difficulty in persuading her to remain until the winter.

Fortunately for us, she permitted herself to be persuaded, and took first violin at the Monday Popular Concerts, making her mark at once. From that time to this she has spent every spring and winter in England, playing at the Philharmonic, Monday Populars, and Crystal Palace, and at Sir Charles Hallé's recitals, both in London and Manchester; and it may be said with truth that each year her playing has increased in power and refinement, and certainly her audiences have gradually become more appreciative, showing that her living among us has been an education to the people. Last year she became the wife of Sir Charles Hallé; may the marriage be a happy one; and if we may be permitted to express a wish for her, it is that she would take a thorough and enjoyable holiday, and know what it is once in her life to put aside work.

Christine Nilsson. We always associate this lady's name with the Italian and French operas, and think of her as one of the best interpreters of Bellini's vocal music, but never in connection with the violin. Yet it was as a violinist she first made her mark, as other great singers, such as Mara, had done before her.

She was the eighth child of poor parents, her father being a labouring farmer. He was evidently musical, for he was the chief chorister in the church at Wexjö. She was born in 1843, and when quite a small child, taught herself the violin and flute, and, with one of her brothers, who was also musical, visited the fairs and markets in Sweden, and sang and played to the peasants on fête days.

At the age of fourteen she went, as usual, to the fair of Ljungby, and while playing and singing in its midst was seen and heard by a rich Swedish magistrate, who was so struck with her playing and appearance that he undertook to educate and provide for her. He sent her at once to study in Stockholm, and later on to Paris, under Masset and Wertel. On her appearing in public she relinquished the violin in favour of singing.

Maria Felicita Tua, known as Teresina Tua, was born in May, 1867, at Turin. She was educated in the Paris Conservatoire, and at the age of thirteen obtained the first prize as a violinist.* For three years she played with great success in various parts of the Continent, and made her first appearance in England on May 5, 1883, at the Crystal Palace. She played also at the Philharmonic on the 9th and the 30th of the same month, and at the Floral Hall concert, June 9th.

The opinion of her playing was that it was marked by very high qualities, such as exquisite phrasing, refinement and executive skill, but that the extreme delicacy of her style was more suited to a chamber than to so large a place as the Crystal Palace, or even St. James's Hall. She accompanied Mr. Cusins in Beethoven's Kreuzer Sonata with great success.

Her parents were poor but very musical, and probably helped to develop the inborn talent of their child; at all events they brought her before the public at a very early age, long before she went to the Paris Conservatoire. It was expected after playing with so much success here in 1883 that she would have returned the following year, but we have not seen her again.†

We must not forget to mention in this list of female violinists the name of Emily Florence Chartres, of Manchester, who recently obtained the gold medal for violin-playing in the Royal Academy of Music competition. She has been created a Licentiate of the Royal Academy of Music, and an Associate of Trinity College, London. We ought to feel very proud of her, for it is the first time either of these honours has been obtained by a lady for violin-playing.

* There is a portrait and little notice of her in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER of April 12, 1884.

† While this is in the press, it is announced that she is to visit London this season, and that since her last appearance here her powers as a violinist have become much stronger.

LOVE VERSUS MONEY.

By L. SHARP, Author of "Nan's Story," "May's Dream," etc.

CHAPTER I.

"I WISH I could be somebody else for a year or two!" exclaimed Leslie Barton, pausing suddenly in her restless march to and fro in the bedroom.

"Somebody else, child?" echoed her companion in astonishment, swinging lazily in the rocking-chair. "Whatever makes you wish for that?"

"Oh, I am sick of myself! Of all the flattery, and absurdity, and emptiness of this Society life of ours," replied the girl impetuously. "What a sham it all is! What masks people wear to hide their real selves!"

"I am sure that you have nothing to blame Society for, Leslie," said Miss Cameron, rather crossly. "Young, beautiful, and an heiress—you are not half thankful enough for the gifts that you possess; what more can you want?"

"Pleasure and happiness are not the end and aim of life," was the indignant reply. "I want something to live for besides admiration, Minnie; I want to be a strong, helpful, earnest woman, to join hands with others in the great chain of human interests and the common good of all."

She walked the floor in silence for a moment, and then burst out energetically again.

"Do you really think, Minnie—tell me honestly—that the life we lead is fitted to make us truer or better? Why, we have no time in this continual gaiety even to think, far less to stand still for a little breathing space. I am sick of it all!"

"My dear Leslie," answered her friend, coldly, "I am not aware of being any the worse for the life which you seem to despise so much. Pray do not become an enthusiast; it is anything but good form, and will only make you an object of dislike. Are you such a shining light yourself?" she added, with a sneer on her lips that angered Leslie.

"You know that I do not mean that, Minnie," indignantly. "Why will you not understand? I am railing against the majority of our sex, who have no ideas but dress or show; no hope but marriage; no ambition but to surpass their neighbours."

"Thank you, in the name of our sex," blandly interrupted Miss Cameron, who tried her best to laugh or sneer the girl out of her earnest moods.

"You know that it is true," retorted Leslie, her dark eyes flashing eagerly; "but surely in the end they will come to see that buying a bonnet or going to the theatre is not, after all, the paramount interest of an intelligent being's life. I am going to rebel, Minnie; I am going to be a fashionable young lady no longer, let Mrs. Grundy say what she will."

"How long will this mood last?" asked her friend, with a contemptuous laugh, rising from her chair and moving towards the door. "I cannot say that I admire you in heroics, dear."

"I have been a butterfly too long, but I mean now to begin to shape my life more bravely—to climb higher—if I can."

An eloquent little gesture of humility followed the words, which disarmed Miss Cameron's annoyance for the moment.

"It is too bad of me to make you my safety-valve for troublesome thoughts, you poor old Min," added Leslie, smiling brightly, "but I do wish you to understand. However, let us go now and have some tea, and then for the last appearance in public as a butterfly of the much-envied, much-talked-about Miss Leslie Barton."

The scorn with which the girl uttered the last sentence amused her friend immensely. But it was all very real to Leslie, who had been brought up in a very different home from her present luxurious one; and the sudden riches, though they had elated and enchanted her at first, had not spoiled as yet her finer nature. She saw through the adulation which was showered upon the heiress, not upon the girl, and she felt how false it was, how hollow.

Mr. Barton, of Fern Tower, was a bachelor of immense wealth, who had quarrelled with all his relations save his brother's widow; and who out of caprice had, at his sister-in-law's death four years ago, brought home her only child Leslie, to be his adopted daughter and heiress. She was sixteen then, but her bright girlish beauty and high-bred air had delighted the old man, who longed to show to the world, the world that only tolerated him on account of his wealth, what a beautiful girl he possessed in the shape of his niece. She would win his way into the highest circles, she would make up for her plebeian name by marrying into the noblest family in the county. And so Mr. Barton surrounded the young girl with everything that money could buy, gratified her slightest wish, and gloated over the sensation that her appearance made. He had succeeded in obtaining as a companion for her a lady of noble birth, whose poverty had made her only too glad to accept of Mr. Barton's offer. And for the last three years Miss Minnie Cameron, one of the many daughters of the late Sir Hector Cameron, had been installed at Fern Tower, and had ingratiated herself with all its inmates. Though thirty years of age, she looked younger, and was both handsome and attractive. She had made up her mind to reign as mistress some day where she was at present guest, and this in spite of her contempt for her host's vulgarity and coarseness.

Leslie had inherited little, save her name and dark brown eyes, from the paternal side; it was from her mother, a lady of good family, that she had taken her graceful figure and fair beauty.

But to understand the reason of the sudden outburst at the beginning of our story, it is necessary to go back a few months.

"My dear Leslie, I have asked the new doctor to dinner to-day to meet the Seymours; he seems to be a clever young fellow, and I like to show hospitality to strangers in the neighbourhood," said Mr. Barton one morning at the breakfast table, in his usual pompous manner; "you and Miss Cameron must do your best to put him at his ease. These village youngsters," he added patronisingly to the latter, "are always so very awkward when introduced into the society of their betters; yet it does them good—it does them good to mix with the world, especially doctors."

"I quite agree with you, Mr. Barton," said Miss Cameron, with a smile, thinking that the gentlemanly figure, which she had encountered the other day at a friend's, would not show much awkwardness; "it is only kind to enliven their solitude a little; but if I mistake not, this Dr. Douglas Owen is related to Sir Douglas Owen, of Penryth Castle, in Carmarthen."

"You don't say so?" ejaculated Mr. Barton, excitedly. "I am thankful that I said dinner after all, and not merely to look in in the evening, as I had first intended."

Leslie glanced at Miss Cameron, an indignant smile curling her pretty lips.

"What does it matter, uncle, who his relations are, if he is nice himself?" she asked, gravely. "You have not invited them to dinner, have you?"

"Don't be a silly, child," replied her uncle, crossly; "you do your part of the entertainment and I'll do mine; make yourself agreeable to this young man—at least, until I can find out more particulars about him."

Mr. Barton had no reason to complain of his niece's conduct during the dinner party. She was evidently as much attracted by the new doctor as he was by her, greatly to Sir Philip Seymour's annoyance.

When Dr. Owen entered the drawing-room of Fern Tower, his host had met him with effusion, and had led him to the fireplace to the white-robed figure there.

"My niece, Miss Leslie Barton," he said; and the young man bowed deeply as she turned towards him.

Such a bright, sparkling face! To be photographed in his memory never again to leave it. No wonder that when the lovely eyes met his he forgot to look at the rest of her face—at the golden wavy hair which curled over the graceful little head, at the sweet mobile lips, at the flush of perfect health on the softly-rounded cheek. He was surprised at the sudden sharp thrill of pleasure that went through him as he gazed on her fresh young beauty; and, again, at the delight with which he felt her little hand on his arm as he led her down to dinner. Was this love at first sight? "Bosh," he muttered to himself, with a mental shake, "don't let your wits go wool gathering, old boy. Remember the gulf between a struggling doctor and a beautiful heiress."

Sir Philip Seymour's replies to his partner, Miss Cameron, began to grow shorter and shorter as he heard Leslie's merry laugh and bright responses. He was a good-looking, rather insipid young man of the "haw-haw," lady-killer type, and he was not going to have his preserves poached upon. Leslie was never so interested in anything he said; he must extinguish this interloper on the spot.

"Been out driving to-day, Miss Leslie?" he asked, abruptly.

"No."

"Aw! Had a walk p'whaps instead?"

"No."

"Aw!" Sir Philip pulled his moustache fiercely. What on earth did that other fellow find to chatter about? "Saw you at church yesterday; did, 'pon my word!"

"Indeed?"

There was a mischievous look in Leslie's eyes

She knew that nothing put Sir Philip out more than monosyllables, and she was annoyed at him for his evident determination to spoil her interesting talk with Dr. Owen. But Sir Philip would never allow any of her rebuffs to interfere with his condescending devotion, and calmly ignored her apparent dislike of his person.

"Awful dull hole this county, doctor," he went on, determined to make the conversation general; "couldn't exist here all the year round."

"Then it is just as well that you are not obliged to do so," remarked Dr. Owen, quietly.

Leslie laughed. "Oh," she said, "Sir Philip only honours Hazeldean for a month or two at a time, and spends most of the year in London."

"'Pon my word, I hate the place; it has only one attraction for me," with a tender meaning in his glance at Leslie.

"It certainly is not a pretty town or neighbourhood," broke in Miss Cameron, thinking that she had been left quite long enough unnoticed, "but anywhere near a large manufactory is always interesting."

"May I venture to ask why?" said Dr. Owen, pleasantly, turning his keen blue eyes on the lady.

"Oh, because there is always something exciting to me to be surrounded by a mass of busy human beings. It is barely ten minutes' walk from here to the cotton mills, and somehow the contrast of the toiling life outside makes this pretty home so delicious, you can't help but be contented with your lot."

"Now, that is just where we differ," exclaimed Leslie, eagerly. "I hate to feel so good-for-nothing, so occupied with—without idleness and gaiety, when I know how hardly it is going with so many other girls. I grow tired with wondering how I would bear it had I to work as hard as they do—and not for pleasure either, only for mere bread."

"Aw, weally, you could never be compared to those poor cweatures, Miss Leslie," said Sir Philip, languidly, feeling himself rather out of depth, "you were born to shine—aw—in higher spheres."

"Why not try to know some of the poor people about you, then, my dear Miss Barton?"

You could do much, if only by your sympathy, to help them," and Dr. Owen leant eagerly forward as he spoke. "I am so glad to find," he added, with a look half-audacious, half-wistful, at the lovely girlish face, "that you even wonder about the working hands; so few ladies in your position ever do as much."

"Ladies should have nothing to do but look pretty and be amiable," interrupted Mr. Barton, decidedly, catching the remark, and throwing a disapproving glance at the last speaker. "Don't you be taking up any new-fangled notions, Leslie; I won't have it, I can tell you."

"Now, come, Dr. Owen," exclaimed Miss Seymour, laughing, "it is really too bad of you men! Do you not give us poor girls the credit of thinking sometimes?"

"Perhaps we are too frivolous even for that," said Leslie, with an indignant flush, looking towards Miss Cameron, as she rose to withdraw from the room, and not deigning to glance at the doctor.

"There are exceptions to every rule, ladies," replied Dr. Owen, with a merry twinkle in his eyes, opening the door for them to pass through.

"What a handsome fellow that doctor is, Leslie," cried Ethel Seymour, throwing herself lazily on a couch when the three ladies had reached the drawing-room. "Who is he, and where does he come from?"

"He is a new doctor," answered Leslie, carelessly. "I know nothing more of him, except that he is very impertinent to treat us as if we were simpletons."

"Simpletons! Surely not, dear; I am certain that he is quite alive to our attractions," cried Miss Seymour, complacently. "He is a very nice young fellow, and I mean to add him to the list of my admirers."

Miss Seymour, like her brother, had a great appreciation of her own charms. She was rather pretty, had a handsome figure, but was nearer Miss Cameron's age than Leslie's.

"I thought you were engaged to Captain Northbrook, Ethel; I do hate to hear you talking so," and Leslie's lips curled scornfully as she wandered over to the piano in order to get away from the gossip at the fireside.

The drawing-room at Fern Tower was beautifully furnished, the large oriel window at the end overlooking the garden, with the river running through the grounds.

Leslie began to play some soft, sweet Nocturne, thinking to herself, with a heightened colour, that she would do something more than wonder. She felt that underneath the young doctor's evident admiration he despised her for being content with idle ease; and her anger vanished as she realised the truth of his statement.

The rest of the evening passed much as usual; music and singing preventing anything more than desultory conversation. But when Miss Seymour had withdrawn to put on her wraps, Dr. Owen moved towards the piano.

"I am afraid that I am not forgiven for my disparagement of the fair sex at dinner," he said, quietly, to his young hostess.

Leslie rose. "Why should I be angry?" she replied, gravely; "the truth is always best. I ought to thank you, instead, for waking me up from dreaming. I hope that you shall never again be glad that I only wonder, Dr. Owen," and the little head was raised erect as the earnest brown eyes met his with a look both proud and wistful, candid and sweet.

"One is apt to judge too much by externals," he said, apologetically, "but it is not fair to do so, though really it is so difficult to read below the surface."

"Yes," said Leslie, thoughtfully. Then with a sudden, winning smile, "You have given me something to think of, Dr. Owen."

"I am glad of that," was the hearty reply. "I do like to make people discontented with themselves."

With a hasty good-night to the others, the doctor left the house, leaving Leslie standing by the window with his strange words ringing in her ears; standing, thinking deeply, the moonlight resting tenderly on her golden hair.

"Marvel not that I say unto you ye must be born again," she murmured softly. "I am beginning to realise what that means now."

A few chance words, casually uttered, and the veil had been drawn aside. The half-developed, careless, shallow soul had broken the chrysalis shell of its old self, and was shining out a new creature; a living, earnest, aspiring, wondering human soul.

A LESSON IN ENGLISH.

A Portuguese gentleman, who had lived for many years in England and had acquired a perfect knowledge of the language, though still retaining a strong foreign accent, went one afternoon to visit a gentleman living a short distance from London. Being unable to discover his friend's house, he inquired of a nice, rosy-faced girl, whom he saw standing at a cottage door, if she could tell him where Mr. — resided?

The girl said "No," but, dropping a curtsey, added, "I think my mother can tell, as she washes for almost all the gentlefolks in the neighbourhood."

"Well then," said the gentleman, "will you be so kind as to go and ask your mother?"

"Oh yes, sir, directly," replied the damsel, and away she tripped into the cottage, apparently anxious to hide a fit of laughter with which, to the astonishment of the Portuguese, she seemed suddenly seized.

In a few minutes forth came the good dame of the cottage herself, wiping the suds from her arms, and evidently having only just sufficiently recovered from laughing, like her daughter. She asked, with becoming civility, the gentleman's pleasure.

The Portuguese, apologising for the trouble he gave, said he "simply wished to ask if she could direct him to the house of Mr. —."

Here the good woman's gravity seemed nearly put to flight. However, she contrived, after indulging in a gentle titter, to say it was no trouble to her, and directed him as well as she could to his friend's residence. Then, curtsying very low and simpering and blushing, she said:—

"I beg pardon, sir, I hope you will excuse me and my daughter's laughing, but as you are from foreign parts I see you do not know that we call it ax in our country, not ask."

A CHARADE FOR A LADY.

The following charade was addressed to a lady by Charles James Fox, whose name as a statesman and orator everyone knows who has read the history of the latter part of the eighteenth century:—

"Permit me, madam, to come uncalled into your ladyship's presence, and by dividing myself add greatly to my consequence. So exalted am I in the character of my first, that I have trampled on the pride of kings, and the greatest potentates have bowed down to embrace me; yet the dirtiest kennel in the dirtiest street is not too foul to have me for its inmate.

In my second, what infinite vanity! I am rich as the Eastern Nabob, yet poor as the weeping object of your benevolence. I am mild and gentle as the spring, yet savage and cruel as the wintry blast. I am young, beautiful, and happy, yet old, deformed and wretched. 'Tis from the highest authority I dare pronounce myself your superior; yet few instances are there to prove it, and many are the proofs against it. But your ladyship is tired and wishes my re-union; it is done, and I have no other merit than in remaining, as before, your ladyship's humble servant."

The answer to this ingenious and neatly put charade is, "footman."

IN CHURCH.

IN CHURCH.

By W. B. YEATS.

SHE prays for father, mother dear,
To Him with thunder shod,
She prays for every falling tear
In the holy church of God.

For all good men now fallen ill,
For merry men that weep,
For holiest teachers of His will,
And common men that sleep.

The sunlight flickering on the pews,
The sunlight in the air,
The flies that dance in threes, in twos,
They seem to join her prayer—

Her prayer for father, mother dear,
To Him with thunder shod,
A prayer for every falling tear
In the holy church of God.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR SUNDAYS?

By THE COUNTESS OF MEATH.

"At last the day has come to an end," we wearily exclaim, as we hear the clock in the neighbouring church tower announcing that hour. "What a long, long Sunday it has been to be sure!"

We slowly mount the stairs preparatory to retiring for the night, and as we go we have serious misgivings that this feeling of weariness, this desire to bring the day to a close, is all wrong, and the more we think over it the more persuaded are we that we have added one more to the mournful array of wasted days of which there have been all too many in our lives. . . . But a week has flown, once more ten o'clock is striking, but we scarcely heed it, for we are sitting wrapped in pleasant meditations by our own fireside, with dear ones around us. We had risen early, and had thoroughly enjoyed the invigorating freshness and hopefulness which belong to morning hours, for we had many little home duties to perform before we started for church.

It was a real pleasure to take our accustomed seat behind the choir boys. Surely the music was unusually good, and the service far more hearty than it was wont to be; or was it all imagination? and just because we were once more joining in it with those we loved? It was delightful, too, as we left church and walked down the narrow lane leading homewards, to receive warm greetings from friends both rich and poor.

We just peeped into a cottage where an invalid lay whom we used often to visit, and were warmly welcomed.

"I was just a-wearying to see you, miss. You'll come and read to me to-day, won't you, now?" said she. The promise was gladly given, and we pass on.

Luncheon is soon despatched, and we have time to rest and think over our afternoon's lesson with the Sunday-school scholars, and after awhile we set out to join them. We find these little people sadly fidgety and hard to manage. In our absence a teacher has had charge of our class, who seems to have enforced no discipline amongst them; so after many and hopeless struggles to rivet their attention, we try the experiment of closing the book and telling them the sweet old Bible stories, old, but ever new if rightly told. Ah, this answers; big eyes are fixed on us, and questions are asked by them which show that the children's interest has been great.

"Please, miss, will you be here next Sunday to tell us some more stories?" whispers little Mary at parting, as she presents us with a tiny posy, the product of a cottage garden of the smallest dimensions.

The church bells are again chiming, and it is time to be off for the afternoon service, consisting of the Litany only, and so we are soon free to pay our promised visit to the invalid. We feel it to be a privilege to stay awhile with such a holy-minded woman. We constantly feel this when visiting her. She, poor humble-minded soul, very possibly imagines that the benefit is all one-sided, that we are conferring a great favour in visiting her; whilst we, time after time, have come away from her couch of suffering, the better for having been there. To-day we felt this; and how humiliating it was to compare her love and gratitude to her Heavenly Father whom she thanked for her smallest mercy, with our thanklessness for many and great mercies!

Our home looked a cosy, happy abode as we again entered it. The drawing-room windows were thrown wide open, and the evening song of the birds came pouring in as we sat and watched others fearlessly hopping about on the lawn.

Whilst we are sipping a refreshing cup of tea comes the far from welcome piece of intelligence that Mrs. B., who is generally regarded as being much of a malade imaginaire, a lady of considerable means living at the extreme end of the village, had sent a message to say that she hoped we could go and sit with her, as her lady companion had suddenly been called away on account of her father's illness. Now it so happened that Mrs. B. was the person whom, perhaps, of all others we had the least possible desire to see on this particular Sunday. We knew her to be a confirmed grumbler, rather addicted to spreading unkind stories about her neighbours, leading her unfortunate companion a miserable life, and having in our eyes nothing attractive about her. What was to be done? how could we get off going?

"I am afraid, dear, there is nothing for it but to go; you can scarcely refuse Mrs. B.'s request," says someone, whose advice we know from long experience to be almost invariably right. Still, we hesitate; why go just to-day, when we are feeling happy, and things are going smoothly, to be very possibly made wretched by a discontented woman? But our better self prevails, and on our way to perform the unwelcome task more charitable thoughts take possession of us, and we determine to do what in us lies, not to give way to unkind thoughts towards one who is much to be pitied. Yes, that she was, in spite of all that her money could give her, her beautifully appointed house, her lovely garden, her endless comforts and luxuries. As we rang the bell two noisy little dogs rushed out, resenting the approach of a stranger, and their barks and ominous growls gave us no pleasant reception.

Entering the drawing-room, it struck us that the atmosphere was most oppressive, heavy with the scent of luscious flowers, heavy because the rich silken folds of the curtains seemed made to exclude any stray breath of heaven from entering; heavy too, because we had the feeling that voices of love and joy had of late never been heard within the walls. Here we found our hostess propped up with cushions, and with an eider-down quilt thrown over her, lying on the sofa; but she displayed unwonted energy in trying to allay the troublesome barking of the dogs, which made conversation next to impossible. At length they allowed themselves to be enticed up to their mistress's downy couch, and peace was so far restored.

We found Mrs. B. most unusually gracious to us; it is true the stream of complaints poured out most volubly at first; they were directed chiefly against her companion, whom she stoutly maintained ought never to have left her thus suddenly, for whatever cause, without giving her time to seek for someone else's service. But Mrs. B. was evidently tired of her own company, and glad to have the benefit of ours. We made the fortunate discovery during the course of conversation that the seaside place where we had been lately staying was but a few miles distant from the scene of her childhood; and we also most opportunely remembered that we had met, not long since, one who had known Mrs. B. in her youthful days, when, with some pretensions to beauty, and with a considerable fortune of her own, she was much sought after. Her face brightened up with an animation we had never noticed before, as she talked of days which were past, and she eagerly asked questions about families whom she used to know who lived in the neighbourhood. Our information was very imperfect, but by a strange coincidence we discovered that we had been visiting, in the local hospital, a girl who could be none other than the daughter of the gardener once in the employ of Mrs. B.'s father. This led us to talking about this poor woman's troubles, and how sadly she was in want of money to procure sufficiently nourishing food on leaving the institution.

Wonder of wonders! that purse, which was seldom known to be opened at the call of distress, was so on this occasion, and a golden coin was handed over to be spent as we thought best. Just then the chimes for evening service were distinctly heard, reminding us of the hour of prayer. Could we venture to suggest that we too should share in those about to be offered? Our heart beat loud as we made the proposal to read a Psalm and a few collects. "I don't mind if you do," was the reply. After we had done so, and were rising to depart, Mrs. B. said, "You have a soft voice, and it calms my poor nerves; come again some other Sunday and see me." What does this mean? we think, as we wend our way homewards. Could it be that Mrs. B., whom we had never thought of but as an intensely uninteresting, selfish woman whom we always tried to avoid—might she be one to whom we could be of real service? We know not, but feel much cheered. Preparations for supper were rapidly going on as we reached home, and when it was over and we were just preparing to take up a favourite book, the thought of an absent dear one occurred to us to whom words from home would be very welcome. We meant the letter to be a short one, but there was much to tell, and we had not long seated ourselves in our accustomed corner when ten o'clock struck, and found us wrapped in not unpleasant thoughts. We were contrasting this Sunday, which had been such a happy day, with the last, and yet we could recall nothing to our memories which we had done on the previous one to which the strictest of Sabbatarians could object. We had attended several services and had taken no frivolous book into our hands. It must, therefore, have been omission rather than commission which had spoilt our Sunday. Perhaps our very prayers had been selfish, and we recalled the saying of a dear friend long since gone to his rest, who was wont to say that people took selfishness to church with them along with their Bibles and prayer books. Perhaps that demon had been our companion, little though we may have thought it, on the previous Sunday, for we could not remember any act of self-denial, any effort which we had made to benefit others. If a heathen emperor was right in thinking that he had wasted a day on which he had not been of service to any human creature, surely Christians ought to be willing to acknowledge the same, and not to except that day on which the gospel of love is preached in their hearing. A Sunday of "boredom" must needs be wrong, and the cure for boredom is to be up and doing that which is worth the doing. It is not possible, we think, for all to spend many hours in reading and meditation; minds are so differently constituted, a good book may with many be the best of companions for a prolonged period, but the young, the active, the restless may soon grow tired of reading, and long for some other occupation. What can they do? Some would answer, "Let Sundays be more like other days; let us go to church, if we will, in the morning, but if we are young why not amuse ourselves of an afternoon? What can be the harm of a game of lawn tennis and a few friends to tea afterwards? And as for little Sunday dinner-parties, they are a most sociable institution; people must eat somewhere; why not altogether?"

May there not be, we reflect, a grave danger lurking behind these and similar suggestions, in breaking down old restrictions which our fathers and forefathers held to be sacred? It is so easy to pull down, so hard to build up. A fool may pick to pieces that which wise men may find it next to impossible to put together. Is there not a serious risk nowadays lest, for the sake of the selfish pleasure of the richer members of the community, because some of them, not content with six days of amusement now, wish to usurp the seventh, the poorer are to be deprived of the rest which they have earned by a week of toil. The mere pleasure-seeker ignores or cares not for the fact that they have souls to be thought of, homes to be visited, where they will be welcomed by wife and children, father and mother, that they too have ties of friendship which they may long to renew, that they may crave for a little of the leisure which often hangs very heavily on his hands. Therefore, setting on one side altogether the solemn question of whether the observance of Sunday ought to be lightly regarded, is it not well for us to see if we cannot employ some of our time usefully by undertaking, perchance, some little necessary duty, which will free others to enjoy the means of worship, the society of friends and relations, of which we should certainly rob them if Sunday entertainments are to be instituted.

Then, too, we further consider, there is a wide field of usefulness for us if we would look round and see what is to be done for poor neighbours, to whom the day of rest is much the same as any other day, or as a poor woman in a workhouse infirmary expressed it, "Sunday after Sunday comes, and there is nothing of the Sabbath in it." Her paralysed limbs could not carry her even the short distance which it was necessary to traverse in order to reach the little chapel belonging to the institution. The experience of that poor woman is doubtless that of vast numbers of her companions in misfortune, whose fate it is to be inmates of those gaunt, too-much-forgotten institutions—workhouses—which are scattered so freely about the country. They have, it is true, chaplains appointed to visit the patients in the wards as well as to conduct the services in the workhouse chapel; but Sunday is such a busy day with them, that they cannot always find time for attending to the spiritual needs of those who are the most infirm, and even when the necessary time is found, the adjunct of a few fresh voices to lead the singing is a most valuable one, and makes the chaplain's visits more cheering to these afflicted ones who find this earth such a dreary place that they listen eagerly to hymns which tell of the joys of heaven.

Besides workhouses there must needs be many other institutions where kindly visitors would be not unlikely to find a most cordial reception. Then there are the ignorant, those who know so little about those things which the more favoured are taught in their childhood; could not some spare Sunday hours be well employed in teaching them? Nor need our employments necessarily take us out of our own homes, for much can be done within them.

We can, for instance, discourse sweet music, holy strains which may not only be a joy to ourselves, but which may help to draw others heavenwards. How touching it is, we think, when we pass by many strange abodes, in which the inhabitants, their thoughts, their ways, are all unknown to us, and then suddenly catch the sound of song being raised, reminding the wayfarer that in this house God is worshipped, His praises sung! Then, if our voice must be silent, our pen may often accomplish far more than our tongue could ever do. There are happily in these latter nineteenth-century days such numbers of societies, guilds, organisations of all kinds afloat—which in the days of our fathers were not—for helping the friendless, for aiding the tempted, for guiding the young. Sunday is the very day for writing a letter which requires time and thought to be bestowed on it, and which needs us to be inspired with our best of thoughts, such thoughts as should, as a matter of course, be uppermost in our minds if our Sunday worship has been aright. But it is not only the poor to whom our ministrations need to be confined, there are sad hearts to comfort, lonely ones to cheer, afflicted souls to soothe, belonging to every rank and living under very various conditions; if we earnestly seek it, surely plenty of employment ought to be found in ministering, in some way or other, to such as these. "He that watereth shall be watered also himself," comes very literally true, and from one seed of kindness may sometimes be reaped a whole harvest field of love.

"A penny for your thoughts, dearie; you have been a whole hour in a regular brown study, and haven't said a word to me nor to anybody else," says a kind voice beside us, whilst a kind hand is thrust into ours.

"Pray forgive me; I am very sorry," we reply; "but you're a rash person, you will have to pay the penny for my thoughts tomorrow, when I tell you all about them; but it is too late to do so now; good-night, and sweet dreams."

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER X.

THE FIRST RIPE EAR OF THE HARVEST.—THE ARRIVAL OF THE QUEEN, AND HER SECOND ENTRANCE INTO OXFORD WITH THE KING IN STATE.

THE days passed in a kind of misleading hurry and spasmodic activity on all sides. There was the raising of recruits north, south, east, and west, with the continued sitting of the Long Parliament in London, and the marching and counter-marching of armies, but there was no other considerable battle, and there was no immediate threat of an attack on Oxford, where the King lay entrenched behind the two rivers, and the fortifications of which Kitty had seen the building. The flank of one extended into the very meadows where she had helped to gather the fritillaries. This April they would be all trampled and crushed under foot, until hardly one could raise, first its drooping bell, and then its weird snake's head, with shrivelled tongue and quivering fangs, to grin and mock at the startled beholder; and when June and July came, the snowy and the golden water lilies would float and sway on the watery beds formed for them by the Cherwell and the Isis, undisturbed by Oxford maid.

Well would it have been for maid and man if their losses had been confined to fritillaries and water lilies. On the 17th of June, 1643, in what was little better than a skirmish to defeat a Royalist attack on a Parliamentary outpost, so grievous a blow was dealt to one of the contending factions that it reacted, not in loud triumph but in silent regret, on the other. The pity of it spread far and wide amongst all who had taken serious thought on the causes and consequences of the great civil war. In the middle of the fighting at Chalgrove a soldier quitted the ranks in which he had held a prominent place, and rode off the field, "his head hanging down, and resting his hands on the neck of his horse." He had received a mortal wound, of which he died in a week. That man was John Hampden, a singularly brave and noble English gentleman, of Buckinghamshire, of large estates, a cousin of Oliver Cromwell by birth, and by scholarship a former demy of Magdalen. He had been a fondly attached husband, whose cherished wife's death occurred after she had borne him ten children. He had been a member of successive Parliaments, where, as the result of his disinterestedness, earnestness, justice, and moderation, which no arraignment or imprisonment for the course he took could materially lessen, he was regarded not only as the leader of his party, but as the embodiment of manly honesty, sagacity, and love of country. On this account, still more than because of his distinguished ability as a statesman, all men involuntarily turned to him so long as there was a hope of peace. He was slow to draw the sword against his English brethren; so far as his personal feelings were concerned, he would sooner have emigrated, but having drawn it, the saying went abroad that "he threw away the scabbard," so bent was he on bringing the business to a speedy and definite conclusion. He displayed as much military genius as he had shown governing faculty, and was looked to as the general on the Parliamentary side who should supersede Essex and Waller. It was this man who, before he had reached the age of forty-eight, fell in the obscure fight at Chalgrove. There was a moment's pause of grief and dismay in the fierce warfare, while the worthy on both sides acknowledged that a prince had fallen in Israel, and mourned for him accordingly.

Kitty heard the melancholy tidings, at which her father's face only grew harder and grimmer. But Lady Ottery's features worked with strong emotion as she wrung her hands and cried out without restraint, not caring who heard her, "Oh, the shame of it! The wrong of it! To pit such a man against your sleek silken courtiers and base sycophants, your brawlers and cut-throats!"

Kitty thought what bitter lamentation there would be at Islip Barnes, where the patriot had been the most honoured of guests. For though he was twice as old and of higher estate and greater fortunes than Anthony Walton, John Hampden had not been the man who would decline to condescend to a younger, poorer brother, while the fact that both had been Magdalen men served as a link between them.

Neither among Roundheads nor Cavaliers was there another leader like Hampden—not to say in intellectual gifts suited to the strait, but in stainless integrity and generous self-forgetfulness, unless it were Lucius Carey, Lord Falkland. For a time the two had stood together voting for the same liberal, reasonable measures till the strife in Parliament threatened violent issues, then Falkland and other like-minded Royalists drew apart and ranged themselves by the King, whose private character they honoured and loved, whose kingly prerogative they could not brook to see defied.

Kitty Dacre had heard much of Lord Falkland, whose country house of Great Tew was but ten or twelve miles from Oxford; and there he made every true scholar welcome to share his state and bounty, dispensing his hospitality with such princely freedom and grace that each man could come and go as it suited him. His place at table was kept for him, his chamber which bore his name was at his service, the flowery green retreats of the garden, the wilderness and the park were as much for his benefit as for their master's.

Dr. Peter Dacre had once been persuaded to pay a visit to Tew, and had waxed eloquent afterwards to Lady Ottery and Kitty on the unique charm of its refined delights for the senses, combined with the deep mental satisfaction of such learned converse, such refreshing plunges into Castalian springs, such ardent researches in philosophy and physics as could not have been surpassed in the best appointed of the colleges in their palmiest days.

Falkland, like Hampden in his youth, had a wife and children whom he dearly loved. Indeed, to win his wife he had endured the greatest trial of his life—alienation from his father, who had, according to the fashion of the day, planned a great match for his son, and when the latter used his right of choice, refused to be reconciled, though Lucius Carey offered to renounce his title and estates so that he might but retain his father's regard.

Even the women about Great Tew, to which Lord Falkland had succeeded on the death of his father, had their share of the high culture of the place, so that its master was wont to say, laughingly, that if he wished to ascertain whether any word which he had employed in his writing was sufficiently simple and intelligible for a plain audience, he did not even read it to his lady's waiting-maid, for she might have caught the trick of reading the French romances from her mistress; he called upon one of the ordinary rustic maid-servants, and read over the sentence to her, and if she comprehended it he was content.

Kitty knew Lord Falkland by sight and hearing, and was proud to remember that once, when he had come upon her walking with her father, he had asked to be presented to Mrs. Dacre. He was a little man, like the future admiral, Robert Blake. Lord Falkland might also have been refused a fellowship at Merton on the ground of his low stature, if he had competed for it under the same warden. Another personal disadvantage was the harshness of his voice; but one soon forgot the strident tones in the matchless courtesy of the good man, the perfect gentleman, and the accomplished scholar.

There was a brooding shadow on Falkland's brow in those days, when he was much with the King at Oxford; and it could not be kept secret that not only was the true heart rent by the country's divisions, he had little hope of the success of his master's cause. Nay, he could not desire it without reserves and misgivings, for even as he loved his kind, he loathed rather than loved the grievous abuses which had crept into the administration. He turned with unmitigated disgust from the gross excesses of such a man in power as George Lord Goring, even from the rough and ready tactics of the King's wild nephew, Prince Rupert, who, fresh from an early apprenticeship to German campaigning, considered that war, civil war in England, meant plundering, pillaging, and burning wherever his horse in their brilliant charges cleared the way. Little wonder that Lord Falkland felt himself in a hopeless entanglement, and with the word "peace" for ever on his lips, was tempted to look longingly to the probability of a violent death as his sole earthly chance of deliverance. No doubt the inclination was increased by what Kitty heard much talked of in Oxford in those days—that is to say, the bad luck which had attended both Lord Falkland and the King when they were in the Bodleian Library together, and having a rare copy of Virgil in their hands, were moved to try what has been called the sortes Virgilianæ. This phrase may be freely translated in plain English as seeking to have one's fortune told by applying at random to the printed words of Virgil.

The process was to thrust a penknife or a bodkin into the Virgil, then to open the book and accept the passage at which the index pointed, as the answer to the quest. In each of the two cases the answers were strikingly adverse. That to the King was a prediction of the horrors of war, of a fugitive hunted from place to place, of a doomed King destined never to reign again, to be separated from all he held dear, to die before his time, his body left to rot without a grave. That to Falkland was the lament over a young hero slain in battle.

The talk over these unsatisfactory prophecies did not prevent farther idle, unwarrantable inquiries into the un-revealed future; on the contrary, it provoked much morbid, undesirable speculation with approaches to such Delphic oracles as were represented by the astrologers and Rosicrucians, and by more arrant as well as more vulgar impostors. For the honest astrologers and Rosicrucians believed what they said, and were simply lost among labyrinths of their own creating; but the mere mountebanks who traded on the credulity of the ignorant and foolish were in a different case.

Kitty's precocious common sense, even without the quick intervention and absolute prohibition of Lady Ottery, backed by the authority of Dr. Dacre, saved the young girl from such snares. Kitty shut her eyes and put her hands behind her back whenever she was asked to look into crystals or handle spells. "If the Lord God had willed me to know what is going to happen, He would have told me plain, not in riddles," she said; "and I am content to abide by His will, yes, even for those I love best. For if I did know that an ill-hap was to befall them, I could do no more good in the world for bemoaning it, and struggling to prevent what was decreed." "No, sir," or "madam," in reply to somebody who sought to shake her resolution, "real prophecy never was such a riddle. It was veiled truth, I grant you, because it could not have been spoke unveiled, and the prophet have lived an hour longer. I have been taught it was sometimes veiled even from him who prophesied, because he was not great enough or wise enough to bear the whole truth; and it was the spiritual teaching of a nation, not of an individual. Men were warned it was to have no private interpretation. No, sure, madam, though I am, as you say, full young to have an opinion of my own on such things, and I ask your pardon for differing from you, but I do not go in with you, when you liken the ravings of lunatics and false pretenders to the prophecies of Jeremiah or Daniel."

The only dabbling which Kitty had in such investigations was of an entirely light and comical character; and, as she said stottily, the result was not such as to induce her to penetrate the mystery further. Like sweet, virtuous and witty Mrs. Dorothy Osborne, of Chicksand—whose letters, intended for Mr. William Temple's eyes alone, have been read with lively interest and pleasure by a multitude of readers of another generation—Kitty consented to draw for a valentine on St. Valentine's Day. She, too, was pressed into the service of inscribing, cutting, and folding the slips of paper, so that nobody should know the one from the other, to be used in the "Valentine's dealing." This was when one or two young friends of Lady Ottery's were gathered together for the ceremony. They conducted it with an abundance of blithe jesting and merry chatter and laughter, unrebuked by their hostess. She did not even remind them that war was raging in an unhappy kingdom.

Kitty was also guilty, in the course of the summer, of placing on the threshold of the house that nine-pea'd pod whose presence there was to decide, according to the Christian name of the first man who entered the doorway, what was to be the Christian name of Kitty Dacre's husband. "But where is the use of such silly experiments?" sensible Kitty demanded. "I tell thee I did draw for my valentine a contemporary and friend of my father's. He chanced to be a bachelor, and his name had been mischievously writ by Cicely Spenser as one of the blanks in a lottery. As for the mystic nine-pea'd pod, it only brought the old man who sellethe billets for firewood. His name is Zachary. Now there do not be more than fifty Zacharys in all England, and I cannot be expected to know above a couple of them, therefore I protest, Mrs. Judy, I am not to have a great choice."

With July the Queen arrived from the north of England escorted by the Marquis of Montrose, sent on by the Earl of Newcastle. She was met with great joy by her royal husband near the field of Edgehill, in the vale of Keynton. The pair again entered Oxford in state, and were received with loud acclamation.

If there were sullen townsmen by, and University men whose sons or brothers had fallen in recent skirmishes, or whose kinsmen were fighting in a detachment of the Parliamentary army against Hopton or Rupert, these malcontents kept in the background, for they were now hugely outnumbered. Besides, the crowd of visitors, though they did nothing to raise the falling fortunes of the University—on the contrary, drained them still farther by the call they made for lavish hospitality—brought about a great increase to the retail trade of the town, and left many a shopkeeper passing rich. Not only was Oxford in the hands of the Royalists, filled full of Royalist families, the seat of what was called the "Monogrel Parliament," summoned by the King in opposition to the Parliament in London, a turn seemed to have come in the King's fortunes. The Cornish men had risen in his favour, and won over all Devonshire and Somerset, defeating Sir William Waller, whom his followers had nicknamed, in honour of his earlier successes, "William the Conqueror." The large city of Bristol had surrendered to the King. Yorkshire had returned to its old allegiance. Hesitating peers and official commissioners had posted from London with terms of parley and peace. Scotland, too, had sent a deputation to treat with the King. It is easy to comprehend how to the rash and the sanguine on one side, and to the timid on the other, the King appeared to have the matter in his own hands; and perhaps, in truth, he had, for a space, but for the infatuation which closed his eyes to the signs of the times, and prevented his taking fortune at the flood-tide, by listening to the counsels of his wisest and truest friends. That infatuation threw him back on the advice and opinions of the imperious, shallow Queen, who did not dream of questioning her perfect right and ability to affect his public decisions, of whose influence over him, the King—far from seeking to resist or deny it—was rather inclined, with a generous folly, to make a proud boast.

The Queen, both by letter and when present with her husband, scouted every proposal of a compromise with his subjects in arms against him, and Charles submitted to the judgment of her and her friends till the time for compromise was past. The commissioners were recalled in all haste to London by an angry Parliament, with which the King would not treat unless on conditions which would have made all its past struggles and hard-won gains in vain. The peers, hesitating between the two sides, followed the commissioners. The Scotch envoys returned as they had come.

The reason of the reversal of the natural relations between husband and wife was to be found, not merely in the King's boundless affection for Henrietta Maria, but in the fact that she had been making the most strenuous efforts to promote his cause, according to her views. She had incurred endless fatigues, and even braved serious dangers in her enterprise. She had been for some time in Holland, with the ostensible purpose of taking over her daughter, Princess Mary, who had been married, when a mere child, to the young Prince of Orange, and installing her with her husband's relations, in order to have her education finished in what was to be her future country. There Henrietta Maria's winning and voluble tongue, together with the strong argument of the jewels, which she pledged, was able to raise large sums of money. She also procured stores of ammunition, including cannon, which were afterwards termed in bitter mockery "The Queen's gods." All this was in spite of the facts that she was a princess among republicans, a Roman Catholic by creed, addressing the trading magnates of the most Protestant country in Europe, and in that light the natural enemies of France.

In addition to this she fell on the feminine device of causing large numbers of what were called "Queen's Pledges" to be made and given, like bank notes or pawn-tickets, in exchange for the gold and silver plate and the money value of houses and lands which the King's subjects were asked to furnish for the royal maintenance and the support of the army. These pledges were in the shape of rings, lockets, and clasps, with the initials of "Henrietta Maria Regina" in gold filigree work on red velvet, or in blue enamel under a crystal, cut like a diamond, and set in gold. It was understood that these pledges, when returned to the Queen in prosperous times, would secure either the repayment of the property thus bestowed or such Court promotion as the bestowers coveted. As one reward of her expedition and achievements, Henrietta Maria in her absence was accused and found guilty of high treason by the Parliament in London, and had a sentence of proscription and outlawry passed upon her—a sentence which, failing its execution, was simply calculated to increase her hostility to the Commons and to impress yet more deeply on her mind the sense of her personal importance in the national conflict.

The effect which the Act of Parliament against the Queen had on the King was to render him passionately indignant and resentful. He was thenceforth more disposed than ever to look upon his Queen and wife as an injured victim. He well knew that a large part of the nation had dealt with her from the first, when she came little more than a child among them, in a spirit of suspicion and distrust. He was now persuaded that her devoted, heroic services to himself had put the finishing touch to her offences as an alien in race and creed.

In the course of her adventures Henrietta Maria had been tossed to and fro in a great storm at sea which met the little fleet that was bringing her back to England. After she had landed at Burlington, the house in which she slept on the first night was subjected to a cannonade opened on the town by a Parliamentary commodore, who had been watching for the arrival of her and her stores, under their Dutch escort, at New-castle. He followed her into Burlington Bay, thus saluted her, and disturbed her morning slumbers.

Little wonder that the romantic nature of Charles, and for that matter of the mass of the chivalrous Cavaliers, magnified these exploits, and were ready to welcome Henrietta Maria as a deliverer, when, with her thousand Royalists, gathering in numbers as they marched south, full of the enthusiasm which the high-spirited woman shed around her, she rode, as she declared, "a soldier among soldiers." She started with them in the morning, and halted with them in the evening, partook of their rations, took the little town of Tadcaster from the rebels on the way, and at last, after she had been joined for her better protection by a force under Prince Rupert, met her grateful lord and king under the shadow of the Edgehills.

To such a height had Henrietta Maria's popularity with the King's party reached, that the words which accompanied the Cavalier charge at that time were "God for Queen Mary." What was a still more ominous symptom of her supremacy, at least of her equality with the King, from that date there were two Royal Courts. Men spoke of "the King's Court" and "the Queen's Court;" not that the Royal couple were disunited in affection and interest, but that the Queen and her councillors were practically independent. The last were accomplished courtiers, but ill-informed statesmen, graceful but graceless; men whose lives were as scandalously dissolute in the eyes of their more sober-minded companions as their profession of submission to the Royal will was absolute.

Indeed, when we read of Henrietta Maria's special courtiers and chosen friends, both men and women, we are forced to the conclusion, even after every allowance is made for her girlish thoughtlessness when she was first exalted to share a throne, and for the Court in which she was born and bred, that she must have been, with all her warmth of heart and constancy of attachment, her sunny frankness and sweetness of temper, strangely and disastrously deficient in moral perception.

But few above all of the younger Royalists made such reflections when, like Kitty Dacre, they rejoiced to see her Majesty again, and to know that she was restored to the King, who, when all England was his, had still counted her the brightest jewel in his crown. She was come to dwell in Oxford for a time. They, her fair and loyal subjects, were to bask for several months in the radiance of her rank, beauty, and wit, and to learn for themselves what were the unapproachable dignity and charm of a Court in its refined elegance and dainty gaiety. Learned doctors' daughters, like Kitty Dacre, though they were fairly well born, had neither the means nor the opportunity to travel to London to be presented to the Queen and take part in royal galas; and so the Queen had come to Oxford for their benefit, and was in the humour to be most gracious to all the Oxford maids who approached her. True it was in the winter of her own and her King's adversity, and the sunshine of their State was somewhat dim, and wan, and broken by vapours and storms, as all winter sunshine must be;

but everybody said then that the spring and the summer of their glory were coming again. Even as it was, to all generous and susceptible hearts there was a particular attraction, a subtle fascination in what the sacred persons of their Majesties had already undergone, and might be compelled to endure farther.

Kitty has been described as admirably sensible and reasonable for her age, rendered thoughtful betimes and constrained not to yield to partiality or prejudice, however natural, but to judge righteous judgment. The obligation was laid upon her by the misfortune of the division in her family, an emblem of the division in the nation, which had driven her beloved Jack from her, and separated her from the kind household at Islip Barnes. Still Kitty was not a phenomenon of a girl of seventeen years. She had all the eager sympathies and aspirations of her age; she no longer needed to stand on a stool at Lady Ottery's elbow when the grand cavalcade wound up the storied street of colleges and quaint houses, and she waved her handkerchief among the foremost to greet her sovereigns. She, too, insisted on admiring the brown tan which the Queen's experience as a soldier had lent to her beautiful complexion, and would have it that it was purely becoming. At least it served to divert attention from the thinness of the cheeks and the prominence of the mouth, which at thirty-four were the drawbacks to Henrietta Maria's dark-eyed, glowing beauty.

Kitty was so carried away by the sentiment of the hour that she could hardly understand what Lady Ottery meant when she said aloud, "Would to heaven she had been more English and less French, that she had not manœuvred and plotted and given her right hand to George Goring and her left to Digby to save my Lord Strafford, who was not to be saved by such underhand means."

Kitty had forgotten all that she had ever heard of such mischievous meddling in public affairs. She was hearing and telling stories of the Queen's dauntless courage and her unflinching kindness of heart. In the middle of the storm at sea she had reassured her frightened ladies with the cheerful words, "Take comfort, mes chères, Queens of England are never drowned."

When the house in which she slept at Burlington was struck by the enemy's balls, she was roused to quit its insufficient shelter and take refuge with her ladies in a neighbouring ditch. But she remembered an ugly old lap-dog named Mitté, of which she was fond, though nobody else would have prized it, and, in the teeth of every remonstrance, ran back and fetched it from the bed on which it lay.

"Yes, her gracious Majesty honoured me with her notice when she came last, and I was a tiresome little girl," Kitty explained, with great satisfaction, to her audience. "The King, too, did condescend to speak to me. I scarce remember what they said, it is so long ago, but my Lady Ottery can tell you."

(To be continued.)

WHAT SUMMER MAY DO FOR THE INVALID.

By MEDICUS.

and sweet as nuts, pea-green on one side and prettily tinged with auburn on the side on which the sun lingered longest. It was a shapely tree too, and even its dark green leaves had a bouquet strong enough to lure the bees. But one spring after coming into the most gorgeous of bloom and plenitude of promise, my tree caught a chill somehow, and seemed to lose heart from that very day.

"I won't be able to bear a single apple this year," it told me, for mind, you, my trees all talk to me, and my flowers also.

"Won't you really?" I replied.

"No, I'm sure I shan't, nor can't. Look how my blooms are dropping before the time; my very leaves are getting cold and hard, and beginning to curl up, and I have aches and pains in every limb. I'm growing old before my time. I do believe that in a year or two I'll be as wrinkled and gnarled as the wretched old ribston-pippin tree that grows by the stable yonder. That is a nice future to look forward to, and I am only fifteen last November."

"A change, perhaps," I suggested, "might do you good. Would you like to travel a bit? There is a nice sunny spot at the bottom of the paddock yonder—"

"What?" cried the tree, "and get choked with dust from the road; all the pores of my leaves filled up with the clouds raised by the feet of Hodge's horses. No, thank you, I would rather die at home than go abroad to be ill-treated among strangers. If you have nothing better to propose, just leave me alone, and go and talk to the stupid old ribston you seem to admire so much."

"Don't be jealous; I love you all, and I'll do my best for you. Keep up your heart; we will see what the summer can do."

The tree sighed rather hopelessly, and whispered something to the winds that I did not quite catch.

It was a month before I went down that way again. When I did, my heart bled for the poor wee tree. All the bloom had long since faded and fallen. There was an ugly patch of blight all along one-half of the trunk, and the leaves were dry, spotted, and curled. I spoke to it, but got no reply. The tree was uneasily dozing, and perhaps dreaming, for aught I could tell.

The sunshine was very bright now, and the breezes warm and balmy; but they had little effect on my sick tree, and I felt very sorry indeed. However, while there is life there is hope, so I set to work, after having a good look about to begin with.

"The summer is all before us," I said, "and it is really wonderful what can be done in a single summer in the way of restoration to health of even a tree."

Well, the ground around was not particularly rich, so I set about trenching and feeding it. That was a step in the right direction, but my plan of treatment was even more radical than this, for not far away grew two trees that had no earthly business near my apple tree. One was a sycamore that the wind had sown. It had grown very fast, and its broad leaves and spreading foliage were quite keeping the air and sunshine from my young friend. Down it came, and up came the root. The other was an alder tree, the seed of which the sparrow had brought, or rather, perhaps, the starling. However, there it was, and there I was determined it should not remain; but even after it was cut down it took John and myself a whole forenoon to unearth its spreading roots. When we had done so, I positively believe the apple tree gave a sigh of relief, as if it could already breathe more freely.

"Now, John," I said, "all the rest devolves on you. Feed this little tree well. Mulch it round the roots, so that it shall never feel faint or thirsty, and get that blight off the stem. Use the bath, medicated as I shall show you how to do, and get off not only the blight but the outer rough skin, and eradicate every crack and crevice where the disease might find a footing."

John did as I told him. We nursed this tree all through the summer; it fell into a sound refreshing sleep when November winds began to blow; it budded and blossomed in spring, and bore fruit next season, and at this present moment it is one of the healthiest and happiest trees in my paddock orchard. This is what a single summer did for my little tree.

Now Nature is just as kind to human beings as she is to trees. The more firmly you believe that fact the better. Well, what does it prove? It proves that there are fifty chronic ailments, and perhaps twice that number which can be cured or removed, at all events alleviated, if we go the right way about it, in summer-time. Mind this, those same complaints during the cold uncertain weather of winter and spring could not well be got over, but may be now; so I wish all who read this paper, and who perhaps suffer from chronic ailments, to become happy and hopeful once again.

I have something more to add before mentioning any special complaints, namely, that a remodelled régime will materially assist recovery from almost any chronic illness, especially if backed up by simple remedies that have a tendency to purify and strengthen the blood, and keep the secretory organs in good working order. So you must see that, even if you are under medical supervision, you can do a deal for yourself, by strictly obeying the laws of health. But it is possible, indeed it is probable, that you can do without a doctor entirely; that is, without a human doctor, for I wish you—and indeed you will have to—put yourself under the kindly care of Dr. Sunshine, Dr. Fresh Air, Dr. Exercise, and Dr. Regularity.

If you do not do as I tell you, I have nothing more to do with your case; I am free as the winds. Make out your plan then; remodel your régime or method of living. Write it down on paper, and stick to it. There is something else you must write down, namely, a list of your present symptoms. Put down every ache and uneasy feeling, not only of body but of mind. Do not look at this for a fortnight or three weeks; but during that time live by your new rules, which you will have no difficulty in forming or framing after reading this paper; then re-read your list of symptoms. Why, to your joy and surprise you will find them decimated, and more than decimated, many of them dead and gone, never to return.

Rheumatism.—The young suffer from this as much, if not quite so often, as the old. It is a complaint that is often generated during the cold months of winter and spring, hangs about one all summer, and becomes still more active at the end of it. It is called a blood disease, and if we say that it depends upon a superabundance of acid in the blood, we get near enough to the physiology of the complaint for any practical purpose. This acid is accumulated in the system from errors in diet, especially intemperance in eating; it can be thrown off daily for a time, when due attention is paid to the skin; but cold and wet prevent its elimination either by the skin or internal organs of secretion; then the mischief is produced, joints and muscles suffer and swell, or become stiff and painful without swelling. If such a state of matters be not remedied we have the rheumatic diathesis generated, and the patient will become more subject to rheumatism as she grows older.

Well, the summer can work wonders for the cure of rheumatism. Mark this, however: resuming old habits of life, living carelessly and neglecting the skin, will undo in the winter months all the benefits wrought during summer.

The general régime for this as well as other chronic ailments I shall mention presently. As to medicine, if not acting under the advice of a physician, the less you take the better. You must not weaken the system by aperients, but if such be needed, and fruit, a moderate amount of green vegetables, with a glass of warm water in the morning, are not sufficient to keep the digestion free, a casarca tablet or two should be taken every second night.

Lime-juice has given relief to thousands of sufferers from chronic rheumatism. The quantity taken must be from three to six ounces, or even more, daily. Flannel should be worn next the skin, and it is not a bad plan, though a very old-fashioned one, to dust the flowers of sulphur inside the stockings worn.

Drink Vichy or even Carlsbad water, and if you can choose your place of residence, try the Isle of Wight, Hastings, Harrogate, or the Riviera.

Nervousness.—This, of course, takes a variety of different forms, and causes a patient to feel very low indeed. I think as a rule that the toning or keeping-up system is too much adopted by patients. If they are pale and bloodless, iron may be necessary, and the best form is the dialysed iron, because it is not so heating. But anything that tends to irritate the digestive canal is bad, and I am sure that wines and cordials, so much "flown to," as well as overeating to support the system, are bad. The first sign of returning health from nervousness is to be looked for in calmness of mind and body, and the toning-up plan of treatment is against this feeling of health-giving calm.

SUMMER,

Dyspepsia.—Summer can work wonders for the cure of this complaint, if you rest the system all you can, and the stomach. Do not eat if not hungry. Get some simple tonic mixture to take before meals, and let this be your only medicine. Keep the mind easy, and beware of all kinds of indigestible diet. The Kepler extract of malt is my own cure when I suffer from dyspepsia and weakness of nerves from over-work. It has with me a magical effect. I should probably take cod-liver oil, but I cannot easily assimilate it.

Liver complaints.—I refer only to those of a chronic character, but when, from whatever cause, the bile is not properly got rid of from the blood, the individual is most morbid in mind and body. Antibilious pills are usually somewhat rough, and the after effects are not agreeable. Probably one or two may be necessary to begin with, and the best is good old Coddle. Then take half a lemon—the juice, I mean—in water before going to bed, and the other half before breakfast, for a fortnight.

Headaches.—Find out what causes the complaint. Get your physician to give you a prescription that shall be handy, and trust the rest to régime and the sweet summer air. Caffeine tablets, I may add, give great relief in temporary headache.

Backache.—This is a wearying, painful symptom of a great many ailments, but it is caused by neuralgia as often as not. By all means consult a doctor, but trust a deal also to régime. Very likely there is some enervated action of the heart. The tiny branches of the nerves lie alongside the capillary blood-vessels, and if these last are engorged with blood owing to a weakened circulation they press on the nervelets, and cause gnawing pain and weariness. Hence the good effect of toning the whole system not by medicine so much as proper diet and action.

These are only a very small percentage of the ailments that can be removed by a properly regulated régime during the summer weather. I ought perhaps to have mentioned chest complaints, but these of course are included.

As to the place you may choose for a summer residence I can have little to say, it depends on so many contingencies. Anyhow, let it be a change of air for you, and if possible either in a mountain land like the Highlands, or by the seaside.

If you have to take a house or engage apartments, make every inquiry before doing so, about the drainage, the water for drinking purposes, and for the bath. See that the place is thoroughly clean and the people also who are to attend upon you. Disease often is bred in and emanates from a filthy kitchen.

If you are in some measure an invalid, the house should be a quiet one. Take the rooms on a week's trial at first.

The upper rooms are most healthy, but the whole house should have a healthful exposure, and the living rooms ought to face the south and west.

Cultivate early rising—say seven or half-past. Dress leisurely, and meanwhile have your glass of water medicated; if you are weak, a cup of good beef tea will do good, or a cup of cocoa if this will agree.

The morning bath as cold as possibly can be borne, and if you can manage it, a quarter of an hour with light dumb-bells afterwards. Let sea-salt be dissolved in the bath over night; two or even three large handfuls to a bucket of cold water.

It is a good plan to have a spirit lamp arrangement, by which you can not only heat beet tea, but the hot water for toilet purposes. It is so simple and makes one independent of Sarah Jane, who never brings the water at the correct time and temperature.

Take five minutes' open-air breathing before breakfast. Live well, but do not eat much. Meat is more strengthening than much flour food; then you have fish, eggs, and fowl.

Milk is invaluable as an article of diet. You can hardly have too much of it, if it can be digested. Tea must be weak, and stimulants totally (teetotally) abstained from.

Do not use much butter or oily fish, no pastry or cheese, no hot sauces; as condiments I should permit mustard, pepper, and a little vinegar, with now and then onions as a relish. Cayenne is also good, in moderation.

Be all day long in the open air, and have sea-bathing regularly if you have it at all.

The Turkish bath once a week unless contraindicated.

Wear a flannel belt round the loins.

Beware of draughts.

Do not sit in a strong sunshine.

Do not walk till you perspire.

Avoid fatigue in every form.

Take plenty of exercise, nevertheless, and see that it is of a pleasurable sort.

Dine in the middle of the day. Have an hour's siesta afterwards. Then tea, then walking; supper early, and a good long delightful walk an hour afterwards.

A bottle of Vichy or soda water, and one little dry biscuit before going to bed, are often productive of a good night's sleep.

Such a simple régime as the above, coupled with the healing power of the summer air to be breathed everywhere in these islands, except in towns, will often do wonders in restoring health.

At the seaside, I may add, much benefit is obtained, in cases of nervous disorder and liver complaints, or, indeed, whenever the system wants setting up and calming at one and the same time, by taking a course of hot sea-water baths. These are to be had at most large watering-places on the coast.

But whatever is done must be done systematically, or you had better do nothing at all. To set about your cure half-heartedly can only end in failure. Therefore, I repeat, write down rules for your guidance, and stick to them hard and fast; and write down, also, present symptoms to be compared with future, and so you shall do well, and with God's blessing get well.
